Higher Education and Research Act 2017

2017 CHAPTER 29

PART 1

THE OFFICE FOR STUDENTS

Establishment of the Office for Students

1 The Office for Students

(1) A body corporate called the Office for Students is established.

(2) In this Act that body is referred to as "the OfS".

(3) Schedule 1 contains further provision about the OfS.

2 General duties

(1) In performing its functions, the OfS must have regard to—

(a) the need to protect the institutional autonomy of English higher education providers,

(b) the need to promote quality, and greater choice and opportunities for students, in the provision of higher education by English higher education providers,

(c) the need to encourage competition between English higher education providers in connection with the provision of higher education where that competition is in the interests of students and employers, while also having regard to the benefits for students and employers resulting from collaboration between such providers,

(d) the need to promote value for money in the provision of higher education by English higher education providers,

(e) the need to promote equality of opportunity in connection with access to and participation in higher education provided by English higher education providers,

(f) the need to use the OfS's resources in an efficient, effective and economic way, and

(g) so far as relevant, the principles of best regulatory practice, including the principles that regulatory activities should be—

(i) transparent, accountable, proportionate and consistent, and

(ii) targeted only at cases in which action is needed.

(2) The reference in subsection (1)(b) to choice in the provision of higher education by English higher education providers includes choice amongst a diverse range of—

(a) types of provider,

(b) higher education courses, and

(c) means by which they are provided (for example, full-time or part-time study, distance learning or accelerated courses).

(3) In performing its functions, including its duties under subsection (1), the OfS must have regard to guidance given to it by the Secretary of State.

(4) In giving such guidance, the Secretary of State must have regard to the need to protect the institutional autonomy of English higher education providers.

(5) The guidance may, in particular, be framed by reference to particular courses of study but, whether or not the guidance is framed in that way, it must not relate to—

(a) particular parts of courses of study,

(b) the content of such courses,

(c) the manner in which they are taught, supervised or assessed,

(d) the criteria for the selection, appointment or dismissal of academic staff, or how they are applied, or

(e) the criteria for the admission of students, or how they are applied.

(6) Guidance framed by reference to a particular course of study must not guide the OfS to perform a function in a way which prohibits or requires the provision of a particular course of study.

(7) Guidance given by the Secretary of State to the OfS which relates to English higher education providers must apply to such providers generally or to a description of such providers.

(8) In this Part, "the institutional autonomy of English higher education providers" means—

(a) the freedom of English higher education providers within the law to conduct their day to day management in an effective and competent way,

(b) the freedom of English higher education providers—

(i) to determine the content of particular courses and the manner in which they are taught, supervised and assessed,

(ii) to determine the criteria for the selection, appointment and dismissal of academic staff and apply those criteria in particular cases, and

(iii) to determine the criteria for the admission of students and apply those criteria in particular cases, and

(c) the freedom within the law of academic staff at English higher education providers—

(i) to question and test received wisdom, and

(ii) to put forward new ideas and controversial or unpopular opinions, without placing themselves in jeopardy of losing their jobs or privileges they may have at the providers.

The register of English higher education providers

3 The register

(1) The OfS must establish and maintain a register of English higher education providers (referred to in this Part as "the register").

(2) The register may be divided by the OfS into different parts representing such different categories of registration as the OfS may determine.

(3) The OfS must register an institution in the register (or, where it has been divided into parts, in a particular part of the register) if—

(a) its governing body applies for it to be registered in the register (or in that part),

(b) it is, or intends to become, an English higher education provider,

(c) it satisfies the initial registration conditions applicable to it in respect of the registration sought (see section 5), and

(d) the application complies with any requirements imposed under subsection (5).

(4) The OfS may not otherwise register an institution in the register.

(5) The OfS may determine—

(a) the form of an application for registration in the register (or in a particular part of the register),

(b) the information to be contained in it or provided with it, and

(c) the manner in which an application is to be submitted.

(6) The Secretary of State may by regulations make provision about the information which must be contained in an institution's entry in the register.

(7) Once registered, an institution's ongoing registration is subject to satisfying—

(a) the general ongoing registration conditions applicable to it at the time of its registration and as they may be later revised (see section 5), and

(b) the specific ongoing registration conditions (if any) imposed on it at the time of its registration and as they may be later varied (see section 6).

(8) References in this Part to the ongoing registration conditions of an institution are to the conditions mentioned in subsection (7)(a) and (b).

(9) The OfS must make the information contained in the register, and the information previously contained in it, publicly available by such means as it considers appropriate.

(10) In this Part—

(a) a "registered higher education provider" means an institution which is registered in the register, and

(b) references to "registration" are to be read accordingly.

4 Registration procedure

(1) Before refusing an application to register an institution, the OfS must notify the governing body of the institution of its intention to do so.

(2) The notice must—
   (a) specify the OfS's reasons for proposing to refuse to register the institution,
   (b) specify the period during which the governing body of the institution may make representations about the proposal ("the specified period"), and
   (c) specify the way in which those representations may be made.

(3) The specified period must not be less than 28 days beginning with the date on which the notice is received.

(4) The OfS must have regard to any representations made by the governing body of the institution during the specified period in deciding whether to register it in the register.

(5) Having decided whether or not to register the institution, the OfS must notify the governing body of the institution of its decision.

(6) Where the decision is to register the institution, the notice must—
   (a) specify the date of entry in the register, and
   (b) specify the ongoing registration conditions of the institution at that time.

(7) Where the decision is to refuse to register the institution, the notice must contain information as to the grounds for the refusal.

Registration conditions

5 The initial and general ongoing registration conditions

(1) The OfS must determine and publish—
   (a) the initial registration conditions, and
   (b) the general ongoing registration conditions.

(2) Different conditions may be determined—
   (a) for different descriptions of provider;
   (b) for registration in different parts of the register.

(3) The OfS may revise the conditions.

(4) If the OfS revises the conditions, it must publish them as revised.

(5) Before determining or revising the conditions, the OfS must, if it appears to it appropriate to do so, consult bodies representing the interests of English higher education providers which appear to the OfS to be concerned.

(6) The OfS may, at the time of an institution's registration or later, decide that a particular general ongoing registration condition is not applicable to it.

(7) Where the decision is made after the institution's registration, the OfS must notify the governing body of the institution of its decision.

6 The specific ongoing registration conditions

(1) The OfS may, at the time of an institution's registration or later, impose such conditions on its registration as the OfS may determine ("the specific ongoing registration conditions").

(2) The OfS may at any time vary or remove a specific ongoing registration condition.

(3) Before—

(a) varying or removing a specific ongoing registration condition on an institution's registration, or

(b) imposing a new specific ongoing registration condition on its registration, the OfS must notify the governing body of the institution of its intention to do so.

(4) The notice must—

(a) specify the OfS's reasons for proposing to take the step in question,

(b) specify the period during which the governing body of the institution may make representations about the proposal ("the specified period"), and

(c) specify the way in which those representations may be made.

(5) The specified period must not be less than 28 days beginning with the date on which the notice is received.

(6) The OfS must have regard to any representations made by the governing body of the institution during the specified period in deciding whether to take the step in question.

(7) Having decided whether or not to take the step in question, the OfS must notify the governing body of the institution of its decision.

(8) If the OfS decides to vary or remove a specific ongoing registration condition or impose a new specific ongoing registration condition, the notice must—

(a) specify the condition (as varied), the condition being removed or the new condition (as the case may be), and

(b) specify the date when the variation, removal or imposition takes effect.

(9) For the purposes of this section, a specific ongoing registration condition is "new" if it is imposed otherwise than at the time of the institution's registration.

7 Proportionate conditions

(1) The OfS must ensure that the initial registration conditions applicable to an institution and its ongoing registration conditions are proportionate to the OfS's assessment of the regulatory risk posed by the institution.

(2) "Regulatory risk" means the risk of the institution, when it is registered, failing to comply with regulation by the OfS.

(3) In light of its duty under subsection (1), the OfS must keep the initial registration conditions applicable to an institution and its ongoing registration conditions under review.

Mandatory registration conditions

8 Mandatory ongoing registration conditions for all providers

(1) The OfS must ensure that the ongoing registration conditions of each registered higher education provider include—

(a) a condition that requires the governing body of the provider to notify the OfS of any change of which it becomes aware which affects the accuracy of the information contained in the provider's entry in the register,

(b) a condition that requires the governing body of the provider to provide the OfS, or a person nominated by the OfS, with such information for the purposes of the performance of the OfS's functions as the OfS may require it to provide, and

(c) a condition that requires the governing body of the provider to provide a designated body with such information for the purposes of the performance of its duties under sections 64(1) and 65(1) (compiling, making available and publishing higher education information) as the designated body may require it to provide.

(2) In subsection (1)(c), "designated body" means a body for the time being designated under Schedule 6.

9 Mandatory transparency condition for certain providers

(1) The OfS must ensure that the ongoing registration conditions of each registered higher education provider of a prescribed description include a transparency condition.

(2) A transparency condition is a condition that requires the governing body of a registered higher education provider to provide to the OfS, and publish, such information as the OfS requests in relation to one or more of the following—

(a) the number of applications for admission on to higher education courses that the provider has received;

(b) the number of offers made by the provider in relation to those applications;

(c) the number of those offers that were accepted;

(d) the number of students who accepted those offers that completed their course with the provider;

(e) the number of students who attained a particular degree or other academic award, or a particular level of such an award, on completion of their course with the provider.

(3) The information which the OfS may request in relation to the numbers mentioned in subsection (2) includes those numbers by reference to one or more of the following—

(a) the gender of the individuals to which they relate;

(b) their ethnicity;

(c) their socio-economic background.

(4) "Prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State for the purposes of this section.

10 Mandatory fee limit condition for certain providers

(1) The OfS must ensure that the ongoing registration conditions of each registered higher education provider of a prescribed description include a fee limit condition.

(2) In this Part, "a fee limit condition" means a condition that requires the governing body of the provider to secure that regulated course fees do not exceed the fee limit.

(3) "Regulated course fees" are fees payable to the provider by a qualifying person—

(a) in connection with his or her undertaking a qualifying course, and

(b) in respect of an academic year applicable to that course which begins at the same time as, or while, the provider is registered in the register.

(4) A "qualifying person" means a person who—

(a) is not an international student, and

(b) is within a prescribed description of persons.

(5) An "international student" means a person who is not within any description of persons prescribed under section 1 of the Education (Fees and Awards) Act 1983 (charging of higher fees in case of students without prescribed connection with the UK) for the purposes of subsection (1) or (2) of that section.

(6) A "qualifying course" means a higher education course of a prescribed description.

(7) The power to prescribe descriptions of higher education course under subsection (6) may not be exercised in such a way as to discriminate—

(a) in relation to courses of initial teacher training, between different courses on the basis of the subjects in which such training is given, and

(b) in relation to other courses, between different courses at the same or a comparable level on the basis of the areas of study or research to which they relate.

(8) The OfS has no power, apart from this section, to limit the fees payable to an English higher education provider.

(9) In this section—

"higher education course" does not include any postgraduate course other than a course of initial teacher training;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State for the purposes of this section.

(10) Schedule 2 contains provision about determining "the fee limit"; see section 85(2) for the meaning of "fees".

11 Duty to publish a list regarding the fee limit condition

(1) The OfS must publish in each year a list of—

(a) the registered higher education providers who have a fee limit condition as an ongoing registration condition, and

(b) the fee limits as determined under Schedule 2 in relation to each of those providers for fees in connection with each qualifying course provided by the provider in respect of each relevant academic year.

(2) A "relevant academic year", in relation to a qualifying course, is an academic year which is applicable to the course and which is due to start in the calendar year after the calendar year in which the list is published.

(3) The OfS must send a copy of each published list to the Secretary of State who must lay it before Parliament.

(4) The Secretary of State may by regulations prescribe the date by which a list under this section must be published by the OfS.

12 Mandatory access and participation plan condition for certain institutions

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a fee limit condition will be or is one of the ongoing registration conditions of an institution, and

(b) the governing body of the institution requests the imposition of an access and participation plan condition in order to access the higher fee limits available in respect of the fee limit condition for institutions who have such a plan.

(2) An access and participation plan condition—

(a) may be an initial registration condition that is applicable to the institution, and

(b) must be one of its ongoing registration conditions.

(3) In this Part, "an access and participation plan condition", in relation to an institution, means a condition requiring that—

(a) there is an access and participation plan in relation to the institution which—

(i) has been approved by the OfS under section 29 (power to approve an access and participation plan), and

(ii) is in force, and

(b) the governing body of the institution complies with the general provisions of that plan (within the meaning of section 32).

(4) A governing body of an institution is not to be regarded as having failed to comply with the requirement mentioned in subsection (3)(b) by reason of its failure to comply with a general provision of the plan if it shows that it has taken all reasonable steps to comply with the provision.

Other registration conditions

13 Other initial and ongoing registration conditions

(1) The initial or ongoing registration conditions may, in particular, include—

(a) a condition relating to the quality of, or the standards applied to, the higher education provided by the provider (including requiring the quality to be of a particular level or particular standards to be applied);

(b) a public interest governance condition (see section 14);

(c) a condition relating to the provider having a student protection plan which has the OfS's approval (including requiring the provider to have such a plan and to publish it);

(d) a condition requiring the payment of a fee charged under section 70(1) (initial fee and annual fee for ongoing registration);

(e) a condition requiring the payment of a fee charged under section 28 or 67 (fees charged by designated bodies) or section 71(1) (other fees charged by the OfS);

(f) a condition requiring the governing body of the provider to take such steps as the OfS considers appropriate for facilitating cooperation between the provider and one or more electoral registration officers in England for the purpose of enabling the electoral registration of students who are on higher education courses provided by the provider.

I have every sympathy with the general commissioners in being faced with these problems of statutory construction without the aid of professional legal argument in support of the taxpayer's claim; and I should make it clear that much of the reasoning by which I have reached my conclusion in the B taxpayer's favour was not put forward by the taxpayer. Nevertheless, I do not see any effective answer to that reasoning, and in my judgment the decision of the general commissioners was wrong. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Practice—Chancery Division—Possession of land—Order for possession—Whether power to suspend order—R.S.C., Ord. 113

In two claims for possession under R.S.C., Ord. 113,[1] F squatters had broken into empty houses and started to live in them without any authority from the respective owners who in both cases obtained orders that they "do recover possession."

On appeals by the squatters, who sought stays of execution:—

Held, dismissing the appeals, that since the squatters had entered and remained in the houses as trespassers the court had no discretion to suspend the orders for possession (post, G pp. 456E–F, 458E–F, 460F, 462A–B).

In re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, Ex parte Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association for the South East [1971] Ch. 204 considered.

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 113, r. 1: "Where a person claims possession of land which he H alleges is occupied solely by a person or persons (not being a tenant or tenants holding over after the termination of the tenancy) who entered into or remained in occupation without his licence or consent or that of any predecessor in title of his, the proceedings may be brought by originating summons in accordance with the provisions of this order."

Per curiam. The squatters were guilty of both a criminal offence and a civil wrong and in such circumstances the courts of common law never suspended an order for possession and the courts of equity never intervened to aid a wrongdoer (post, pp. 456E–F, 457D, H, 460F, H—461A, 462B).

Per Lord Denning M.R. and Orr L.J. When a judgment for possession is obtained under the R.S.C., Ord. 113, procedure, there is no provision for giving any time (post, pp. 458E–F, 460F). The position is different when a tenant holds over after his tenancy has expired or a servant's exclusive occupation is terminated or a mortgagee seeks to obtain possession of a dwelling-house (post, pp. 458H, 460B, F).

APPEALS from Phillips J. and Foster J.

On an originating summons by the plaintiff, Donald Douglas McPhail, against " persons whose names are not known," in the matter of 4 Thornhill Square, Islington, London, Phillips J. on April 25, 1973, ordered that the plaintiff " do recover possession " of the premises. On May 1, 1973, the C Court of Appeal ordered that Sheila Smith, Elaine Hardman, Linda Levin, John Forsyth and Mark Hill be joined as defendants to the action and that execution of the order of Phillips J. be stayed until the hearing of their appeal.

On an originating summons by the plaintiffs, Bristol City Corporation, against the defendants, Jennifer Rosemary Ross and Angela Tapp, in the D matter of 23 Normanby Road, Easton, Bristol, Foster J. on April 18, 1973, ordered that the plaintiffs " do recover possession " of the premises.

In both cases the defendants appealed on the grounds that the judge was wrong in law in holding that he had no jurisdiction to grant a stay of execution; the decision of Goulding J. in Department of the Environment v. James [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1279 was wrong in law and the judge erred in following it, and in all the circumstances of the case it would be just and E equitable to grant a stay of execution. The appeals were heard together.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Denning M.R.

J. C. Harper for the defendants Sheila Smith, Elaine Hardman and Mark Hill in the first appeal and for the defendants in the second appeal. Department of the Environment v. James [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1279 has been treated as binding by county court judges. Many similar cases go to the county F court and judges there usually try to give 28 days' stay.

Before 1873, in an action for ejectment where an order for possession was made a postponement of execution could be obtained. The issue is whether either at common law or in equity the court has a discretion to grant a stay of execution. The question might arise in all cases where the Rent Acts do not apply and an order for possession is made, e.g., the case G of a deserted wife or mistress.

There are four possible orders which could be made: (1) an absolute order for possession to take effect at once; (2) an absolute order with the date of possession postponed for a period; (3) a suspended order for possession; (4) an order that if specified conditions were not complied with a possession order would be made.

Historically the Court of Chancery did have power before 1875 to defer H ejectment by injunction. There are a number of cases in the 20th century that assume that there is the power to postpone execution of possession in the case of the trespasser. Anything that could be done by Chancery before 1875 can be done by the courts now.

Gilbert's History and Practice of Chancery (1758), pp. 195–196 says: A

> " 8. There are other injunctions which are never denied, as in an ejectment, where the party agrees to give judgment in ejectment to prevent trial, to give a release of errors, and to consent not to bring a writ of errors; and to this it is sometimes added, to deliver possession, as the court upon hearing shall direct. This forwards the defendant at law, and he could have no more, if he were to proceed to trial." B

That proposition was repeated in a number of books. Harrison, Chancery Practice ("The Accomplished Practiser in the High Court of Chancery"), 7th ed. (1790), vol. II, p. 247, says

> " Injunctions are granted in Ejectment Causes. This species of injunction is never denied where the party agrees to give judgment in ejectment, to prevent trial, to give a release of errors . . , and to this C it is sometimes added, to deliver possession as the court upon hearing shall direct. . . ."

See also Bacon's Abridgement, 6th ed. (1807), vol. III, p. 654 and 7th ed. (1832), vol. IV, p. 432. In Harrison, Bacon and in Comyns' Digest [see 5th ed. (1822), vol. 2, pp. 417–418] it is stated categorically that D an injunction can be granted at any stage even after judgment but not after execution, save to " stay the money in the hands of the sheriff " [Comyns, p. 418]. The power was exercised as of right. There was no distinction drawn between the possession of a person originally lawfully on the premises and that of a person who was there as a trespasser.

As to the effect of judgment for possession in ejectment and time for delivery up of possession, see Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd ed., vol. 32 E (1960), pp. 376, 377. In Kelly v. White [1920] W.N. 220, 221, Salter and Roche JJ. held that the county court had the same inherent discretion to stay execution of its judgments as the High Court, but the discretion had to be exercised judicially and not to create a new tenancy of indefinite duration. In Upjohn v. Macfarlane [1922] 2 Ch. 256 Astbury J. at p. 265 considered Kelly v. White [1920] W.N. 220 and exercised his discretion F under section 5 of the Rent Restrictions Act 1920 to refuse an order for possession: on appeal to the Court of Appeal a consent order for possession was made. In Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford [1929] 2 K.B. 180 it was recognised that the words " may order that possession . . . be granted " in section 138 of the County Courts Act 1888 contemplated a postponement of the day on which possession was to be ordered and the appeals were remitted to the county court judge " to make an order for possession, G postponing the operation of it " if he thought fit for such period as he thought right bearing in mind the views expressed. [Reference was made to sections 48 of the County Court Act 1959 and to J. & F. Stone Lighting and Radio Ltd. v. Levitt [1947] A.C. 209, 216.]

There are three important cases. In Jones v. Savery [1951] 1 All E.R. 820 it was on the assumption that the county court judge had a H discretion to allow a reasonable time before the execution of an order for possession that a postponement of three months was reduced to one month in the circumstances of the case. Jones v. Savery was considered in Air Ministry v. Harris [1951] 2 All E.R. 862 where the landlords were held to

A be entitled to a warrant and a stay of execution on an order for possession was removed. The judgments of both Somervell and Denning L.JJ. proceeded upon the basis that there was a discretion " to keep a landlord out of possession " which had to be exercised within reasonable bounds.

In Chester-le-Street Rural District Council v. Carr (unreported), October 30, 1952, Bar Library Transcript No. 414 (see [1952] C.P.L. 790) where " proceedings were taken against persons without any legal right to posses-

B sion " the defendant had been given four months' suspension of the order of possession and the strong Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal. In Moore v. Lambeth County Court Registrar [1969] 1 W.L.R. 141 the Court of Appeal held that the county court judge had no power after making an order for possession to suspend possession further: see per Edmund Davies L.J. at p. 144. In National Provincial Bank Ltd.

C v. Hastings Car Mart Ltd. [1965] A.C. 1175, 28 days was allowed. The discretion to suspend the order for possession exists; how it is exercised is another matter.

R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 5 (1), gives the court power to extend the time within which a person is required " by any judgment, order or direction, to do any act in any proceedings." As to the form of judgment for possession, see R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 1 (1) (2), and The Supreme Court Practice 1973.

D vol. 1, p. 613 and vol. 2, p. 23. R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 6 (2), provides that where, as here, an order " requiring a person to do an act does not specify a time within which the act is to be done," the court has power " subsequently to make an order requiring the act to be done within such time after service " of the order, " or such other time, as may be specified therein." In the county court, by the County Court Rules 1936, Ord. 24,

E r. 11, " Every judgment or order requiring any person to do an act other than the payment of money or costs, shall state the time within which the act is to be done."

The defendants Linda Levin and John Forsyth in the first appeal appeared in person and made no submissions.

Anthony Lincoln Q.C. and Stephen Nathan for the plaintiff in the first appeal. Entry to a fully furnished first floor flat at no. 4 Thornhill

F Square was forced. The plaintiff does use the flat and so does his aunt.

There is a distinction so far as orders for possession of land are concerned between the county court and the High Court. The cases cited for the defendants in support of the suggested discretion to grant a stay were cases on appeal from the county court to the Court of Appeal. If there were the suggested discretion it would defeat the whole purpose of R.S.C.,

G Ord. 113 which provides a new procedure for the recovery of possession of land which is in wrongful possession by trespassers.

Goulding J. consulted his brethren before he gave his judgment in Department of the Environment v. James [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1279, 1280 and knew of no case " in which the question of the court's power to delay recovery of possession " had " been argued or decided." There is no inherent jurisdiction to stay a writ of fi. fa. Parliament has given the H county court specific statutory powers to be merciful.

The defendants rely upon the alleged power of courts of equity to grant an injunction to restrain the enforcement of an owner's right to possession, but they are wrongdoers and can show no equity. R.S.C., Ord.

113, like the corresponding procedure in the county court under the County Court Rules, Ord. 26, Pt. 1, is intended to provide a swift form of R.S.C., Ord. 14, procedure. It provides a mandatory form of order for possession (R.S.C., Pt. 2, Appendix A, form no. 42A).

Jones v. Savery [1951] 1 All E.R. 820 says nothing about an inherent power to stay execution. Singleton L.J. at pp. 821–822 assumed that Ord. 24, r. 11, of the County Court Rules 1936 gave power to postpone for a short period the operation of an order for possession. In Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford [1929] 2 K.B. 180 an express power to postpone had been given by section 138 of the County Courts Act 1888: see the argument at p. 181. Kelly v. White [1920] W.N. 220 was a case under section 1 (3) of the Increase of Rent, etc., Act 1915 of a tenant holding over when rent was in arrears and he had been given notice to quit: it is no authority on the point at issue here.

The High Court has power in limited circumstances to stay execution on a debt but only on grounds that are relevant to a stay and not to matters of defence in law or relief in equity: see T.C. Trustees Ltd. v. J. S. Darwen (Successors) Ltd. [1969] 2 Q.B. 295. Reliance is put on what Winn L.J. said at pp. 302–303 as to the effect of section 41 of the Judicature Act 1925 and the writ of fi. fa. being issued as of right.

There is no inherent jurisdiction to stay execution on a writ of possession. Chester-le-Street Rural District Council v. Carr (unreported), October 30, 1952 ([1952] C.P.L. 790) was an appeal from the county court where the Court of Appeal had not before it the judge's reasons for making his order and it cannot be regarded as an authority to the contrary. There is no mention in the Final Report of the Committee on Supreme Court Practice and Procedure, Cmd. 8878 ("the Evershed Report") of any such inherent jurisdiction. Section 36 (2) of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 gives the court express power to suspend the order for possession in the case of a mortgagee seeking possession of a dwelling house: so there is no inherent jurisdiction.

R.S.C., Ord. 113, provides a new summary procedure for obtaining an order for possession against squatters and there is no jurisdiction to permit delay.

Before 1873 Chancery could intervene by common injunction to restrain the obtaining, or the execution, of an order of possession at common law. There is a clear distinction between the position of trespassers, tortiously on another's property, and that of those whose possession was originally lawful. Hardship was not a ground for equitable relief. There is no reference in Daniell's Chancery Practice, 8th ed. (1914) to any inherent jurisdiction to stay proceedings.

An Act of 1731, 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, "for the more effectual preventing frauds committed by tenants . . . ," cut down the circumstances under which an injunction could be obtained in equity, "lessees filing bill in equity not to have an injunction against proceedings at law, etc." The Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), sections 103 and 108 dealt with a defendant confessing the action and error and bail in error in ejectment respectively. By section 111 a lessee proceeding in equity was not to have an injunction or relief without payment of rent and costs.

A In Cousins v. Smith (1806) 13 Ves.Jun. 164, Lord Erskine L.C. at p. 167 said that it was well known " that frequently after a verdict at law a bill for an injunction is filed merely for delay," that " No instance is cited of an injunction granted pending a demurrer " and that " the injunction ought not to have been issued." Grafton v. Griffin (1830) 1 Russ. & M. 336 shows that where " the plaintiff has by tortious means got into possession of property . . . the court will not stay legal proceedings B against him for the recovery of possession."

The Common Law Procedure Act 1852, section 212, and the Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), section 93, allow a stay of proceedings in specified circumstances. By section 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925 every matter of equity on which an injunction against the prosecution of a cause or proceeding " might formerly have been obtained . . . may be relied on by way of defence. . . ." If the defendants C had an equity it should have been raised in the action.

Under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 3 (2), the leave of the court is necessary before a writ of possession to enforce a judgment or order for possession of land is issued: see The Supreme Court Practice, 1973, vol. 1, pp. 678, 680. But under R.S.C., Ord. 113, r. 7 (1), notwithstanding Ord. 45, r. 3, a writ of possession to enforce an order for possession under that rule may D be issued without leave of the court. It was clearly the object of R.S.C., Ord. 113, to provide the procedure to obtain possession as soon as possible. [Reference was made to the County Court Rules 1936, Ord. 25, r. 72, and Ord. 26].

The only inherent jurisdiction on which the court can stay executions of judgments is where equity would have granted a common injunction and where there is a forceful entry there is no such jurisdiction. The E defendants have no equity and so there is no jurisdiction to grant a stay. What Gilbert C.B. said in History and Practice of Chancery, pp. 195–196, matches up with these submissions: it does not extend to a trespasser. The court has an inherent jurisdiction to stay proceedings which are an abuse of the process of the court. [Reference was made to Cole on Ejectment (1857), pp. 373 et seq.]

F It is not suggested that R.S.C., Ord. 113, is ultra vires. It created a summary procedure under which there is no express or implied power to stay judgments. Alternatively, on the wider question relating to all non-Rent Act possession cases, persons who have committed forceful entry have no equity and no question of an inherent jurisdiction to stay can apply to them. A tenant holding over could complain to equity on a number of specified grounds, i.e., that he had not had a fair trial, and G Chancery would give him a bill of discovery or a common injunction which was in effect a stay. The injunction was only granted to a person who could enter the doors of equity.

J. A. R. Finlay Q.C. for the plaintiffs in the second appeal. The plaintiffs are a local authority under a duty with regard to housing.

Two distinctions must be made: (1) between an order for possession H and a writ of possession; (2) between a stay of execution and a stay of proceedings. The passage in Gilbert's History and Practice of Chancery, pp. 195–196, relates to stay of proceedings.

introduced by R.S.C. (No. 3) 1956 as amended by R.S.C. (Rev.) 1962 following the recommendation of the Evershed Report (Cmd. 8878). For the earlier forms of order before October 1, 1966, see The Annual Practice 1963, pp. 1141, 2344, 2345. For the forms of judgment, see R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 1, and The Supreme Court Practice 1973, vol. 2, p. 23. A

Before October 1, 1966, there were two forms of order in an action for possession of land: (1) that the plaintiff "do recover possession"; (2) that the defendant do "deliver" possession to the plaintiff. The first was the traditional common law order stating no time for recovery of possession and requiring leave to be obtained ex parte before it could be enforced by writ of possession. The second operated in personam and derived from orders made by Chancery. It could and frequently did state a time for delivery of possession. It could be enforced by writ of possession and filing the appropriate affidavit. The fact that, in cases where the latter form of order was appropriate, possession could be postponed to the time stated does not imply that an order in the other form, that the plaintiff "do recover possession," can postpone possession. The claim for possession of mortgaged property does not afford any general guidance because the mortgagor always had his equity of redemption until he was foreclosed. The order on foreclosure is an order for possession forthwith; but because of the equity of redemption a mortgagee's order for possession, not made on foreclosure absolute, may be in terms which postpone possession. That does not imply a general inherent jurisdiction to postpone possession where the plaintiff claims possession as of legal right. B C D

Where the appropriate order is as here, under R.S.C., Ord. 113, r. 7, that the plaintiff "do recover possession" (see Form No. 66A in The Supreme Court Practice, vol. 2, p. 31) there is no jurisdiction to postpone the right to possession. E

Harper in reply. The plaintiffs made no reference to R.S.C., Ord. 113, r. 8. [Reference was made to the closing words of Goulding J. in Department of the Environment v. James [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1279, 1281.] It is unhistorical to say that equitable principles were codified before 1873, particularly with regard to injunctions, which were very easily obtained in Chancery, and so such statutes as 4 Geo. 2, c. 28 were passed. F

In Moore v. Lambeth County Court Registrar [1969] 1 W.L.R. 141, Edmund Davies L.J. at p. 144 referred to "the power of a judge in the first instance" to suspend the operation of an order for possession but that he could not do it twice. The Rules of the Supreme Court cannot increase or decrease legal rights. Grafton v. Griffin, 1 Russ. & M. 336 is quite irrelevant. Cousins v. Smith, 13 Ves.Jun. 164 is a very special case and is difficult to understand. G

If there is no discretion to suspend an order for possession, it is strange that it is not mentioned in The Rent Acts, R. E. Megarry, 10th ed. (1967), vol. 1, p. 249, where the group of cases including Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford [1929] 2 K.B. 180 and Chester-le-Street Rural District Council v. Carr (unreported), October 30, 1952, which was a squatter case, are cited and it is said that where the Rent Acts do not apply "an order for possession may provide that it shall not take effect for some stated period. . . ." H

A 1279 it was always assumed that there was a discretion to suspend an order for possession. The practice among county court judges differs.

There was power in 1873 by virtue of an injunction in equity to effect a stay. No common law authority before 1873 is known. Since 1875 there has been nothing that has taken away that power to grant an injunction. R.S.C., Ord. 113, like the other rules, is entirely procedural and does not alter the substantive law. No time is specified in any order. [Reference B was made to The Supreme Court Practice, vol. 1, p. 613 and the County Court Rules 1936, Ord. 24, r. 11.]

Mortgages are a very special and not a parallel case: see Four-Maids Ltd. v. Dudley Marshall (Properties) Ltd. [1957] Ch. 317. Experienced counsel in the Chester-le-Street case (see [1952] C.P.L. 790) did not take the point that the judge had no discretion. The court should hesitate C before overruling that decision. The jurisdiction to stay execution exists, although the question of the exercise of the discretion may be another matter.

Lincoln Q.C. The defendants here did not submit to judgment.

Harper. The plaintiffs' title was not contested.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 24. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING M.R.

1. Introduction

Mr. McPhail is the owner of a leasehold house, no. 4, Thornhill E Square, Islington. There was some furniture in it, but otherwise it seems to have been unoccupied. On Friday, April 13, 1973, the premises were left locked and secured. On Sunday, April 15, 1973, some persons, then unknown, made entry. They got in by the front door and put a new lock on. On Monday, April 16, 1973, Mr. McPhail went with a detective inspector, and asked them their names. They did not give them. So F he took proceedings for possession under R.S.C., Ord. 113. These were served on them some time on Thursday, April 19 for hearing on April 25. They then gave their names. They said they believed that the house had been empty for at least two years, and, as they had nowhere to live, they decided to make their home there. On April 25, Phillips J. made an order that Mr. McPhail do recover possession.

Bristol Corporation own a house, no. 23, Normanby Road, Easton, G Bristol. About March 16, 1973, two women and five children entered it and started to live there. As soon as the officers of the corporation heard of it, they went to the house. They found a notice on the window, which read:

> "This property has been occupied by squatters, and we intend to stay here. If you try to evict us with force, we will prosecute you and H you must deal with us through the courts."

The corporation took steps under R.S.C., Ord. 113, to obtain possession. They served a summons on the two women on April 13, 1973. It came before Foster J. on April 18, 1973. He made an order that the plaintiffs do recover possession of the house. A

In both cases the squatters appeal to the courts. They admit that they have no defence in law, but they ask the court to give them time. They only asked for four weeks, or so. Can the court give it to them? The case raises this question: when the owner of the house asks for an order for possession, is the judge bound to make an order which is enforceable forthwith or can he suspend it for a while? B

2. The law as to squatters

What is a squatter? He is one who, without any colour of right, enters on an unoccupied house or land, intending to stay there as long as he can. He may seek to justify or excuse his conduct. He may say that he was homeless and that this house or land was standing empty, C doing nothing. But this plea is of no avail in law. As we said in Southwark London Borough Council v. Williams [1971] Ch. 734, 744:

> "If homelessness were once admitted as a defence to trespass, no one's house could be safe. . . . So the courts must, for the sake of law and order, take a firm stand. They must refuse to admit the plea of necessity to the hungry and the homeless: and trust that D their distress will be relieved by the charitable and the good."

(i) The remedy of self-help

Now I would say this at once about squatters. The owner is not obliged to go to the courts to obtain possession. He is entitled, if he so desires, to take the remedy into his own hands. He can go in himself and turn them out without the aid of the courts of law. This is not a E course to be recommended because of the disturbance which might follow. But the legality of it is beyond question. The squatters were themselves guilty of the offence of forcible entry contrary to the Statute of 1381 (4 Ric. 2, stat. 1, c. 7). When they broke in, they entered "with strong hand" which the statute forbids. They were not only guilty of a criminal offence. They were guilty of a civil wrong. They F were trespassers when they entered, and they continued to be trespassers so long as they remained there. The owner never acquiesced in their presence there. So the trespassers never gained possession. The owner, being entitled to possession, was entitled forcibly to turn them out: see Browne v. Dawson (1840) 12 Ad. & El. 624. As Sir Frederick Pollock put it in his book on Torts: G

> "A trespasser may in any case be turned off land before he has gained possession, and he does not gain possession until there has been something like acquiescence in the physical fact of his occupation on the part of the rightful owner": see Pollock on Torts, 15th ed. (1951), p. 292.

Even though the owner himself should use force, then so long as he uses H no more force than is reasonably necessary, he is not himself liable either criminally or civilly. He is not liable criminally (1) because it was said in the old times that none of the statutes of forcible entry apply to

A the expulsion by the owner of a tenant at will (see Anonymous (1670) 1 Vent. 89; Rex v. Dorny (1700) 1 Salk 260; Rex v. Bathurst (1755) Say. 225); but, even if this is no longer true, (2) in any case the statutes only apply to the expulsion of one who is in possession: see Reg. v. Child (1846) 2 Cox C.C. 102. They do not apply to the expulsion of a trespasser who has no possession. The owner was not civilly liable because the owner is entitled to turn out a trespasser using force, no B more than is reasonably necessary: see Hemmings v. Stoke Poges Golf Club [1920] 1 K.B. 720.

(ii) The remedy by action

Although the law thus enables the owner to take the remedy into his own hand, that is not a course to be encouraged. In a civilised C society, the courts should themselves provide a remedy which is speedy and effective: and thus make self-help unnecessary. The courts of common law have done this for centuries. The owner is entitled to go to the court and obtain an order that the owner "do recover" the land, and to issue a writ of possession immediately. That was the practice in the old action of ejectment which is well described by Sir William Blackstone in his Commentaries, 8th ed. (1778), vol. III, pp. 200–205 D and Appendix No. II; and by Maitland in his Equity (1909), pp. 352–354. So far as I can discover, the courts of common law never suspended the order for possession. Once the order was made, the owner could straightaway get a writ of possession for the sheriff to cause the owner to be put into possession. Sometimes the owner, although he got an order, might not wish to get the sheriff to turn out the trespassers, E because the sheriff was known to charge extortionate fees. In that case the owner was entitled to take possession at once by his own hand: see Harris v. Austen (1615) 1 Rolle 210, 213, per Coke C.J., Lacy v. Berry (1659) 2 Sid. 155, 156 and Aglionby v. Cohen [1955] 1 Q.B. 558.

Seeing that the owner could take possession at once without the help of the courts, it is plain that, when he does come to the courts, he should not be in any worse position. The courts should give him possession at F once, else he would be tempted to do it himself. So the courts of common law never suspended the order for possession.

It was suggested by Mr. Harper that, although the courts of common law never suspended the order for possession, nevertheless, the courts of equity might do so: because they had power to issue an injunction to restrain the owner from proceeding with his action at law or with G the enforcement of his order. In support of his argument, Mr. Harper cited a passage from Gilbert's History and Practice of Chancery (1758) pp. 195–196, which was repeated afterwards in Harrison, Chancery Practice, 7th ed. (1790), vol. 11, p. 247 and Bacon's Abridgement, 6th ed. (1807), vol. III, p. 654; 7th ed. (1832), vol. IV, p. 432. But the passage is obscurely worded. And I am satisfied that a court of equity would never H intervene in aid of a wrongdoer. In Grafton v. Griffin (1830) 1 Russ. & M. 336, where some claimants had wrongfully turned a widow out of a house and got possession of it, Lord Lyndhurst L.C. said, at p. 337: "This court will not interfere to support a possession so acquired."

By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875 [38 & 39 Vict. c. 77], the old action of ejectment was replaced by an action for the recovery of land: but the practice remained the same, although the machinery was different: see Gledhill v. Hunter (1880) 14 Ch.D. 492, 498–500. The judgment was, as before, that the plaintiff "do recover" possession. No time was mentioned. No date was given. The plaintiff could at once issue a writ of possession which was executed against the premises themselves. The sheriff's officers turned out everyone who was there. If there was some one else there, in addition to the defendant, he too would be turned out unless he applied to come in and defend: see Minet v. Johnson (1890) 6 T.L.R. 417 and Leicester Permanent Building Society v. Shearley [1951] Ch. 90.

(iii) The remedy by summons

So the matter rested until some difficulties were discovered recently. When some squatters entered on vacant land belonging to the Manchester Corporation, this court granted an injunction against them, but held that it could not make an order for recovery of possession except in a final judgment: see Manchester Corporation v. Connolly [1970] Ch. 420. And when some squatters occupied houses in Brighton, Stamp J. held that no proceedings could be taken for recovery of possession unless they were named as defendants: see In re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, Ex parte Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association for the South East [1971] Ch. 204. The result was that if the squatters did not give their names, or if one squatter followed another in quick succession, no order for possession could be made. I must confess that I doubt the correctness of that decision. But it does not matter. The position was soon put right by new rules of court. R.S.C., Ord. 113, of the High Court and Ord. 26 in the county court are quite clear. A summons can be issued for possession against squatters even though they cannot be identified by name and even though, as one squatter goes, another comes in. Judgment can be obtained summarily. It is an order that the plaintiffs "do recover" possession. That order can be enforced by a writ of possession immediately. It is an authority under which any one who is squatting on the premises can be turned out at once. There is no provision for giving any time. The court cannot give any time. It must, at the behest of the owner, make an order for recovery of possession. It is then for the owner to give such time as he thinks right to the squatters. They must make their appeal to his goodwill and consideration, and not to the courts. I think that the judgment of Goulding J. in Department of the Environment v. James [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1279 was correct.

3. The position of tenants

I must point out, however, that I have referred so far only to squatters who enter without any colour of title at all. It is different with a tenant who holds over after his term has come to an end or after he has been given notice to quit. His possession was lawful in its inception. Even after the tenancy is determined, he still has possession. If he remains in possession and in occupation, there is high authority for saying that the owner is not entitled to take the law into his own hands and remove the tenant by force. He should go to the court and get an order for possession. Otherwise he is guilty of a criminal offence contrary to the statute of forcible entry: see what was said in Hillary v. Gay (1833) 6 C. & P. 284, per Lord Lyndhurst C.B., Newton v. Harland (1840) 1 Man. & G. 644. He may not be liable to a civil action for damages: see Hemmings v. Stoke Poges Golf Club [1920] 1 K.B. 720. But, nevertheless, his conduct is unlawful and should not be countenanced by the courts of law. Any doubt on this score is nowadays removed by section 32 (1) of the Rent Act 1965, which says that where a tenancy has come to an end but the occupier continues to reside in the premises, it is not lawful for the owner to recover possession otherwise than by proceedings in the court.

Seeing that in the case of a tenancy the owner is not entitled to regain possession himself by his own self-help, and that he is bound to come to the court to recover possession, it follows that the courts are able to fix a date on which possession shall be recovered. At any rate, the House of Lords has proceeded on that assumption (see J. & F. Stone Lighting and Radio Ltd. v. Levitt [1947] A.C. 209, 216); and Parliament has done likewise. Thus in section 138 of the County Courts Act 1888, Parliament said that at the end of a tenancy the judge may order possession to be given "either forthwith or on or before such day as the judge shall think fit to name; . . ." That section was repealed by the County Courts Act 1934 and replaced by a simple provision in section 48 that "A county court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine any action for the recovery of land . . ." But the Act of 1934 was a consolidating Act. It did not alter the previous law. It certainly did not take away the power given by section 138 of the Act of 1888. It proceeded on the assumption that at the end of a tenancy a court has power to fix a date on or before which possession should be given. All the textbook writers, without exception, say that the county court has this power. Likewise in the Protection from Eviction Act 1964, Parliament in section 2 (1) said that when the court made an order for possession by the owner against the occupier:

> ". . . the court may suspend the execution of the order for such period, not exceeding 12 months from the date of the order, as the court thinks reasonable."

That section was repealed by the Rent Act 1965 [section 52 and Schedule 7, Part 1], but Parliament cannot thereby have intended to take away the power of the court at the end of a tenancy to suspend the execution of its order. It simply left intact its previous power.

If the county court has the power at the end of the tenancy to fix a date, then the High Court must have the like power. The County Courts Acts have always provided for the transfer of actions from the county court to the High Court, and vice versa, as for instance sections 49 and 50 of the County Courts Act 1959. It cannot be that, on such a transfer, the High Court has less power than the county court.

In my opinion, therefore, when a tenancy has come to an end, the landlord is not entitled to take possession except by an order of the court: and, on making the order, the court has power to fix a date for possession.

How then is this power to be exercised? It is a matter for the discretion of the court. But, in the ordinary way, where the defendant has no statutory right to remain, the usual order is from four to six weeks: see Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford [1929] 2 K.B. 180 (four weeks); Jones v. Savery [1951] 1 All E.R. 820 (one month); J. & F. Stone Lighting and Radio Ltd. v. Levitt [1947] A.C. 209, 216 (six weeks). A

Thus far I have spoken of tenants whose tenancy has come to an end. The same applies to a servant who is given exclusive occupation during his employment. If it comes to an end, he cannot be turned out except by order of the court: see section 32 (1) of the Rent Act 1965; and on making such an order the court has power to fix a date for possession to be recovered. B

Likewise in the case of a mortgagee who seeks possession of a dwelling-house. The court has power by statute (Administration of Justice Act 1970, s. 36 (2)) to suspend the order. This goes to show that, apart from statute, the court would have no such power. C

4. Conclusion

It follows from what I have said that Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford [1929] 2 K.B. 180; Jones v. Savery [1951] 1 All E.R. 820; and Air Ministry v. Harris [1951] 1 All E.R. 862, were rightly decided. But I am afraid that Chester-le-Street Rural District Council v. Carr, October 30, 1952; Bar Library Transcript No. 414 may have been wrongly decided. The point was not raised or considered. D

My conclusion is that, when the owner of a house comes to the court and asks for an order to recover possession against squatters, the court must give him the order he asks. It has no discretion to suspend the order. But, whilst this is the law, I trust that owners will act with consideration and kindness in the enforcing of it—remembering the plight which the homeless are in. E

ORR L.J. I agree with the judgment delivered by Lord Denning M.R., and would only add that, like him, I cannot regard the decision of this court in Chester-le-Street Rural District Council v. Carr as any authority to the contrary. There is nothing to suggest that the question with which we are here concerned was ever raised in the case, and if it had been, I have no doubt that there would have been both a fuller judgment and a fuller report of the case. F

I too would dismiss these appeals.

G

LAWTON L.J. All these defendants are homeless. They have sought to solve their problems by occupying empty houses belonging to the plaintiffs and squatting in them. Phillips J. in one case and Foster J. in the other have made orders the effect of which is to enable the plaintiffs to recover possession forthwith. The defendants have appealed to this court for a stay of execution. They have not sought to challenge the findings that they were squatters; they have asked for time to find other accommodation. Has the court any jurisdiction to give them time? In my judgment the answer is "No." H

A Putting the problem in these stark terms, and answering it as I have, is but another example of the difficulties and unpleasantness of administering the law as it is without fear or favour to any man. Were I a cadi dispensing justice under a palm tree I might have been able to solve the problems which arise in this case. I might have ordered the plaintiff, Mr. McPhail, to forgo the profits which he seeks to make by converting 4 Thornhill Square, Islington, into flats and the Bristol Corporation to postpone B the demolition of 23 Normandy Road for the purpose of extending the playing fields of a school.

Cadis do not sit in this court. The problem has had to be solved by the application of principle; and in my judgment the solution is to be found in first principles, even though those principles have been encrusted, and partly hidden, by the legal dust of centuries.

C The beginning is to be found in the Middle Ages. The King, as the fountain of justice, had the duty of doing right by all men. The litigant who sought justice had to show that a wrong had been done to him. If he did show this, the king issued a writ to ensure that the wrong complained of was remedied. The equitable jurisdiction of our courts, as all lawyers know, evolved in order to enable the Crown to do justice in those cases in which writs issued under the common law produced only the D appearance of justice. But he who sought equity had to show that the common law proceedings were impinging upon some right or interest which he had.

Over the centuries these concepts of justice became the body of law which was administered by the Court of Chancery until 1873 and which is now administered by this court under the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1925. The law has become complex; but the E fundamentals of that law have not changed.

In my judgment Mr. Harper's erudite argument must be tested against these fundamentals. His researches have established that the Court of Chancery would grant a common injunction in an ejectment. Since common injunctions have been abolished, the same result is obtained nowadays by an order staying proceedings or execution. But on what F basis did the Court of Chancery issue common injunctions in ejectment actions? It could only have been on the basis that the plaintiff in the action for an injunction alleged that he had some equitable right or interest which required protection from the oppression of the common law action. What equitable right or interest has a trespasser? Those who became trespassers by holding over after the expiration of a tenancy or a licence may have been able to conjure up some equitable interest or right. G The 17th and 18th century practitioners showed considerable skill in the invention of legal fictions to establish jurisdiction; and even today in landlord and tenant litigation the lawyer representing the tenant who has had notice to quit can often find a point which will ensure for his client an extension of time. But what equitable right or interest could be conjured up for a squatter, still less for one who had effected a forcible entry? H Most squatters go into possession by, or as a result of, forcible entry. Forcible entry has been a crime since the Forcible Entry Act 1381. In 1391 justices were empowered by statute (15 Ric. 2, c. 2) to arrest those who made forcible entries and put them in gaol. The Forcible Entry Act 1429 made provision for justices to reinstate those who had been kept out of their land by force. These powers were extended by the Forcible Entry Act 1623. All these statutes are still in force: see Reg. v. Mountford [1972] 1 Q.B. 28. Lord Lyndhurst L.C. refused to find any equitable interest in one who had effected a forcible entry. "This court" he said, "will not interfere to support a possession so acquired": see Grafton v. Griffin, 1 Russ. & M. 336, 337.

It follows, in my judgment, that squatters were never able to enlist the aid of the Court of Chancery to resist a writ of possession and they cannot now. The position of tenants and licensees holding over may be different. I have not thought it necessary to consider the jurisdiction of the court to stay execution in such cases.

I would dismiss the appeal.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

* UNIVERSITY OF ESSEX v. DJEMAL AND OTHERS

[1980 E. No. 552]

1980 March 14 — Buckley, Shaw and Brightman L.JJ.

G Practice—Possession of land—Order for possession—Students occupying part of university premises—Summary proceedings for possession of land—Whether order for possession to be limited to area occupied by students—R.S.C., Ord. 113, rr. 1, 2

Students at the plaintiff university occupied part of the university premises and, on February 27, 1980, the university obtained an order for possession which was executed on H March 5. Students then went into occupation of another part of the premises and, by an originating summons issued in accordance with the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 113, the university sought an order for possession of the whole of their premises against the defendants, seven named students and persons unknown. The students vacated the area before the hearing of the summons but threatened further similar action. Walton J. made an order for possession limited to that part of the premises which the students had occupied. The university appealed.

A On the question whether the jurisdiction of the court to make a possession order was limited under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 113 to the area that was occupied in adverse possession to the owner's rights:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that R.S.C., Ord. 113 was a procedural order which did not affect the extent or nature of the court's jurisdiction to grant orders for the possession of land; that the jurisdiction of the court extended to the right of a legal owner to the possession of the whole of his property B uninterfered with by unauthorised persons in adverse possession, but the extent of any order for possession granted depended on the circumstances and, in the present case, since the defendants threatened further adverse possession, an order would be granted, extending to the whole of the university premises, enforceable against the defendants or any person who might be in adverse possession.

Order of Walton J. varied. C

No cases are referred to in the judgments.

The following case was cited in argument:

Evans v. Roe (1820) 4 Moo. C.P. 469.

APPEAL from Walton J. D

By summons of March 3, 1980, the University of Essex sought an order for possession for the whole of the premises against seven defendants, Amber Djemal, Sheila Margaret Jones, James M. Knights, Michael Mullan, Efstathios Nicolaides, Paul Gareth Rickard, Raymond Horne and persons unknown, who were in adverse possession of part of the premises. E

On March 11, 1980, Walton J. granted an order for possession of that part of the premises which had been occupied by a body of students, but refused to make an order in the wide terms sought by the university on the grounds that he had jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 113 to make an order extending only to the parts of the premises identified as being in the possession of the defendants. F

By notice of appeal of March 14, 1980, the university appealed on the ground that the judge erred in law in holding that he had no jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 113 to make an order for possession of premises more extensive than those identified as currently in the occupation of the defendants.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Buckley L.J. G

Hugh Laddie and Martin Howe for the University.

The defendants in person, through Sheila Margaret Jones.

BUCKLEY L.J. This is an appeal from an order made by Walton J. on March 11, 1980; it was an order for possession of part of the premises of the University of Essex, which had been adversely occupied by a body H of students by way of protest about certain matters as to which they considered they had grievances; the judge declined to make the order in as wide terms as the university sought.

The order which was asked for was an order for possession of "the premises at the University of Essex;" that is to say, an order extending to the whole of the university premises. The judge was only prepared to make the order in respect of that part of those premises which was

A actually in the occupation of the protesting students. This appeal is brought to this court upon the ground that the judge was in error in holding that he had no jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 113 to make an order for possession of premises more extensive than those identified as currently in the occupation of the students.

The defendants to the proceedings are seven named undergraduates B of the university and persons unknown, because the university authorities were only able to identify seven of the protesting students, whose number, I gather, was considerably larger than seven; in fact it was perhaps a fluctuating body of students.

The students first went into occupation of part of the administrative offices of the university on February 27, 1980; on February 29, 1980, a possession order was obtained in respect of that part of the university C premises, which was executed on March 5. So the university then recovered possession of that part of their property.

On that same day, March 5, the students occupied another area of what is called Level 6 of part of the university buildings. They were served with a written notice requesting them to leave that area and notifying them that if they failed to do so by 9 o'clock on March 6, the D university would take legal proceedings. They did not vacate that area by the time laid down in that notice, and the originating summons which instituted these proceedings was issued by the university on March 7 against the seven named defendants and other persons unknown.

The matter came before Walton J. first on March 10. At 3 o'clock on that morning, or at about that time, the students had vacated the E area of the university buildings which they had occupied on the second occasion, March 5, so that when the matter came before the court they had already given up adverse possession of that part of the university buildings. But they left behind them a document which is headed "occupation statement," in which they said that the Student Union had been in indefinite occupation for the last ten days and so far the university had made no concessions at all. They then made reference to the matters F about which they thought they had grievances, and at the end of the document they say:

> "If the finance committee fails to agree to these demands then we shall recommend further direct action . . . on Wednesday. Since we have restored possession of the occupied area to the university there will be no need for them to proceed with the action in High Court G this morning."

Not surprisingly, faced with that threat of further action, the university went on with the legal proceedings.

The judge did not hear the case on March 10; he heard it on the following day and he then made an order for possession which was restricted to that part of the university premises which had been occupied H by the students on March 5. It is from that order that the present appeal is brought.

From what we have been told—we have not seen any note of his reasons—the judge seems to have reached his conclusion upon the ground that by implication the jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 113 is restricted to making a possession order limited to the particular area which can be said in the circumstances of the case to be occupied by a person or persons without the licence or consent of the owner. Mr. Laddie, appearing for the university, has contended that Order 113 is an Order which relates to procedural matters only; that it was an Order which was designed to meet the difficulty which arose out of the need for owners of property from time to time to seek to obtain possession against defendants whose identity they could not discover, or the identity of some of whom they could not discover. The Order permits proceedings to be commenced by originating summons and enables the proceedings to be entertained by the court notwithstanding that the identity of the persons in adverse possession cannot be ascertained.

I think that that submission by Mr. Laddie is a justified one. Note 113/1—8/1, The Supreme Court Practice (1979), says:

> "This Order does not provide a new remedy but rather a new procedure for the recovery of possession of land which is in wrongful occupation by trespassers. Its machinery is designed to overcome the apparent shortcomings of the present procedural law in two respects, namely, (a) by providing the procedure for claiming possession of land where not every wrongful occupier can reasonably be identified, the Order overcomes the question whether an order for possession of land can be made and enforced in ex parte proceedings in which no person is named as a defendant . . . or only in proceedings in which at least one person is named as the defendant."

I think the Order is in fact an Order which deals with procedural matters; in my judgment it does not affect in any way the extent or nature of the jurisdiction of the court where the remedy that is sought is a remedy by way of an order for possession. The jurisdiction in question is a jurisdiction directed to protecting the right of the owner of property to the possession of the whole of his property, uninterfered with by unauthorised adverse possession. In my judgment the jurisdiction to make a possession order extends to the whole of the owner's property in respect of which his right of occupation has been interfered with, but the extent of the field of operation of any order for possession which the court may think fit to make will no doubt depend upon the circumstances of the particular case.

In the present case there was, when the matter was before the judge, a threat to take what is described as "further direct action," which presumably meant similar action to the action which had already been taken, action which might be taken in respect of any part of the university property. In those circumstances it would, in my judgment, have been open to the judge to have made an order extending to the whole of the university property, or he might have made an order extending to particular parts, such as the administrative offices, of the university property. In my judgment he was in error in thinking that he was bound, by the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 113, to restrict his order to that particular part of the university property of which the students were then in actual adverse possession. For these reasons, in my judgment, this appeal is one which succeeds.

We have, however, been told by Miss Jones, one of the defendants, who has attended in this court this morning and has spoken as the spokesman of the protesting student body, that the students have decided not to continue this course of so-called direct action because they realise, I think very sensibly, that it is not a policy which will advance their cause in

A relation to the matters about which they want to negotiate with the university. If that is the position, the order which I would make, and which I think it was open to the judge to have made when the matter was before him, namely, a possession order extending to the whole property of the university and enforceable against the defendants or any other person who might be in unauthorised adverse possession of any part of B the university property, will not in fact incommode the students in any way because, through Miss Jones, they disavow any intention to pursue that policy in the future.

I would allow this appeal and make an order in the wide terms that I have indicated.

C SHAW L.J. I agree. It seems to me also that on its true construction R.S.C., Ord. 113 relates to procedure only and not to the form of redress which the court has jurisdiction to afford in appropriate cases.

The title to the site and building of the University of Essex is vested in the university, which has been incorporated for some years by Royal Charter. Its right of possession seems to me to be indivisible. If it is violated by adverse occupation of any part of the premises, that violation D affects the right of possession of the whole of the premises. It follows that those circumstances would in general justify an order in the terms prayed in the originating summons, namely, ". . . that they do recover possession of the premises at the University of Essex, Wivenhoe Park, Colchester in the County of Essex," without any geographic limitation.

I agree, however, that there may be cases where there is no danger of E actual violation of many, or a succession of, parts of the premises. The order might then be limited in appropriate terms. I do not think that this is such a case.

I would therefore allow the appeal and make an order in the terms proposed by Buckley L.J.

F BRIGHTMAN L.J. For the reasons that have been given by Buckley L.J., I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

WINDER . . . . RESPONDENT

B 1984 March 14, 15, 16; 29 Ackner, Robert Goff and Parker L.JJ.

1984 Oct. 30, 31; Nov. 1; 29 Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, Lord Scarman, Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Roskill and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook

C Judicial Review—Public authority—Housing authority—Resolution to increase rents—Tenant refusing to pay increase—Authority's action for possession—Defence raising validity of resolution—Whether defence to be struck out as abuse of process of court—Whether judicial review appropriate remedy—R.S.C., Ord. 53

D The defendant occupied a flat let by the council on a secure weekly tenancy. By two resolutions in 1981 and 1982, the council, pursuant to their powers under the Housing Act 1957, resolved to increase rents and served the defendant with two notices of increase of rent. On both occasions the defendant considered the increases excessive and refused to pay the increase while continuing to pay his original rent. The council brought proceedings in the county court claiming arrears of rent and possession of the flat. By his defence, the defendant contended that he was not liable to pay the arrears because the resolutions and notices of increase were ultra vires and void and E counterclaimed a declaration that each notice of increase was ultra vires and void. The council applied to strike out the defence and counterclaim as an abuse of the process of the court. The registrar refused the application but the judge allowed the council's appeal holding that it was an abuse of process and contrary to public policy to challenge the conduct of a public authority other than by application for judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53, whether the challenge was F brought by initiating an action or by a defence. On appeal by the defendant, the Court of Appeal (by a majority) allowed the appeal.

On appeal by the council:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that it was a paramount principle that the private citizen's recourse to the courts for the determination of his rights was not to be excluded except by G clear words and that there was nothing in the language of R.S.C., Ord. 53 which could be taken as abolishing a citizen's right to challenge the decision of a local authority in the course of defending an action of the present nature, nor did section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 which referred only to an "application" for judicial review have the effect of limiting a defendant's rights sub silentio (post, pp. 509G—510B, C–F).

Dictum of Viscount Simonds in Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. H Ministry of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260, 286, H.L.(E.) applied.

O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, H.L.(E.) and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, H.L.(E.) distinguished.

Per curiam. It would be a very strange use of language to describe the defendant's behaviour in relation to the proceedings brought against him as an abuse or misuse of the process of the court, for he did not select the procedure to be adopted and was merely seeking to defend the present proceedings brought against him on the ground that he was not liable for the whole sum claimed. Moreover, he put forward his defence as a matter of right, whereas in an application for judicial review, success would require an exercise of the court's discretion in his favour (post, p. 509E–F).

APPEAL from Judge White sitting at Wandsworth County Court.

Wandsworth London Borough Council claimed possession of a council flat, 25, Wheatley House, Tangley Grove, London S.W.15, on the ground that the defendant, Paul Winder, who was the secure tenant of those premises, had failed to pay the rent lawfully due. The defendant filed a defence and counterclaim alleging that the council's decision to make certain rent increases were ultra vires (see paragraphs 5 and 6, post, pp. 466D—467B). The council applied to strike out the defence and counterclaim on the ground, inter alia, that it was an abuse of the process of the court. On 2 March 1983 the registrar refused the application but on the council's appeal, Judge White, on 15 November 1983, ordered, inter alia, that paragraphs 5 and 6 of the defence and the whole of the counterclaim be struck out as an abuse of the process of the court.

By an amended notice of appeal, the defendant appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) the judge had erred and misdirected himself as to the law in holding that the decisions of the House of Lords in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 had any effect in restricting rights of defence and that they could and should be applied to prevent a defendant pursuing a defence available to him which showed a basis in law why the council's claim should not succeed, such as a defence that a sum sued for was not lawfully or properly due; (2) the judge misdirected himself in law in failing to hold that the defendant by paragraphs 5 and 6 of his defence was relying upon private law rights and that his right to rely upon them against a public authority whether by way of a defence or

A counterclaim or by action was not in any way affected by the decisions in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286; (3) the decision of the judge was wrong in that it imposed by way of the control of the court over its own procedures a special period of limitation to protect public authorities when the legislature had by section 1 of the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions) Act 1954 removed such a special period and made the ordinary B limitation periods apply to proceedings against public authorities; (4) the judge should have held that any public law element in the defendant's defences and/or the declaration sought by the defendant's counterclaim to be collateral to a private dispute and therefore appropriate to be pursued in an ordinary action consistently with R.S.C., Ord. 53 and the speeches in the House of Lords; (5) the challenge to the council's C increase in the defendant's rent raised was one to the decision itself and not to the process by which it was arrived at and was accordingly not a matter which could be canvassed in proceedings for judicial review.

The facts are stated in the judgments.

John Matthew Bowyer for the defendant.
Geoffrey Stephenson for the council.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 29. The following judgments were read.

ACKNER L.J. Some years ago (we do not know the precise date and E it is of no consequence) Wandsworth London Borough Council, the respondents to this appeal, let one of their council flats, 25, Wheatley House, Tangley Grove, S.W.15, on a weekly tenancy to Mr. Winder, the defendant. The rent as at 1980 was £12·06 per week, although whether this was the original rent we again do not know. The figures may indicate this to be unlikely. This tenancy was granted by the council F pursuant to their powers to provide housing accommodation under Part V of the Housing Act 1957. It is provided by section 113(1A) (as added by the Housing Rents and Subsidies Act 1975, section 1(2)) that a local authority shall from time to time review rents and make such changes, either of rents generally or of particular rents, as circumstances may require. In pursuance of this statutory obligation, the council in 1981 resolved to increase the rents of the accommodation which they provided, G and on 2 March 1981 served the defendant with a notice of increase of rent purporting to increase his rent to £16·56 with effect from 6 April 1981. The defendant objected to that increase because he considered it excessive and continued to pay the original rent. Arrears accumulated, but no action was taken for the time being by the council, although correspondence did pass.

H The following year there was a further resolution by the council and a further notice of increase of rent, dated 1 March 1982, was served on the defendant purporting to increase his rent to £18·53 as from 5 April 1982. Again he refused to pay the increase. A notice seeking possession was eventually served on him on 21 May 1982, followed by a claim in the Wandsworth County Court filed on 16 August 1982 claiming possession. The defendant being a secure tenant, the claim was made under ground 1 of Schedule 4 to the Housing Act 1980, namely, that the defendant had failed to pay the rent lawfully due. The arrears claimed amounted to nearly £700.

A

Initially no defence was filed and the claim came on for hearing before Judge Coplestone-Boughey on 20 October 1982. The defendant was then represented and an adjournment was sought in order that he might contend "that the rent exceeds the limit in the Housing Finance Act." The defendant had brought to court the money which was alleged to be owing to the council. The adjournment sought was granted, conditional upon payment of the moneys into court, and directions were given as to the filing of a defence. The defence, together with a counterclaim for a declaration, was filed on 11 January 1983. We are concerned, as was the registrar and the judge, with paragraphs 5 and 6 of the defence, since, although the figures are challenged, that issue is essentially one of mathematics and well capable of being resolved by the parties.

C

The defence

The precise nature of the defence is of first importance, and I accordingly quote paragraphs 5 and 6:

"5. By a notice of increase of rent dated March 1981 the plaintiffs purported to increase the weekly net rent payable to them by the defendant in respect of his said dwelling house from £12·06 to £16·56 with effect from 6 April 1981. By a further notice of increase of rent dated 1 March 1982 the plaintiffs purported further to increase the said rent from £16·56 to £18·53 with effect from 5 April 1982.

"6. The plaintiffs' decision to make each of the said increases was ultra vires and void and each of the said notices was likewise ultra vires and void in that in breach of section 111 of the Housing Act 1957 the resulting rents were not reasonable charges for the defendant's tenancy or for his occupation of the said dwelling house and the plaintiffs in exercising their discretion to determine the amount of the rent failed lawfully to exercise the same so as to arrive at a charge which was reasonable.

"Particulars of breach of section 111 and failure lawfully to exercise discretion

G

"(i) As to each of the said increases the plaintiffs failed in considering how the financial burden of the provision of council housing should be distributed between its ratepayers and its tenants to take into account (alternatively to take sufficient account of) the relative means of their ratepayers as a group and their tenants as a group.

H

"(ii) As to the first notice effective from 6 April 1981 the £4·50 increase and the decision to make that increase such increase was a substantially higher increase than the said rent from the said date than a private landlord could have then made in respect of a

A regulated tenancy of the said dwelling house by a notice given on or about 2 March 1981 in that it effected an increase to a rent higher than a rent officer would have registered as the fair rent and or an increase which would have had to have been phased under the provisions of section 55 of and Schedule 8 to the Rent Act 1977 as amended. The amount and pace of the increase was thus in excess of what Parliament considered appropriate for such premises.

B "(iii) As to the second notice and the decision to make the increase it purports to make, they were misconceived because they were based upon the purported earlier increase by the first notice which was itself for the reasons set out above ultra vires and void."

The defendant added a counterclaim in which he repeated his defence and claimed a declaration that the notices of increase of rent were ultra C vires and void and of no effect.

The application to strike out

When the council received the defence and counterclaim they applied to have them struck out on the ground that they were an abuse of the process of the court. In making this application they relied essentially on D the recent decision of the House of Lords in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237. It is convenient at this stage to quote a short passage from the speech of Lord Diplock, who gave the only speech and which was concurred in by all the other members of the Appellate Committee, at p. 285:

"Now that those disadvantages to applicants have been removed E and all remedies for infringements of rights protected by public law can be obtained upon an application for judicial review, as can also remedies for infringements of rights under private law if such infringements should also be involved, it would in my view as a general rule be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was F entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of an ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities."

The counter-submission made by Mr. Bowyer on behalf of the defendant, was that the O'Reilly decision only dealt with the initiation of proceedings and the rule of public policy which it declared does not G apply to a defendant wishing to raise a defence involving a matter of public law. The registrar accepted Mr. Bowyer's submission, but Judge White held that there was no distinction to be drawn between the raising of an issue of public law by way of a claim or by way of a defence, and accordingly there was no significance in the fact that the O'Reilly case was concerned with the commencement rather than the defence of H proceedings. He therefore rejected Mr. Bowyer's submission; hence this appeal.

The defendant's challenge

The defendant's contract of tenancy clearly gave him certain private law rights against the council. Mr. Bowyer submits that by his defence he is setting up private law rights. I do not agree. He is not contending that the council are limited to charging him the original contractual rent. He is not claiming that they have no power to increase that rent. On the contrary, he accepts that the council have the statutory right to increase his rent. His client's complaint is that the council have exceeded their statutory powers in resolving to increase his rent by so great a sum. It is the quantum of the increase to which he objects and not the right and obligation to make an increase. Although the defence alleges a breach of section 111 of the Housing Act 1957, the true basis of the defence is that circumstances did not reasonably require the rent to be increased to the extent to which the council resolved: see section 113(1A). This is the only foundation of the defendant's contention that the notices of increase of rent were ultra vires and therefore void and of no effect. This is the defendant's answer, both to the claim for the arrears of rent and to the claim for possession. He has put forward no other defence. Of course the judge has a residual discretion as to whether or not to make an order for possession, given that the council establish that the defendant has failed to pay rent lawfully due: see section 34(3)(a) of the Housing Act 1980. No point has been raised as to this. The defendant is accordingly not setting up any private law right. The reference in paragraph 1 of the defence to his tenancy is an introductory averment which gives rise to no issue or contest in this case. He is attacking the two resolutions by the council to increase the rents. These resolutions were resolutions of a statutory body, pursuant to their statutory powers and duties, applicable to the rents of all or a particular category of council tenants, and affected the rights and liabilities of their ratepayers. The defendant is thus clearly challenging a decision made by a public body, performing its public functions in a field of public law. That is the limit of his challenge.

If I am wrong and the defendant is setting up some private law right, this cannot affect the reality of the situation—that the essence of the dispute is the validity of the notices. The result is then that the direct issue of public law arises merely at one remove and this is of no significance: see Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 referred to later, where the private law right set up was a right claimed under statute and the O'Reilly rule [1983] 2 A.C. 237 was nevertheless applied.

Mr. Bowyer rightly conceded in the court below that had the defendant sought to make his challenge by way of claim rather than by way of defence and had he done so by way of a claim in an ordinary action, the court would have struck the claim out as an abuse of its process, applying the principle laid down in O'Reilly's case.

Does the principle of public policy declared in O'Reilly's case apply where the challenge is made by way of defence and not by the initiation of proceedings?

In order to consider the breadth of the public policy declared in O'Reilly's case, I think it is helpful, before considering in more detail

A the speech of Lord Diplock, to see how that case was dealt with in the Court of Appeal. I was a member of that Court of Appeal, and, whilst in agreement with Lord Denning M.R., that the only proper method of attacking a decision of a board of visitors was by certiorari, I was not prepared to go further and hold that declarations against public authorities when exercising their public law functions can only be obtained by application for judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53. I B accepted that by reason of the radical procedural reforms in the supervisory jurisdiction of the court and the safeguards against abuse built into Order 53, where the conduct of a public authority was to be challenged, then as a general rule it was more appropriate that it be done by a process of judicial review and not by way of action. I expressed the view which Mr. Bowyer thought relevant to quote to us C [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 264–265:

> "If Parliament had desired that by reason of the reforms contained in R.S.C., Ord. 53 the remedy by way of judicial review should exclude the pre-existing remedy by way of an action for declaratory relief to control the exercise of administrative power, it could have simply so provided in the recent Supreme Court Act 1981. It would, D however, have been somewhat of a surprise if it had done so, in view of the contrary recommendation made in 1976 by the Law Commission, who were responsible for the production of the new R.S.C., Ord. 53."

I went on to quote section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and concluded that I could not construe that section as providing that E declarations against public authorities when exercising their public law functions can only be obtained by application for judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53. O'Connor L.J., at p. 267, was also not prepared to accede to the submission, "that judicial review is the only way in which decisions of administrative tribunals can be challenged." Lord Denning M.R. took the contrary view. He said, at p. 256:

> F "Now that judicial review is available to give every kind of remedy, I think it should be the normal recourse in all cases of public law where a private person is challenging the conduct of a public authority or a public body, or of anyone acting in the exercise of a public duty."

If the view of Lord Denning M.R. is correct, then there is no G justification for differentiating between a challenge by way of the initiation of an action, as opposed to a challenge by a defence. Both are covered by the principle. The question then arises: does Lord Diplock's speech and the two subsequent decisions of the House of Lords (Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 and Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262) expressly or by necessary implication decide that a challenge by way of defence to a claim by a public H authority to enforce its decision in a field of public law amounts to an abuse of the process of the court?

The following factors appear to me to suggest an affirmative answer to the question.

1. The decision in the O'Reilly case [1983] 2 A.C. 237 makes it clear that O'Connor L.J. and I should have gone further than we did. The speech of Lord Diplock does not suggest that Lord Denning M.R. went too far.

2. In commenting on the fact that neither R.S.C., Ord. 53 nor section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 expressly provide that the procedure by application for judicial review shall be the exclusive procedure available by which the remedy of a declaration or injunction may be obtained for the infringement of rights that are entitled to protection under public law, Lord Diplock observed, at pp. 284H–285A:

> "There is great variation between individual cases that fall within Order 53 and the Rules Committee and subsequently the legislature were, I think, for this reason content to rely upon the express and the inherent power of the High Court, exercised upon a case to case basis, to prevent abuse of its process whatever might be the form taken by that abuse." (Emphasis added).

3. The public policy requirement declared by Lord Diplock (to which I made reference in my first quotation from his speech earlier in this judgment) is surely, when expressed in positive terms, that "a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringes rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law must proceed by an application for an order for judicial review under Order 53." If this is a correct statement of the principle, there is no warrant for distinguishing between the methods adopted to establish the infringement.

4. In Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 the House of Lords applied the O'Reilly principle to a case where the plaintiff claimed a declaration that the council owed, and was in breach of its duty to house him permanently, under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. Lord Bridge of Harwich posed the question (which he subsequently answered in the affirmative) in this way, at p. 294:

> "Does the same general rule apply, where the decision of the public authority which the litigant wishes to overturn is not one alleged to infringe any existing right . . .?"

This does not suggest that the principle does not apply to all forms of challenge to the decision.

5. In Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262, the plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants alleging that he had refrained from appealing against an enforcement notice as a result of negligent advice given to him by the defendants. The House of Lords held that this claim was an ordinary action in tort which did not raise any issue of public law as a live issue, and accordingly it did not apply the O'Reilly principle. In his speech Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, with whose speech Lord Roskill, Lord Brandon and Lord Brightman agreed, used this expression, at p. 274: "In the present case, on the other hand, the respondent does not impugn or wish to overturn the enforcement notice." Again, these words seem of general application.

6. The justification for the public policy, as declared in the O'Reilly decision, was based upon the following propositions. (a):

A "The public interest in good administration requires that public authorities and third parties should not be kept in suspense as to the legal validity of a decision the authority has reached in purported exercise of decision-making powers for any longer period than is absolutely necessary in fairness to the person affected by the decision:" see [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 280–281.

B (b) The new Order 53 has drastically ameliorated the position of applicants for judicial review, removing the previous disadvantages. Order 53 contained procedural restrictions imposed in the public interest to protect public authorities "against groundless, unmeritorious or tardy harassment . . ." (p. 284D).

These considerations apply irrespective of the manner in which the C challenge is made, be it by initiating an action, or by raising a defence. As Mr. Geoffrey Stephenson pointed out in his able address, if the distinction is a valid one, and if public policy does not make it an abuse of the process of the court to raise the challenge by way of defence, then why should not an applicant who has failed to get leave to apply for judicial review because of the tardiness of his application, not then wait to be sued and then raise the challenge by way of defence? As he D aptly points out, if the defendant's contention is correct, then presumably Mr. Cocks, having failed to obtain leave to bring proceedings under Order 53 for a declaration that the council owed him a duty to house him permanently, could have remained in his temporary accommodation and defended the subsequent possession proceedings by raising the very challenge for which he failed to get his leave to raise under Order 53. E To accept that the above conduct would not be an abuse of the process of the court would be to nullify the very decision of the House of Lords in the O'Reilly case.

As against the above considerations, Mr. Bowyer relies strongly on the following observations made by Lord Wilberforce in Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262, 271–277:

F "The principle remains intact that public authorities and public servants are, unless clearly exempted, answerable in the ordinary courts for wrongs done to individuals. But by an extension of remedies and a flexible procedure it can be said that something resembling a system of public law is being developed. Before the expression 'public law' can be used to deny a subject a right of action in the court of his choice it must be related to a positive G prescription of law, by statute or by statutory rules. We have not yet reached the point at which mere characterisation of a claim as a claim in public law is sufficient to exclude it from consideration by the ordinary courts: to permit this would be to create a dual system of law with the rigidity and procedural hardship for plaintiffs which it was the purpose of the recent reforms to remove.

H "The relevant statute to the present case is the Supreme Court Act 1981, section 31, and the relevant statutory rules those contained in R.S.C., Ord. 53 dating from 1977. These lay down the conditions under the procedure by which the courts can be asked to review the actions or omissions of (inter alia) statutory bodies, persons acting under statute, and inferior courts. Before a proceeding at common law can be said to be an abuse of process, it must, at least, be shown (1) that the claim in question could be brought by way of judicial review (2) that it should be brought by way of judicial review.

"O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 illustrates this in the clearest manner, and goes no distance towards supporting the appellants' case in this appeal. It was not contested there that the appellants, seeking directly to attack the board's decisions, would have had a remedy by way of judicial review (p. 274C): indeed, as I understand the case, they would not have had a remedy in private law at all. The only question, which my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock was able to put in a single sentence (pp. 274H–275A), was whether it was an abuse of process to apply for declarations by using the procedure laid down in proceedings begun by writ or originating summons instead of using the procedure laid down by R.S.C., Ord. 53. It was decided that it would be such an abuse of process. The statements of law laid down in the single opinion must be related to that issue, the foundation of which was that the claims in question could have been brought by way of judicial review. Even when this requirement was satisfied, Lord Diplock was careful to make it clear that he was stating no universal rule that such claims could only be brought by this procedure: see pp. 284H-285A. And he expressly stated that though there should be a general rule of public policy against permitting a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights as to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of ordinary action, there might be exceptions, particularly where the invalidity of the decision arises as a collateral issue in a claim for infringement of a right of the plaintiff arising under private law, and in other instances on a case to case basis. (The contemporaneous case of Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 may be regarded as one where a direct issue of public law arose at one remove.)

"It is indeed plain enough that issues which could be characterised as issues of 'public law' may arise in a number of contexts besides those where an attack upon, or review of, actions or omissions of public bodies is involved—cases, for example, where the invalidity of such action is set up by way of defence, or where the validity of such action arises collaterally in actions against third parties. The Law Commission in its recommendations of 1971 suggested that the procedure of judicial review should cover such cases, but this suggestion was not accepted and the reforms of 1977–1981 were of a more limited character. So we must judge a contention of 'abuse of process' according to normal principle."

He later said, at p. 278:

"Order 53 does not state that the procedure which it authorised was the only procedure which could be followed in cases where it applied. (In this it followed the recommendation of the Law

A Commission.) So prima facie the rule applies that the plaintiff may choose the court and the procedure which suits him best."

Having regard to the view which I ventured to express in the Court of Appeal in O'Reilly's case, I must confess that I was tempted by these observations to adopt a strongly restrictive approach to the O'Reilly decision, but I am satisfied that I must resist so doing. Lord Roskill, B Lord Brandon and Lord Brightman expressly adopted the reasons of Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, who expressed no reservations as to the O'Reilly principle for dismissing the appeal and not those of Lord Wilberforce. To my mind, to confine the rule of public policy to challenges made by way of an ordinary action and to exclude those challenges made by defence is to strike at the very basis of the public policy rule itself, and inevitably create wholly unacceptable anomalies. C That this rule of public policy may on occasions have the effect that persons will lose their entitlement hitherto enjoyed of impugning a public authority's decision because of the time restraints incorporated in the judicial review procedure, was fully recognised by Lord Diplock in his speech [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 283F:

"Failing such challenge within the applicable time limit, public D policy, expressed in the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta, requires that after the expiry of the time limit it should be given all the effects in law of a valid decision."

Of course the court retains a general discretion to grant leave notwithstanding that the application is out of time. That those same time restraints should have similar effect where the challenge is made by E defence, seems to me to be inevitable.

Finally, I should add that I see no substance in Mr. Bowyer's complaint that to apply the O'Reilly public policy rule would give rise to multiplicity of proceedings. If the proper course is to apply under Order 53, there should be no need for the initiation of an action by the local authority and thus the necessity for the entry of a defence. However, in F the unusual situation where a defence has to be entered, the action is then simply stayed pending the outcome of the judicial review. If they fail, then there is no defence to the claim; if they succeed then the claim fails and the only issue that may arise is if, unlike this case, there is a counterclaim to recover money already paid.

In my judgment, the principle of public policy, as decided in the O'Reilly case, constrains me to decide that the challenge by the G defendant of the council's decision to increase his rent by the entry of a defence to the claim, is an abuse of the process of the court. The judge was accordingly right to strike out both the defence and counterclaim, and stay the action to give the defendant the opportunity to apply for leave to apply for judicial review. The defendant has made such an application and it has been refused. I accordingly would dismiss this H appeal.

ROBERT GOFF L.J. The judge ordered that paragraphs 5 and 6 of the defendant's defence and the whole of his counterclaim be struck out as an abuse of the process of the court, though, as I understand it, at the same time he ordered that the council's action be stayed to enable the defendant to apply under R.S.C., Ord. 53 for leave to apply for judicial review of the council's increases in rent referred to in the counterclaim. The central passage in the judge's careful judgment reads:

> "I have come to the conclusion that in the interests of a consistent public policy the general rule should be applied in the circumstances of this case. If it is an abuse of the procedure of the court to avoid the safeguards of Order 53 by challenging a public law decision by claim in an ordinary action it must equally be an abuse to seek to make a similar challenge by way of defence or counterclaim to such an action provided that the court procedure can provide the defendant with an opportunity to raise the issue in an appropriate way by a stay of the claim against him. To hold otherwise would be to allow a coach and horses through the policy which the constraints of Order 53 are designed to promote. Further, the resulting position would be unacceptably anomalous. A tenant who wanted to challenge a rent increase decision of the plaintiffs but sat back and waited to be sued would be at an advantage over a tenant who, acting timeously, challenged by way of Order 53. The challenge of both tenants and the public law issue before the courts would be the same but the former would avoid the procedural safeguards that would confront the latter. It would bring the procedures of the court into disrepute."

This passage reveals (as do other passages in the judgment) that the judge was being invited to draw a distinction between claims and defences and to hold that, whereas a claim in which a public law decision is challenged must be made by way of an application for judicial review, nevertheless a defence which raises such a challenge does not require any such application to be made. The same argument was advanced before this court (among others) by Mr. Bowyer for the defendant. For me, however, the solution to the problem in the present case does not lie in drawing any such distinction; indeed, I suspect that emphasis upon that distinction in argument before him may have diverted the attention of the judge from the central issue in the case.

In the present case the council are claiming possession of a council flat which has been occupied by the defendant under a secure weekly tenancy. They are claiming possession on the ground of non-payment of rent, which falls within ground 1 of Schedule 4 to the Housing Act 1980. They are also claiming arrears of rent in the sum of £696·03. The defendant's case, as revealed in his defence and counterclaim, is that he is not in arrears with his rent, and so the council are not entitled to possession. At the heart of the dispute lies the defendant's challenge to the vires of the decisions by the council authorising two notices of increase of rent dated, respectively, 2 March 1981 and 1 March 1982, by which the council purported to increase the defendant's weekly rent, first, from £12·06 to £16·56, and then from £16·56 to £18·53. The defendant's case is therefore that he has never been under any obligation to pay more than the previously established rent of £12·03 per week.

A Two observations can be made about the issues in the case. The first is that the central issue in the case relates to the validity of decisions made by a public authority; and that the validity of those decisions affects not only the defendant but many, if not most, of those who live in the Borough of Wandsworth, either in their capacity as ratepayers or in their capacity as tenants of the council. The second is that a decision on the issue in the case will affect the defendant's private law rights, B both with regard to his occupation of the council flat and with regard to his liability to pay rent. These two matters lie at the heart of the arguments in the case. The argument of the council has been that public policy requires any challenge to a decision of a public authority, such as the council's decisions to increase rents of council houses and flats in the borough, to be made by application for judicial review; and indeed that C the House of Lords so decided in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237. It makes no difference, submitted Mr. Stephenson for the council, that the action has been launched not by the defendant but by the council, and that a decision in the action may affect the defendant's private law rights, for the public interest in good administration is so strong that every challenge to a decision of a public authority must be made within the confines of the procedure established by Order 53, D including (subject to the court's power to extend the time) the requirement that an application for judicial review must be made within three months from the date when grounds for the application first arose: see Ord. 53, r. 4(1). At the bottom of the defendant's submissions, however, lies the argument that his private law rights cannot be affected by the procedural changes brought into effect by Order 53, even though E those changes have now been given the blessing of Parliament by section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981.

In considering how to resolve this conflict between public interest and private right, I turn first for guidance to the decision of the House of Lords in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237. Now it is plain that that case was not concerned with private law rights. The four plaintiffs in the case (the appellants before the House of Lords) were inmates in F Hull Prison; they brought actions alleging that the board of visitors had acted in breach of the prison rules and of the rules of natural justice, and they claimed a declaration that a disciplinary award by the board of forfeiture of remission of sentence in respect of each of the plaintiffs was therefore null and void. It was however conceded that no claim would lie against members of the board for damages at the suit of the plaintiffs; indeed, Lord Diplock stressed, at p. 275, that an award of forfeiture of G remission did not infringe any right derived from private law, remission being not a matter of right but of indulgence. So the case was decided on the basis that the plaintiffs' sole remedy was to challenge the validity of the board's decision. It follows that the council cannot find authority for their argument in the ratio decidendi of O'Reilly v. Mackman. It is necessary therefore to examine the principle underlying the decision in H that case with some care, to ascertain whether it extends, or should be extended, to give authority to the council's argument.

In his speech (with which the other members of the Appellate Committee agreed) Lord Diplock stated the question for the House to be as follows [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 274–275:

"Put in a single sentence the question for your Lordships is: whether in 1980 after R.S.C., Ord. 53 in its new form, adopted in 1977, had come into operation it was an abuse of the process of the court to apply for such declarations [i.e., declarations of nullity] by using the procedure laid down in the Rules for proceedings begun by writ or by originating summons instead of using the procedure laid down by Ord. 53 for an application for judicial review of the awards of forfeiture of remission of sentence made against them by the board which the appellants are seeking to impugn?"

In so stating the question, Lord Diplock focused upon the fact that the alleged abuse of process in the case lay in the plaintiffs' action in invoking the procedure of issuing a writ or (in one case) an originating summons claiming declaratory relief. He therefore proceeded immediately to point out, not only that such relief is discretionary, but also that there was no question of the plaintiffs' private law rights being affected by the award which the plaintiffs sought to impugn. Furthermore, having reviewed the development of public law in this country and the emergence of the new procedure for judicial review in the present Order 53, Lord Diplock summarised the effect of Order 53, at pp. 283–284:

"So Order 53 since 1977 has provided a procedure by which every type of remedy for infringement of the rights of individuals that are entitled to protection in public law can be obtained in one and the same proceeding by way of an application for judicial review, and whichever remedy is found to be the most appropriate in the light of what has emerged upon the hearing of the application, can be granted to him. If what should emerge is that his complaint is not of an infringement of any of his rights that are entitled to protection in public law, but may be an infringement of his rights in private law and thus not a proper subject for judicial review, the court has power under rule 9(5), instead of refusing the application, to order the proceedings to continue as if they had begun by writ."

He then drew attention to the fact that the plaintiffs, by adopting the procedure of an action begun by writ or by originating summons instead of an application for judicial review under Order 53, had been able to evade:

F

"those protections against groundless, unmeritorious or tardy harassment that were afforded to statutory tribunals or decision making public authorities by Order 53:" see p. 284.

G

His conclusion was that, following the removal of disadvantages (particularly in relation to discovery) which were manifestly unfair to applicants under the procedure relating to applications for prerogative orders, the general rule should be, at p. 285:

"Now that those disadvantages to applicants have been removed and all remedies for infringements of rights protected by public law can be obtained upon an application for judicial review, as can also remedies for infringements of rights under private law if such infringements should also be involved, it would in my view as a

A general rule be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of an ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities."

B He then recognised that there might be exceptions to this general rule at p. 285:

"particularly where the invalidity of the decision arises as a collateral issue in a claim for infringement of a right of the plaintiff arising under private law, or where none of the parties objects to the adoption of the procedure by writ or originating summons."

It is right to observe that in his statement of the general rule Lord Diplock referred to the fact that remedies for infringements of rights under private law can be obtained upon an application for judicial review, if such infringements should also be involved. But the House of Lords did not in O'Reilly v. Mackman address itself to the question whether a citizen's right to invoke the ordinary procedure of the courts D to enforce, or to invoke the protection of, his private law rights should in any way be affected by the principle enunciated in that case. Indeed, in relation to certain earlier cases in which the House of Lords expressly approved actions by declarations of nullity as alternative to applications for certiorari to quash, Lord Diplock referred to the fact that those cases were concerned with private law rights: see his reference, at E p. 281, to Vine v. National Dock Labour Board [1957] A.C. 488, Ridge v. Baldwin [1964] A.C. 40 and Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. Ministry of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260.

It is true that in the case which the House of Lords decided on the same day, immediately after O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, viz. Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, the House of Lords applied the principle in O'Reilly v. Mackman in circumstances F where private law rights of the plaintiff were relevant, though in a very limited sense. In that case the plaintiff (the respondent before the House of Lords) claimed a declaration that the defendant council was in breach of its duties under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 in failing to provide both temporary and permanent accommodation, and he also claimed a mandatory injunction and damages. The House of Lords held G that such proceeding constituted an abuse of the process of the court, because the plaintiff should have proceeded by way of an application for judicial review. Lord Bridge of Harwich (with whose speech the remainder of the Appellate Committee agreed) analysed the functions of housing committees under the Act. He concluded his analysis, at pp. 292–293:

H "Once a decision has been reached by the housing authority which gives rise to the temporary, the limited or the full housing duty, rights and obligations are immediately created in the field of private law. Each of the duties referred to, once established, is capable of being enforced by injunction and the breach of it will give rise to a > liability in damages. But it is inherent in the scheme of the Act that an appropriate public law decision of the housing authority is a condition precedent to the establishment of the private law duty."

Then, after reviewing certain earlier authorities, he quoted the general rule stated by Lord Diplock in O'Reilly v. Mackman and posed the following question, at p. 294:

> "Does the same general rule apply, where the decision of the public authority which the litigant wishes to overturn is not one alleged to infringe any existing right but a decision which, being adverse to him, prevents him establishing a necessary condition precedent to the statutory private law right which he seeks to enforce?"

He concluded that the general rule should apply in such a case. He said:

> "The safeguards built into the Order 53 procedure which protect from harassment public authorities on whom Parliament has imposed a duty to make public law decisions and the inherent advantages of that procedure over proceedings begun by writ or originating summons for the purposes of investigating whether such decisions are open to challenge are of no less importance in relation to this type of decision than to the type of decision your Lordships have just been considering in O'Reilly v. Mackman."

Now it is to be observed that, although Lord Bridge of Harwich founded his conclusion upon the need for such safeguards in cases of the kind which he described, he so formulated his question as to limit it to cases where the relevant decision was not one alleged to infringe any existing right of the litigant. The decision with which Cocks v. Thanet District Council was concerned did not affect private law rights; it was a decision which, taking the form it did, had the result that there did not come into existence certain private law rights which would have come into existence had the decision been different.

That is not the present case now before this court. Here the defendant is relying upon his pre-existing private law rights arising from his occupation of his council flat and from the previously established rent. His challenge to the decisions of the council is not a challenge to decisions which gave rise to those rights: he says, rather, that his pre-existing rights continue unaffected by the decisions which he challenges, which he contends were ultra vires and so void. So the ratio decidendi of the decision of the House of Lords in Cocks v. Thanet District Council provides no authority for the council's argument in the present case.

Nor, in my judgment, does the decision of the House of Lords in Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262 provide any such authority. In that case the plaintiff (the respondent before the House of Lords), upon whom an enforcement notice had been served by the defendant council, issued a writ claiming an injunction restraining the defendants from implementing the notice, damages for negligence arising from negligent advice alleged to have been given to him by officers of the defendants, and an order that the notice be set aside. The defendants applied to have the writ and statement of claim struck out as an abuse

A of the process of the court. The Court of Appeal ordered that the first and third of the plaintiff's claims be struck out on the principle in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 but declined to strike out the claim for damages for negligence. The defendants appealed to the House of Lords against the refusal of the Court of Appeal to strike out that claim; but the House affirmed their decision. The leading speech was delivered by Lord Fraser of Tullybelton. It appears from his speech B (with which three of their Lordships agreed) that he, like the Court of Appeal, did not regard the plaintiff's claim in negligence as giving rise to a challenge to the enforcement notice. In the Court of Appeal Fox L.J. said, in a passage quoted by Lord Fraser of Tullybelton [1984] A.C. 262, 273:

> "'The claim, in my opinion, is concerned with the alleged C infringement of the plaintiff's rights at common law. Those rights are not even peripheral to a public law claim. They are the essence of the entire claim, so far as negligence is concerned.'"

With that opinion Lord Fraser of Tullybelton expressly agreed. He further said, at p. 274:

> D "In the present case . . . the respondent does not inpugn or wish to overturn the enforcement notice. His whole case on negligence depends on the fact that he has lost his chance to impugn it."

It followed that, since the enforcement notice must therefore stand, the interest in good administration which underlay the principle in O'Reilly v. Mackman was not affected. I infer that, in those circumstances, Lord E Fraser of Tullybelton considered that it did not matter that, for the purposes of proving that he had suffered damage by reason of the alleged negligence, the plaintiff would be seeking to establish that the enforcement notice was invalid. It follows that the decision in the case provides no basis for the council's argument in the present case.

There is, however, one passage in the speech of Lord Fraser of F Tullybelton to which I wish to refer. He said, at p. 274:

> "A further consideration is that if the claim based on negligence, which is the only one of the original three claims now surviving, were to be struck out, the blow to the respondent's chances of recovering damages might well be mortal. The court has no power to order the proceedings for damages to continue as if they had G been made under Order 53. The converse power under Ord. 53, r. 9 operates in one direction only—see O'Reilly v. Mackman, at p. 284A–B. So, if the present appeal were to succeed, the respondent's only chance of bringing his claim for damages before the court would be by obtaining leave to start proceedings for judicial review (now long out of time) and then by relying on Ord. 53, r. 7 to attach a claim for damages to his claim for judicial review. That H would be an awkward and uncertain process to which the respondent ought not to be subjected unless it is required by statute: see Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260, 286, per Viscount Simonds. In my view it is not."

I read this passage in Lord Fraser of Tullybelton's speech as expressing the opinion that the principle in O'Reilly v. Mackman should not be extended to require a litigant to proceed by way of judicial review in circumstances where his claim for damages for negligence might in consequence be adversely affected. I can for my part see no reason why the same consideration should not apply in respect of any private law right which a litigant seeks to invoke, whether by way of action or by way of defence.

For my part, I find it difficult to conceive of a case where a citizen's invocation of the ordinary procedure of the courts in order to enforce his private law rights, or his reliance on his private law rights by way of defence in an action brought against him, could, as such, amount to an abuse of the process of the court. But in any event I am satisfied that it cannot be right that his so proceeding should be held to amount to an abuse of process if the effect would be that his power to enforce his private law rights, or to rely upon them by way of defence, either would or might be adversely affected. I am unable to read Order 53 or section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 as intended in any way to curtail a citizen's private law rights. Furthermore, as I read Lord Diplock's speech in O'Reilly v. Mackman, it was concerned with the abuse which arises where a person fails to employ a procedure for challenging public law decisions which has become, since 1977, free of disadvantages which were manifestly unfair to applicants. If, however, the council's argument in the present case were accepted, litigants could be required to employ a procedure which was manifestly unfair to them in that it would deprive them of the benefit of rights which were theirs by law. Take the case of a council house tenant who is required to pay rent following a notice of increase of rent which he wishes to challenge. If he does not pay the increased rent, he may risk the loss of his right to occupy the house. If he therefore feels compelled to pay the increased rent, he may thereafter wish to recover the increase in an action for money had and received. How is he to recover it? There is no power to award restitution on an application for judicial review. Then again, he may consult a solicitor; and he may be advised that the council has acted beyond its powers, and that he is not bound to pay the increase. So he does not do so, tendering only the previously established rent. He does not commence proceedings at that stage, perhaps because he does not wish to be involved in litigation if he can possibly avoid it. Some time later, long after the expiry of the three-month period specified in Ord. 53, r. 4(1), the council commences proceedings for possession. Is he to be deprived of a defence in those proceedings because it is too late to apply for judicial review? The council's decision to increase the rent may indeed be ultra vires and void. Is the council nevertheless free to enforce against its existing tenants claims for increased rent founded upon its void decision, and indeed claims for possession founded upon failure to pay the increased rent, simply because nobody has applied for judicial review within the requisite period of three months?

To me, these questions admit of only one answer. Indeed, so far as concerns delay in initiating proceedings for the enforcement of private law rights, the policy of the law is contained in the Limitation Act 1980

A (and other analogous statutory provisions) and in the equitable doctrine of laches. The argument of the council, if accepted, would result in the imposition in certain cases of a far more drastic period of limitation for the enforcement of private law rights than Parliament has yet envisaged; and, furthermore, would extend that period of limitation to defences, so enabling public authorities to enforce against citizens non-existing "rights" purporting to arise under decisions which are ultra vires and B effectively divesting such citizens of rights which are theirs by law. I cannot believe that the House of Lords intended the principle in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 to extend so far.

I do not see that the solution to the problem in the present case lies in the mere fact that here the challenge to the public law decision is made by way of defence. In my judgment the crucial question is whether C in his defence the defendant is (as a defendant usually will be) relying upon his private law rights. I will illustrate the point by contrasting the facts of the present case with those of a hypothetical case.

Let it be supposed that, in a case under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, a housing authority provides temporary accommodation for a person, but, having subsequently concluded that that person became homeless intentionally, declines to provide him with permanent D accommodation. He refuses to leave the temporary accommodation and the authority seeks possession. The defence is that the decision not to provide permanent accommodation is ultra vires and void. Such a case would surely fall within the principle of O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237. The decision in Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 could not be distinguished simply because the challenge to the E vires of the authority's decision arose by way of defence. The crucial distinction between such a hypothetical case and the present case is, in my judgment, that the defence in the present case is founded upon the defendant's existing private law rights, whereas the defence in the hypothetical case would not be so founded. In the hypothetical case the riposte of the authority would simply be that, having regard to the authority's decision that the defendant became homeless intentionally, F he had no right to permanent accommodation and so no right to remain in the accommodation provided temporarily. But, in the present case, the defendant's case is that he has a secure tenancy and that, since the two notices of increase of rent are (as he says) ineffective, being derived from decisions of the council which are ultra vires and void, his private law rights in respect of rent are those which existed before the notices of G increased rent were served. On that basis there is no ground for depriving him of the benefit of his secure tenancy. He is therefore invoking the protection of his existing private law rights. Furthermore, it is plain that to require him (as the judge has done) to proceed by way of judicial review would not merely adversely affect the private law rights upon which he seeks to rely but effectively divest him of them, because the time has long since passed when he was free to make any such H application.

I fully appreciate that public authorities may be exposed to great inconvenience if they are unable to invoke the principle of O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 in a case such as the present. But such inconvenience may arise in many cases where a citizen successfully challenges action by a public authority affecting his private law rights under a decision by the public authority which proves to have been made ultra vires. The successful challenge by the citizen may be a source of great embarrassment for the public authority, as it contemplates all the earlier occasions upon which it has given effect to the ultra vires decision and the possibly immense cost to ratepayers of putting the matter right. Sometimes indeed, as experience has shown, it may even be necessary to legislate in order to extricate the public authority from its difficulties. But it does not in my judgment follow that there is an abuse of process by the citizen in invoking the assistance of the ordinary courts, by action or by defence, in order to enforce, or to claim the protection of, his private law rights. If it is thought that any limit should be placed upon citizens proceeding in this way, in the interests of good administration, then this is, in my judgment, a matter for Parliament.

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal.

PARKER L.J. By plaint dated 16 August 1982, the council commenced proceedings in the Wandsworth County Court against the defendant for possession of premises known as 25, Wheatley House. The claim for possession was based on ground 1 of Schedule 4 to the Housing Act 1980, which reads, so far as material: "Any rent lawfully due from the tenant has not been paid . . ." Combined with the claim for possession was a claim for rent allegedly lawfully due but unpaid.

The premises had been let to the defendant on a secure weekly tenancy from some date prior to March 1981 at which time the rent being charged was £12·06 per week. It is not disputed that such rent was lawfully being charged and was being duly paid by the defendant. On 2 March 1981, however, the council gave notice of increase of rent, stating that with effect from 6 April 1981 the rent would be £16·56 per week, an increase of a little more than 37 per cent. The defendant considered this increase unjustifiable, notified the council to this effect and refused to pay it. A further notice of increase dated 1 March 1982 stating that the rent would be increased to £18·53 from 5 April 1982 was given by the council. This increase also the defendant refused to pay. He continued, however, at all times to pay both the old rent of £12·06 per week and, as I understand it, an 8 per cent. increase which he considered was reasonable.

The arrears claimed by the council by their plaint is, effectively, the difference between the old rent of £12·06 plus the 8 per cent. supplement and the rents successively effected, or purported to be effected, by the two notices of increase.

The defendant (after first filing an inadequate "home-made" defence) filed a defence and counterclaim dated 11 January 1983.

[His Lordship read paragraph 6 of the defence, and continued:] The defence was repeated in the counterclaim, which claimed initially only a declaration that the two notices of increase were ultra vires void and of no effect. Subsequently, by amendment, a further and alternative declaration was sought—that the rent payable under the tenancy was £12·06 per week. The counterclaim adds nothing, save prayers for the

A formal relief which would be available in the event that the defence succeeded.

The response of the council to this pleading was an application to the county court dated 2 March 1983 to strike out the defence and counterclaim on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable defence or counterclaim or was scandalous, frivolous or vexatious or might embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action or was otherwise an abuse of the B process of the court.

The application does not reveal it, but the real, and indeed sole, basis of the application was that, if the defendant wished to challenge the validity of the notices of increase or the decisions on which they were based, as he plainly did, it was an abuse of process to do so otherwise than by application for judicial review in the High Court C under R.S.C., Ord. 53. The application was dismissed by the registrar, but on appeal to the judge an order was made on 15 November 1983 (1) staying the action, and (2) striking our paragraphs 5 and 6 of the defence and the whole of the counterclaim. The stay was to enable the defendant to apply for judicial review. This he has since done without success. This is hardly surprising, for the time for applying has long since expired.

D Both the registrar and the judge delivered fully reasoned judgments which have been of considerable assistance.

At the time of the hearings, both before the judge and the registrar, the decisions of the House of Lords in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 had been reported, although at that time only in the Weekly Law Reports, E and the council's application was based squarely on these two cases, as is their argument on this appeal, which is brought by leave of the judge. Put in its simplest form, their contention is that the defendant's defence falls within the general rule enunciated in O'Reilly v. Mackman; that there is nothing special about the circumstances of this case to warrant a departure from that general rule; and, accordingly, that it is an abuse of the process of the court to challenge or impugn the council's decisions or F the notices of increase otherwise than by way of judicial review.

The defendant, on the other hand, contends (again put in abbreviated form) that there is nothing in section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 or R.S.C., Ord. 53, which underlie the two decisions in the House of Lords, or in those decisions themselves to make it an abuse of process to set up any legal defence available to him even if that defence involves G challenging or impugning a decision, proceedings to challenge which in the High Court could only be initiated by way of an application for judicial review.

It is common ground that prior to the service of the first notice the defendant's position was that he had a right to remain in possession of the premises on paying rent therefor at the rate of £12·06 per week, and that that right has continued thereafter unless the rents specified in the H two notices were rents which the council were lawfully entitled to charge. It is further common ground that, certainly until 1977 when R.S.C., Ord. 53 was introduced and probably also until 1981, there was nothing whatever to prevent the defendant from challenging the notices and the decisions upon which they were based by way of defence to an action by the council, whether in the county court or in the High Court. Finally, it is common ground that, if the rents specified in the notices were unlawful but the defendant had nevertheless paid them for a time, he would, until 1981, have been entitled to recover the overpayments as money had and received in an ordinary action in the High Court or county court, subject, so far as time is concerned, only to the relevant limitation period.

If the council's argument is correct, it would appear that, by way of provisions which were essentially procedural, a person's substantive rights under the law have been vitally affected. He can in such a case as the present only defend himself by way of separate proceedings in the High Court, and such proceedings, even if commenced within the time limited by Order 53, can only be brought by leave. If he, through no fault of his own, is out of time, he will additionally require the exercise of the court's discretion to obtain leave to apply out of time. Finally, he will require a further exercise of discretion in his favour, for the grant of the relief itself is discretionary.

If, on the other hand, he seeks to recover money to which at law he has a good claim, he will, if the council are right, again have to obtain the exercise of the court's discretion before he can proceed, and he will not be able in proceedings for judicial review to recover the overpayments, for, although it is possible to make a claim for damages on an application for judicial review, there is no provision in the Act or under the rules for making a claim for money had and received in such proceedings.

Such results appear somewhat startling, the more so when it is established law that the rights of the individual at common law cannot be taken away by legislation, save only by express words or necessary implication: see, e.g., Universe Tankships Inc. of Monrovia v. International Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 A.C. 366.

It is unnecessary to examine the provisions of section 31 itself, or indeed Order 53, for it is not, and could not, be suggested that either by express words or by necessary implication they bar a litigant from proceeding by action for a declaration, much less from challenging a decision by way of defence. I therefore proceed at once to consider the authorities.

O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237

There are four preliminary points to be noted. (1) Lord Diplock expressed the question before the House in these terms, at pp. 274–275:

> "whether . . . it was an abuse of the process of the court to apply for such declarations by using the procedure laid down in the Rules for proceedings begun by writ or by originating summons instead of using the procedure laid down by Order 53 for an application for judicial review . . ."

The case was thus concerned solely with initiation of proceedings in the High Court where alternative procedures were available and not at all with proceedings in the county court or the raising of challenges by way

A of defence. Such matters are, moreover, not dealt with by the Supreme Court Act or Order 53. (2) The application was one seeking relief which, by whatever procedure it was initiated, was discretionary only (p. 275B–C). (3) None of the plaintiffs had any remedy in private law (p. 275E). (4) The remedy of the plaintiffs lay wholly in the field of public law which would only protect them from unfair treatment in the decision-making process (p. 275E).

B Having set out the foregoing matters, Lord Diplock dealt in detail with the development of the field of public law in comparatively recent times: the removal by Order 53 of the disadvantages which had previously faced applicants for orders of certiorari, prohibition and mandamus, and the addition of new remedies on applications thereunder for judicial review. He then observed that it was conceded that the fact C the applicants had, by proceeding by way of action for a declaration, been enabled to evade those protections against groundless, unmeritorious or tardy harassment that were afforded by Order 53 was a proper matter for a judge to consider when deciding whether to grant a declaration, but that it was contended that this could only be done at the conclusion of the trial. Having done so, he went on, at p. 284:

D "So to delay the judge's decision as to how to exercise his discretion would defeat the public policy that underlies the grant of those protections: viz., the need, in the interests of good administration and of third parties who may be indirectly affected by the decision, for speedy certainty as to whether it has the effect of a decision that is valid in public law."

E Notwithstanding this he says, at pp. 284–285:

"There is great variation between individual cases that fall within Order 53 and the Rules Committee and subsequently the legislature were, I think, for this reason content to rely upon the express and the inherent power of the High Court, exercised upon a case to case basis, to prevent abuse of its process whatever might be the form F taken by that abuse. Accordingly, I do not think that your Lordships would be wise to use this as an occasion to lay down categories of cases in which it would necessarily always be an abuse to seek in an action begun by writ or originating summons a remedy against infringement of rights of the individual that are entitled to protection in public law."

G The public policy is thus a policy which is recognised as not being one of universal application. Further, the abuse of process under consideration was where an applicant was seeking a remedy against infringement of rights which were entitled to protection only in public law. This is repeated when Lord Diplock sets out the general rule in these terms, at p. 285:

H "it would in my view as a general rule be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of an ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities."

Finally, by way of illustration of possible exceptions to the general rule, he continues:

> "My Lords, I have described this as a general rule; for though it may normally be appropriate to apply it by the summary process of striking out the action, there may be exceptions, particularly where the invalidity of the decision arises as a collateral issue in a claim for infringement of a right of the plaintiff arising under private law or where none of the parties objects to the adoption of the procedure by writ or originating summons. Whether there should be other exceptions should, in my view, at this stage in the development of procedural public law, be left to be decided on a case to case basis—a process that your Lordships will be continuing in the next case in which judgment is to be delivered today [Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286]."

Both the general rule itself and the exceptions to it relate to cases where the plaintiff, who is challenging a public law decision, does so by initiating proceedings in the High Court and selects for such purpose action by writ or originating summons for a declaration rather than the alternative by way of application for judicial review. They have no direct application to cases where the challenge comes by way of defence to an action on the part of the authority concerned which has chosen to sue the defendant either in the county court or the High Court. Nevertheless, the evasion of the Order 53 safeguards could clearly occur just as easily in such cases. There might well be cases in which, were the matter so raised, it would still be possible to say, as did Lord Diplock in O'Reilly v. Mackman, at p. 285, "They are blatant attempts to avoid the protections . . . for which Order 53 provides." To reach such a conclusion would, however, not be easy where the defendant had promptly informed the authority that he regarded the decision as invalid, where he had rested on an existing private law right which would, if his assertion was made good, defeat the claim made against him and where it could not be said that the defence as such was frivolous or vexatious.

To take an extreme case, in Backhouse v. Lambeth London Borough Council (1972) 116 S.J. 802, the council had passed a resolution to raise the rent of one council house which stood at £30·84 per month by £18,000 per week. The chairman of the council tenants brought an action for a declaration that the resolution was invalid and, not surprisingly, succeeded. If, however, the tenant had simply refused to pay and been sued by the council, I cannot suppose that it would be regarded as an abuse of process for the tenant to raise by way of defence that he was not liable as the rent was unreasonable and therefore unlawful, even if it had taken the council a year or more to summon the courage to sue him.

Before considering this further, however, it is necessary to refer to the decisions following O'Reilly in order to examine how the law has since developed.

A Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286

In that case the plaintiff had commenced proceedings in the county court claiming a declaration that the defendants were under a duty to house him permanently under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, and were in breach of that duty. The plaintiff further claimed a mandatory injunction and damages. The action was removed to the B High Court for determination of a preliminary issue whether the plaintiff was entitled to proceed with his claim in the county court or must proceed by way of application for judicial review under Order 53.

The plaintiff was there asserting a private right, but that right depended for its existence upon the authority first considering and then answering three questions. If, but only if, they were satisfied that the first two of such questions should be answered in the affirmative and the C third in the negative would there be an obligation to provide permanent accommodation (p. 291A–D and p. 293B). Lord Bridge of Harwich said, at p. 294:

> "Does the same general rule apply, where the decision of the public authority which the litigant wishes to overturn is not one alleged to infringe any existing right but a decision which, being adverse to D him, prevents him establishing a necessary condition precedent to the statutory private law right which he seeked to enforce? Any relevant decision of a housing authority under the Act of 1977 which an applicant for accommodation wants to challenge will be of that character. I have no doubt that the same general rule should apply to such a case."

E It is to be observed that in that case the existence of the private right depended upon a public law right decision in the plaintiff's favour first being made, whereas in the present case the defendant had an existing private law right which required for its alteration either a contractual variation of rent or a valid public law decision followed by the necessarily prescribed steps to implement it. Lord Bridge of Harwich concluded his F speech, at pp. 295–296:

> "As Lord Diplock has observed in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, the validity of a public law decision may come into question collaterally in an ordinary action. In such a case the issue would have to be decided by the High Court or the county court trying the action, as the case might be."

G Unfortunately, neither Lord Diplock nor Lord Bridge of Harwich said what they meant to be covered by the words "a collateral issue," although Lord Diplock envisages such an issue arising in the case of an action for infringement of a private right. Assuming that Lord Bridge was using the phrase "collateral issue" in the same sense as Lord Diplock, both were plainly considering cases where the challenger to the H public law decision was the plaintiff in an action. The position of the defendant was not considered at all. It is however to be observed that the public policy is apparently not one which will prevent a challenge being removed from the safeguards where the challenge arises as a collateral issue, albeit as it seems to me such a challenge made after the passage of time might have just as disastrous results as a direct challenge by way of action for a declaration. A

I can find nothing in O'Reilly v. Mackman or Cocks' case which compels me to the conclusion that it is or could be an abuse of the process of the court to rely on a defence which, if established, would be a complete answer to the claim.

There remains one further decision of the House of Lords which it is necessary to consider in some detail before proceeding to examine whether the present state of the law is such that it is an abuse of process to raise such a defence. That case is Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262. There the plaintiff had been served by the defendants with an enforcement notice in respect of the use of his premises. Legislation provided for an appeal against an enforcement notice to the Secretary of State and also provided that the validity of an enforcement notice should not, except by way of such appeal, be questioned in any proceedings whatever on any of the grounds upon which an appeal might be brought. The plaintiff had not appealed and the time for doing so had expired. In this situation he issued a writ against the defendants alleging that he had refrained from appealing as a result of negligent advice given by the defendants. He claimed (1) an injunction ordering the defendants not to implement the notice; (2) damages for negligence and (3) an order that the notice be set aside. B C D

On an application to strike out the action as an abuse of process the defendants failed before Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. but on appeal the Court of Appeal ordered the first and third claims to be struck out. The defendants appealed to the House of Lords seeking to have the second claim struck out also. There was no cross-appeal. The question before the House of Lords was therefore whether a claim against the defendants in negligence should be struck out. The negligence concerned was tortious only and thus an essential part of the cause of action was proof of damage. This the plaintiff could in theory establish without going into the validity of the enforcement notice, for, given that the duty of care and its breach were established, the plaintiff had been deprived of his opportunity to appeal. In practice, however, he would be concerned to establish the invalidity of the notice, for only by so doing could he prove substantial damage. E F

The defendants' appeal was out on two grounds, one of which was that the plaintiff was, by his action, questioning the validity of the notice and that this was prohibited by statute. The second ground was based on O'Reilly v. Mackman and it is only with that part of the decision which deals with that ground that I am presently concerned. G

The defendants' second contention was expressed by Lord Fraser of Tullybelton in the following terms, at p. 272:

> "that, when the respondent alleges that he had a good defence to the enforcement notice, he is asserting a right to which he is entitled to protection under public law, and one which therefore he cannot be permitted to defend by way of an ordinary action." H

The references to "defence" and "defending" cannot be taken to be of any significance, for the plaintiffs' assertion was that he could successfully

A have appealed and he was seeking as plaintiff to establish this in an ordinary action.

Lord Fraser of Tullybelton (with whose conclusion and reasoning Lord Roskill, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Brightman agreed) expressed his conclusion with regard to the above contention shortly as follows, at p. 273:

B "Although the argument was presented most persuasively, it is in my view not well founded. The present proceedings, so far as they consist of a claim for damages for negligence, appear to me to be simply an ordinary action for tort. They do not raise any issue of public law as a live issue. I cannot improve upon the words of Fox L.J. in the Court of Appeal when he said (1983) 81 L.G.R. 580, 596: 'I do not think that the negligence claim is concerned with "the C infringement of rights to which [the plaintiff] was entitled to protection under public law" to use Lord Diplock's words in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 285. The claim, in my opinion, is concerned with the alleged infringement of the plaintiff's rights at common law. Those rights are not even peripheral to a public law claim. They are the essence of the entire claim, so far as D negligence is concerned.' It follows that in my opinion they do not fall within the scope of the general rule laid down in O'Reilly v. Mackman."

The reference to an absence of any issue of public law as a live issue was clearly to the fact that it was of the essence of the plaintiff's case as it remained after the Court of Appeal decision that he could no longer impugn the enforcement notice. The issue as to the original validity of E the enforcement notice was, however, a very live issue, for, if the plaintiff was not permitted to challenge it in the action, his claim for damages would, even if it could theoretically survive, be minimal. As Lord Fraser of Tullybelton said, at p. 274:

"So, if the present appeal were to succeed, the respondent's only chance of bringing his claim for damages before the court would be F by obtaining leave to start proceedings for judicial review (now long out of time) and then by relying on Ord. 53, r. 7 to attach a claim for damages to his claim for judicial review. That would be an awkward and uncertain process to which the respondent ought not to be subjected unless it is required by statute: see Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. Ministry of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260, G 286, per Viscount Simonds. In my view it is not."

The same considerations apply here. The defendant, having had his defence struck out, had as his only means of resisting the claim to possession and rent the obtaining of leave to start proceedings for judicial review (long out of time). Having sought and been refused leave, he will, if this appeal is dismissed, be left with no defence, even if H the rents sought to be imposed upon him are unreasonable and thus ultra vires. The authority will thereby be enabled to recover rent not lawfully due and to evict the tenant for not paying such rent.

The passage in Lord Fraser of Tullybelton's speech principally relied upon by the council is, at p. 274:

"It is quite clear from the speech of Lord Bridge of Harwich, with which all the other members of the House agreed, that the plaintiff was asserting a present right to impugn or overturn the decision—see p. 294D: 'the decision of the public authority which the litigant wishes to overturn.' (Emphasis added.) In the present case, on the other hand, the respondent does not impugn or wish to overturn the enforcement notice. His whole case on negligence depends on the fact that he has lost his chance to impugn it."

It is contended that in the present case the defendant is asserting a present right to impugn or overturn the notices of increase and the resolutions on which they are based, and that it makes no difference that he is doing so by way of defence. Indeed it is further contended that, if the defendant had, for example, not appreciated that the rent was unreasonable and ultra vires and had paid it for a considerable time, any claim to recover the overpayments as money had and received could only be raised after proceeding by way of Order 53 and obtaining first leave and then a favourable decision. In either case this would, in my view, to quote Lord Fraser again, "be an awkward and uncertain process to which the respondent ought not to be subjected unless it is required by statute: . . . In my view it is not." I add that the fact that it is not required by statute is expressly decided by the House in O'Reilly v. Mackman.

Lord Wilberforce, whilst agreeing with the conclusion of the other four members of the Appellate Committee, expressed his reasons in terms to which they refrained from expressing agreement. They did not however express disagreement. Had they expressed agreement, the present case would present no difficulty at all, for Lord Wilberforce said, at p. 277:

"It is indeed plain enough that issues which could be characterised as issues of 'public law' may arise in a number of contexts besides those where an attack upon, or review of, actions or omissions of public bodies is involved—cases, for example, where the invalidity of such action is set up by way of defence. . ."

I respectfully agree. There is no doubt that in the present case the defendant is impugning the resolutions and the notices, but he is doing so by way of defence. The statute does not require him, as a condition precedent to raising such a defence, himself to initiate proceedings by way of Order 53, and, in the absence of express House of Lords authority binding me so to do, I am unable to conclude that it is an abuse of the process of the court in which he has been sued not to do so. There is clearly no such binding authority.

I would add that I also respectfully agree with Lord Wilberforce's comments upon the need to proceed with caution when using the newly imported expressions "private law" and "public law." Failure to so do may result in the courts turning section 31 of the Supreme Court Act and Order 53 (which, whilst affording safeguards to the public authorities from harassment by tardy and unmeritorious challenges, were intended to remove the disadvantages to the public inherent in previous procedure)

A into instruments for depriving the public of rights of which they can only be deprived by statute.

Many questions arise for consideration. If, for example, public law is concerned only with the decision making process, then it embraces only a part of the field covered by Order 53. Applications thereunder, whether for orders for certiorari, mandamus, prohibition or declaration, may be made on the simple ground that the notice, decision, bye-law
B etc. was, as a matter of construction of a statute, outwith the powers of the authority concerned or was invalid because the correct procedure had not been followed. These have nothing to do with the decision making process. Is it to be said that such matters can only be raised, whether by initiation or defence, only by way of Order 53, and, if so, why? Suppose, for example, an authority, in pursuance of some notice
C or bye-law long since made, enter upon a person's property and remove his chattels and there is a sound argument that the notice is bad for non-compliance with statutory procedures or the bye-law ultra vires the relevant statute. Is it to be held an abuse of process to sue for trespass or conversion without first proceeding, or trying to proceed, under Order 53? Or suppose that an authority seeks to levy a rate which, on the true construction of its statute, it has no power to levy and the D subject simply refuses to pay. Suppose further that, after protracted correspondence, the authority sue him for arrears. Can he not simply defend himself by setting up the construction of the statute?

I cannot think that the House of Lords intended bars to action or defence in such cases to flow from any of their three decisions, and in my view they did not do so. Thus far the House of Lords has gone so
E far only as to say that, in general, where a plaintiff is setting up either the infringement of a right which exists, if at all, only in public law, or an alleged private right, a condition precedent to the existence of which is the overturning by an attack on the decision-making process of a decision of an authority which infringes no private right, it is an abuse of process to do so otherwise than by application under Order 53. It may be that other cases will occur, but in my judgment this is not one of F them.

In conclusion I would only say this. If I am wrong and O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 should extend to some cases where the challenge is by way of defence, this is not in my view such a case. The defendant made his challenge promptly, made it clear that his reason for so doing was that he considered the rent demanded to be unreasonable
G and paid what he considered to be reasonable. In view of the size of the increase in relation to the rate of inflation, it is not surprising that he should have done so. Under section 111 of the Housing Act 1957 the local authority are empowered to make such "reasonable charges . . . as they may determine"—not such charges as they consider reasonable. It is true that by section 113(1A), which was added later by amendment, the authority is obliged from time to time to review rents and make such
H changes, either of rents generally or of particular rents, as circumstances may require, but I do not regard this as extending the power in section 113 so as to enable the authority to charge rents which are in fact unreasonable.

It is not suggested that the defendant has not an arguable case that the rents are unreasonable. He was in my view well entitled to sit back and leave it to the authority to sue him if they thought fit. He was under no obligation to initiate proceedings against them. However wide the general rule is, I cannot regard it as an abuse of process to raise his challenge in this case by way of defence. He has of course in that defence attacked not only the rent itself but the decision-making process and it is plain that, had he desired himself to initiate such a challenge, his proper course would have been to do so under Order 53, but this makes no difference. I would allow this appeal and set aside the order of the judge, with the result that the defence and counterclaim would be restored and the action would proceed.

I am fully conscious that the conclusion which I have reached may produce just those embarrassing results which the public policy enunciated by Lord Diplock is designed to avoid. Public policy has, however, been described as an unruly horse. A public policy which had the results contended for and interfered with the rights of the subject to defend himself when sued by any defence open to him or to bring an action for private law relief, save in the one case exemplified in Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, would in my view be more than unruly: it would have bolted and both outrun the legislature and overturned long-standing principles laid down by the House of Lords.

ACKNER L.J. Before we leave this appeal, we, that is all three of us, would like to repeat the point that we made at the outset of the hearing. But for judicial intervention, this appeal would have been heard by a two-judge court. Robert Goff L.J. and I took the initiative, having read the papers a few days before the appeal was due to be heard, to ask that a third judge be added to the court. We did so because we considered that the appeal clearly raised matters of general importance of some complexity and was one upon which there could well be a difference of judicial opinion: there already had been in the courts below. Sir John Donaldson M.R. has pointed out in the practice note on the new procedure in the Court of Appeal, Practice Note (Court of Appeal: New Procedure) [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1312, 1318 that, where an appeal falls within the jurisdiction of a two-judge court but raises issues of such complexity or general importance that a three-judge court is desirable, the parties should apply to the registrar for a special listing before a three-judge court, an application which of course needs to be made with discretion. It appears that the entitlement to make such an application is being overlooked by the Bar. It was, for example, only a few weeks ago that, on the initiative of Purchas L.J. and myself, a third judge (coincidentally Parker L.J.) was again added to the court to hear a commercial interlocutory appeal of considerable complication, involving continental and American companies, concurrent proceedings here and in New York with very large sums at stake.

It is to be hoped that in the future counsel at an early stage, preferably when settling a notice of appeal, will give special consideration to this question and, where appropriate, make the necessary application. We of course do not intend by these observations to encourage

A applications which do not come within the practice direction. However, it should not be left to the judiciary to take the initiative—not only because we do not always have an opportunity to read the papers sufficiently well in advance of the hearing to be able to add in time a third judge, but also because the complexities and/or the importance of the appeal, while well known to counsel, may not be apparent on a first reading of the papers.

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellants, the Mayor and Burgesses of

E the London Borough of Wandsworth, from the judgment dated 29 March 1984 of the Court of Appeal (Robert Goff and Parker L.JJ., Ackner L.J. dissenting) allowing an appeal by the respondent, Paul Winder, from an order dated 15 November 1983, of Judge White sitting at Wandsworth County Court by which he struck out paragraphs 5 and 6 of the respondent's defence and the whole of his counterclaim as being an abuse of the process of the court.

F

On 16 August 1982 the appellants brought proceedings against the respondent claiming possession of the council property let to him and arrears of rent relying on ground 1 of Schedule 4 to the Housing Act 190 (rent due not paid). By paragraphs 5 and 6 of his defence the respondent contended that the resolutions of the appellants increasing council rents made on 10 February 1981 and 9 February 1982 are ultra

G vires and void. By counterclaim he sought declarations to the effect that accordingly the notices of increase were void and of no effect.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Lord Fraser of Tullybelton.

Anthony Scrivener Q.C. and Geoffrey Stephenson for the appellants. The raising of the issue that the notices of increase in rent were void and of no effect, by way of defence and counterclaim in the action, is an

H abuse of the process of the court, since it should and could have been raised by way of judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53. The issue in this appeal is whether the principles in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and in Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 apply to the defence and counterclaim. In effect, the respondent, who has made a broad attack against the appellant's contentions, has raised the issue whether the ambit of the principle laid down in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, should be narrowed.

The relevant legislation is at two levels. There is the Housing Act 1957, which, inter alia, provides a statutory duty on the local authority to review rents. Secondly, the Housing Act 1980, which governs the relationship between a local authority and a landlord and tenant.

It is necessary to consider the special position of local authorities. A local authority, being a body governed entirely by statute, is subject to the ultra vires rule. Because it is in receipt and is a custodian of public funds, it owes a fiduciary duty to its ratepayers. Further, it is a democratically elected body, and therefore answerable to the ballot box for its decisions; and accordingly its policies may be reflected in many of the decisions it makes.

There are a number of decisions which are made by public bodies which affect members of the public over which the latter have no public rights at all, for example, the charge made per unit for the supply of gas and electricity. The only right is contractual. But an unusual feature in the development of public law in England has been that members of the public who have a sufficient interest may attack a decision made by a public body which affects them by utilising the procedure of judicial review. This operates within the principle adumbrated in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 K.B. 223. There can be protection of members of the public both in public law and in private law.

Section 111(1) and (2) of the Housing Act 1957 provides for the general management, regulation and control of local authority housing. Section 113(4) imposes a duty on the local authority to review the rent from time to time of its houses. In Luby v. Newcastle-under-Lyme Corporation [1964] 2 Q.B. 64, 70–71, Diplock L.J. held that the expression in section 111(1), "reasonable charges" for the occupation of council houses meant "reasonable" in the Wednesbury sense [1948] 1 K.B. 223.

The Housing Act 1980 introduced a new term into the law relating to council tenants, namely, "secure tenant." In some ways the provisions relating thereto mirror the protection given to the private tenant under the Rent Restriction Acts. For the relevant provisions of the Housing Act 1980: see sections 33, 34(1), (2), (3), 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40(1)–(8), 41(1), (2), 43, 44(1), 47, 48, Schedule IV. In these provisions it is section 28 which defines a "secure tenancy." Section 40 is also of critical importance; for unlike the agreement between a private landlord and tenant, Parliament has here set out a complete statutory code in respect of a council tenancy. The terms are important, for it gives the landlord overriding rights over and above the contract: see, for example, section 40(4), section 41(1), (2). Section 43 relates to another important aspect of the code. Since the Housing Act 1980 sets up a special statutory code, the question arises where does the tenant's protection lie? As to section 40, Parliament has provided for a variation of the terms of the tenancy. Under this provision, a local authority can vary its rent simply by giving

A the requisite notice under the Act to the tenant. This is quite different from a contract of tenancy in the private sector, where such a variation can only be done where the contract between landlord and tenant so provides. It is true that section 40(3) provides for agreement between the parties for changes in rent. But section 40(4) enables the local authority to alter rent outside the terms of the contract, without agreement. This is to enable it to meet the requirements of section 111
B and section 113 of the Housing Act 1957.

If a local authority increases the rent pursuant to section 40(4) of the Act of 1980, the only way it can be challenged by the tenant is by way of judicial review. This is an additional protection given to the secure tenant by the courts; for without the remedy of judicial review, the secure tenant under the Act of 1980 would have no redress at all in C respect of an increase of rent under section 40(4).

Luby v. Newcastle-under-Lyme Corporation [1964] 2 Q.B. 64, is a useful authority. It indicates clearly that the tenant's attack in this field must be on Wednesbury principles [1948] 1 K.B. 223. It shows that a local authority, being a public body, has to take into consideration its public duties and strike a balance between its duty to the ratepayers and its duties towards its council tenants. Further, it shows that the tenant's
D remedy is by way of judicial review.

In the present case, the respondent tenant is not content to allege that his increase in rent is unreasonable, but he also contends that the whole resolution of the local authority relating to review of rents is ultra vires and void.

In summary, the local authority has a statutory duty to provide
E accommodation. It has a statutory power under section 111 of the Housing Act 1957 to manage properties provided for that purpose, including the right to make reasonable charges for accommodation. In addition, it has a duty to review rents under section 113(4). In exercising that power and duty, it will consider the interests of ratepayers, tenants, its policies and other social considerations. The decision that the local authority makes relating to rents affects all tenants. The local authority
F has a very wide discretion. It follows that the only attack that can be made on this decision is on Wednesbury based principles [1948] 1 K.B. 223. The Housing Act 1980 enables a local authority to increase rent unilaterally. That is in the contemplation of an entire code. The only protection that a tenant will have is to attack the resolution relating to such increase of rent itself. If the remedy depends on Wednesbury
G principles, it follows that the court in reaching its decision has to exercise its discretion.

In O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 275c, the relief sought was discretionary only. It will be seen from Lord Diplock's speech that it was the courts which enlarged the powers to protect the citizen by way of the prerogative writs, later orders. Parliament did not intervene until the passing of the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1971 which repealed the H Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1958. Before 1977, the subject could go either by way of judicial review or by way of declaratory relief. Both are discretionary remedies. The choice was the citizen's. But since in going by way of judicial review the court's decision against a public body might affect a great number of persons, it is right and proper that such a remedy should be applied for expeditiously, as R.S.C., Ord. 53 provides. In O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 285, Lord Diplock refers to rights protected by public law. In the present case, the only right that the secure tenant has relating to an increase of rent is that contained in section 40(4) of the Housing Act 1980, and this is in the realm of public law, and so any remedy is by way of judicial review.

Compare the approach of Lord Bridge of Harwich in Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 with the circumstances of the present case where, as in that case, the local authority as a housing authority is charged with a public law function. The situation adverted to by Lord Bridge [1983] 2 A.C. 286, 292H, applies to the present case. As to his observations at p. 293A, the present case is less strong, because the present respondent has no private law right to complain of an increase in rent. He has no remedy in private law. As to p. 294F, the facts there stated are present here to a far greater extent. A grant of declaratory relief would affect a large number of persons, namely, all other council tenants in the Borough of Wandsworth. A tenant who cannot pay his rent is not without relief. He can apply to the Social Services for assistance in this regard.

Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262 was a very different case from the present, for it was in the realm of private law, whilst a decision made under section 111 of the Housing Act 1957 is in the realm of public law. For a discussion of the expressions "private law" and "public law" see the speech of Lord Wilberforce [1984] A.C. 262, 276–278. Lord Wilberforce approaches the question of the difference between these two concepts as one of a difference of remedies. This is correct. If it is necessary to consider the difference between the two as a question of substantive law, then for a decision to come within the realm of "public law" it must satisfy the following three tests: (i) the decision must be made by a public body; (ii) the public body must be exercising a statutory duty of statutory power conferred upon it or be purporting so to do; (iii) the decision can only be queried by a review process.

The local authority has a statutory right to vary a council tenant's rent unilaterally and outside the contract: section 40(4) of the Housing Act 1980. The tenant has no private law remedy to challenge the variation. The tenant has a public law remedy, by challenging the decision of the local authority to vary, made pursuant to the power in section 111 of the Housing Act 1957, and pursuant to the duty imposed by section 113 of the Act of 1957. Since the tenant is challenging a public law function, he only has "review" remedies: see Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, 292F–H. If the decision of the local authority is set aside in the present case it will have serious repercussions on the local authority, ratepayers and others, and third parties will be affected. In performing this public law function, "speedy certainty" is required, and the local authority should be protected from "harassment" on public policy grounds. If these public policy grounds exist, they apply equally where the challenge to the decision is raised by way of defence and/or counterclaim, and the court's powers to prevent abuse are not limited in this event. The tenant in these circumstances has an effective

A remedy by way of judicial review to challenge the decision. The only "impediments" are the need for leave and the requirement to commence proceedings within three months, unless time is enlarged. These "impediments" must be weighed against the factors outlined in the summary above when deciding as a matter of discretion whether it would be an abuse of process to allow him to use another procedure. B Taking all the above factors into consideration, it is the appellants' contention that paragraphs 5 and 6 of the defence and counterclaim should be struck out as a matter of discretion, as being an abuse of the process of the court, because (a) the respondent was challenging a public law decision with extensive repercussions in public law; (b) he had applied for leave to apply for judicial review out of time, and his application has been dismissed; (c) he could have applied timeously for C judicial review, and there was no reason why he could not have so applied.

For the relevant history relating to proceedings such as the present against public authorities, see the Limitation Act 1623 (21 Ja. 1, c.16); the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c.61); rule 21 of the Crown Office Rules 1906; Roberts v. Metropolitan Borough of D Battersea [1914] 110 L.T. 566; section 10 of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1938; section 21 of the Limitation Act 1939; the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions) Act 1954 and Wade, Administrative Law (1982) 5th ed., p. 677. John M. Bowyer and Andrew Lydiard for the respondent. These E proceedings arise from an application to strike out and such applications only succeed in plain and obvious cases. This appeal has been presented on reliance and analysis of the Housing Act 1980, along with the Housing Act 1957. The argument based on section 40 of the Housing Act 1980 was not a matter raised in the Court of Appeal, nor is it raised in the appellants' printed case.

The argument for the respondent falls under three main heads: F (1) The House is invited to reconsider its decisions in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, under the Practice Direction [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1084. (2) The respondent's right to ask for a declaration is, in the circumstances, a right in private law, and therefore O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, is distinguishable. (3) O'Reilly v. Mackman is also distinguishable G on the grounds that the respondent raises the point by way of defence.

(1) The basis upon which the House is invited to reconsider the very recent decisions in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, is that in reaching them and formulating the principle of public policy there adopted, the House was not, so far as the respondent's advisers have been able to ascertain, H invited to consider the policy of the legislature with regard to proceedings against public authorities as expressed in the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions) Act 1954 and continued by the Limitation Act 1980, namely, to assimilate them (with exceptions not presently material) to proceedings against parties other than public authorities. It will be seen from Mr.

Stephen Sedley's argument in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 271H–272A, that the provisions of the Act of 1954 were not directly before the House.

Section 1 of the Act of 1954 repeals section 21 of the Limitation Act 1939, which laid down a statutory time limit of one year for actions for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any public duty or authority. Section 21 applied to actions for declarations of nullity of decisions affecting the rights of citizens: Coventry v. Wilson [1939] 1 All E.R. 429, 451A–452A, 453G–H, and Hogg v. Scott [1947] K.B. 759, 767. By the repeal of section 21, Parliament evinced its intentions, and proceedings in respect of acts done in intended execution of any public duty or authority, including actions for declarations of nullity, should not be subject to special periods of limitation. Discrimination in favour of public authorities was ended: see Wade, Administrative Law, 5th ed., p. 677. Parliament's intention was that delay in commencing proceedings against public authorities should be dealt with according to any statutory limitation period applicable to the cause of action or, when there is no such statutory period, according to applicable common law principles.

No statutory period of limitation applied or applies now for actions for declarations against parties other than public authorities. But there were and are settled principles on which a declaration might be refused in discretion by reason of undue delay in commencing proceedings. Section 36(2) of the Limitation Act 1980 expressly left intact the court's equitable jurisdiction to refuse relief on the ground of acquiescence or otherwise (including laches). The declaration may not be an equitable remedy, but it is a discretionary remedy. The principles are similar to the equitable jurisdiction including laches. The intention evinced by Parliament in the Act of 1954 was that these principles should govern actions for declarations against public authorities, including actions for declarations of nullity of decisions affecting the rights of citizens such as those sought in Coventry v. Wilson [1939] 1 All E.R. 429 and Hogg v. Scott [1947] K.B. 759.

The effect of the decisions in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 is not, strictly speaking, to impose any limitation period, but merely to require the proceedings to establish that a public authority infringed rights entitled to protection in public law must normally be begun by judicial review proceedings pursuant to application for leave made within the short period of three months after the impugned decision—unless discretionary extension of time is obtained.

As to laches, a remedy by way of a declaration is a statutory remedy, and one to which the court will apply broad equitable principles and to which the doctrine of laches applies: see Nwakobi v. Nzekwu [1964] 1 W.L.R. 1019, 1022, 1024 and Grunwick Processing Labatories Ltd. v. Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service [1978] A.C. 655, 695D, per Lord Diplock. If there is a matter of consequence to the public authority, then that is an incentive to get the public authority to the court at the earliest possible moment: see Ealing London Borough v. Race Relations Board [1972] A.C. 342.

A Where Parliament by statute has given a clear indication of what public policy is to be in a particular sphere of the law (as it has as stated previously in relation to time limits for proceedings against public authorities), the courts will not develop public policy in that field in a manner which diverges from that indication, even though the legislation setting out the public policy has no direction application to the problem before the court: Universe Tankships Inc. of Monrovia v. International B Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 A.C. 366, 384D–388G, 391E–F, 397B–C, 401D–G; Birkett v. James [1978] A.C. 297, 320C–321A, 325G, 328F–329A, 332B–F, 334A–C, 336E. The public policy enunciated in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, does, by the resulting short time period for commencement of proceedings against public authorities, develop the C law in a manner inconsistent with the policy indicated by Parliament in the Limitation of Actions legislation referred to previously (see the judgment of Robert Goff L.J., ante pp. 480H—481B).

(2) The development of the law as to judicial review in recent cases (including O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, accepting both as rightly decided) has had no effect upon the citizen's opportunity to assert private rights, D and that is not what the respondent's defence and counterclaim does. The majority of the Court of Appeal decided these matters in his favour. Ackner L.J., dissenting, held that the defence and counterclaim set up no private rights or, alternatively, if it did, the issue of public law arose at one remove and this was of no significance.

In O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, this House enunciated a E general rule that it was contrary to public policy to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of an ordinary action (p. 285E). As formulated in that case, the rule does not prevent a person from seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority has infringed or threatens to infringe rights derived from private law. O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 was not such F a case (p. 275E), and there is no authority for extending the general rule to such a case.

It makes no difference that in such a case the validity of the decision of a public authority may be brought into question. It was expressly recognised in Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, 295H–296A, that the validity of a public law decision may come into question G collaterally in an ordinary action, and in such a case would have to be determined by the court of trial. There are many examples of this occurring: (a) If a public authority makes an unlawful demand for money, the citizen can defend any action brought, on the ground that the demand was unlawful. It is well recognised that such a defence to a claim by a public authority which is challenged as unlawful raises a public law issue of the validity of the alleged public law basis of the H claim collaterally: see De Smith, Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4th ed. (1980), p. 22; Wade, Administrative Law, 5th ed., p. 296, 4th ed. (1977), p. 283, and the cases there cited, and more recently, South West Water Authority v. Rumble's [1984] 1 W.L.R. 800, and An Bord Bainne Co-operative Ltd. (Irish Dairy Board) v. Milk Marketing Board [1984] 2 C.M.L.R. 584. Alternative courses available to the citizen are to seek a declaration that the demand is unlawful and ultra vires or, if he or she has paid, bring an action for money had and received. In each of these three alternatives (defence of unlawful demand, seeking a declaration to the same effect, and action for money had and received), the citizen is relying upon his rights in private law as is made plain by the analysis of the decision in Dyson v. Attorney-General [1911] 1 K.B. 410 adopted in Gouriet v. Union of Post Office Workers [1978] A.C. 435, 483G–H, 494E, 496D, 499G–500C, 501H–502C. (b) In an action for false imprisonment against the police officer who relies by way of defence on a statutory power of arrest, the court of trial must determine whether he has acted in the scope of the executive discretion conferred upon him. In doing so, the court applies Wednesbury principles [1948] 1 K.B. 223, which are applicable not only in proceedings for judicial review, but also for the purpose of founding a cause of action at common law for damages for false imprisonment: see Mohammed-Holgate v. Duke [1984] A.C. 437.

The foundation of the decisions in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 is the certainty principle in the field of public law. It would be unfortunate if the House in the present case were to use the word "collaterally" in a different sense than its use in those two cases. See the comment in Wade, Administrative Law, 5th ed., p. 574, on the judgment of the Court of Appeal in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237.

[LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON said that there was no need to develop the argument on the second point further. Their Lordships now desired to hear the argument relating to the respondent's third point.]

(3) O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 is distinguishable because the respondent raises the issue of ultra vires by way of defence. There are four submissions: (i) there is a well-recognised defence of ultra vires to a public authority claim; (ii) section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1980, R.S.C., Ord. 53, O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286, either singularly or collectively, have not changed the position in relation to that well-known principle; (iii) the decisions in O'Reilly and Cocks should not include, and indeed cannot be extended to, such a defence; (iv) striking out such a defence so that judicial review can or should take place is unacceptable for various reasons.

(i) The validity in law of the defence raised by the respondent's defence and counterclaim (if he establishes the pleaded facts) was recognised in the judgment of the county court judge and has never been in issue in the appellants' application to strike out that pleading (see also the judgment of Parker L.J. in the Court of Appeal). The right to resist a claim by a public authority by a defence that it is acting ultra vires or unlawfully in making the claim is very well established by a line of authority, much of it growing from Anisminic Ltd. v. Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 A.C. 147, 171B–G, 195B, 196B, 206D–E, 207H–208A, 214E–F, 215A–D, and including, in the Privy Council, Attorney-General v. Ryan [1980] A.C. 718, 729H–730D, 731H–732D and

A Dunlop v. Woollahra Municipal Council [1982] A.C. 158, 172C–E. Recent cases in the Court of Appeal in which such defences have succeeded in defeating money claims by public authorities include Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Industry Training Board v. Kent [1970] 2 Q.B. 19 and South West Water Authority v. Rumble's [1984] 1 W.L.R. 800. See also Cannock Chase District Council v. Kelly [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1.

(ii) Section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and R.S.C., Ord. 53, B deal only with the initiation of proceedings and neither explicitly nor implicitly with rights of defence (or even of set off and counterclaim). In this respect, they can be contrasted with the provisions of section 28 of the Limitation Act 1939 (now repealed) and section 35 of the Limitation Act 1980. The radical revision of R.S.C., Ord. 53, in 1977–1981 made no change in substantive law: Reg. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, C Ex parte National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. [1982] A.C. 617, 631A, 644H–645A, 647G–648D, 664E. There was a deliberate decision not to extend judicial review to cases where the invalidity of administrative action was set up by way of defence: see Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262, 276E–G, 277F–G, per Lord Wilberforce. It is a change of substance to remove a right to a defence and substitute an opportunity to take proceedings. Thus before D the reforms in 1977 the tenant in Cannock Chase District Council v. Kelly [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1 had a right to his defence. If the appellants are correct on this issue, then the tenant has lost the right. At the best he has an opportunity to persuade a judge of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court to allow him to bring proceedings by way of judicial review.

E The principles as to abuse of process formulated and applied in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 turned entirely upon the provisions of section 31 and R.S.C., Ord. 53: see [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 280D–285E, and [1983] 2 A.C. 286, 294E, 295C–F. The procedural analysis which is the basis of the O'Reilly decision (applied in Cocks) and its formulation of policy does not apply to defences: [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 280B–285E. It is F emphasised that section 31(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 does not apply to defences by its express terms. R.S.C., Ord. 53, rule 1, is in identical language.

(iii) On the "should not" aspect of this point, the respondent draws attention to the possible delay and uncertainty being overcome by the doctrine of laches and the availability to the public authority itself of an G ordinary action for the declaration that the passing of the resolutions in question was not ultra vires. If the appellants' contentions succeed, the effect will be to extinguish retrospectively, as rights, rights of defence invocable without specific limit of time and to substitute for them discretionary remedies recourse to which is subject to short and rigorous time limits. That is a result which could only be accomplished by clear words in the statute or rule relied upon: Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. H Ministry of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260, 286, 290–91, 304; Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262, 274H, 279C–D; Anisminic Ltd. v. Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 A.C. 147, per Lord Reid; and Reg. v. Bracknell Justices, Ex parte

Griffiths [1976] A.C. 314, 331, per Lord Edmund-Davies. The respondent also supports the proposition that the doctrine of O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 cannot be extended to a defence of the present nature. If the appellants are correct, there will be a category of legal right which cannot be asserted by way of defence, but only established first in another jurisdiction.

(iv) The course adopted by the county court judge and urged by the appellants, namely, staying county court proceedings so that the defence that the appellants' demand is unlawful can be explored in judicial review proceedings if the respondent obtained leave to bring such proceedings, is (a) inconsistent with the provisions of and/or the public policy expressed in section 74 of the County Courts Act 1959, and of section 49 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, and (b) would subject the respondent to an awkward and uncertain process to which he ought not to be subjected unless that is required by statute: Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262, 274G–H, 276F–G, and Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. Ministry of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260, 286, 290–91, 304.

Finally, in the alternative to the submission that section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, R.S.C., Ord. 53, and O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 have no effect on rights of defence, the respondent submits that they have no such effect where the defence raised is a "true defence" or "pure defence" in the sense in which those expressions are used in Henriksens Rederi A/S v. T.H.Z. Rolimpex [1974] Q.B. 233, 245G–249A, 251D–252F, 260C–261C. Such a defence can, as the judgments in that case showed, be relied upon even where there is an express statutory provision that no action shall be brought in respect of it. The defence raised by the respondents' pleading in this action is such a true or pure defence, being wholly intrinsic to the claim made in the action.

In summary, a secure tenant has rights and liabilities in private law according to the terms of his secure tenancy. His rights include the right to occupy the demised premises. His liabilities include a liability to pay rent. The rent may be varied unilaterally by the landlord by a valid, intra vires, notice of variation pursuant to the statutory power conferred by section 40(4) of the Housing Act 1980. It is ultra vires the council to make unreasonable charges for a secure tenancy (section 111 of the Housing Act 1957). A purported notice of increase purporting to increase the rent to an unreasonable level is ultra vires the council. It is therefore void and a nullity. Such a notice of increase is not a valid notice of increase within section 40(4). It is incapable of affecting the tenant's rights or liabilities under his secure tenancy. His pre-existing liability to pay rent at the level in force before service of the notice is unaffected. If the council sues to recover an unreasonable rent and/or for possession relying on alleged arrears, the tenant is entitled by way of defence to deny any indebtedness. In so doing the tenant is not relying on rights protected only in public law; he is asserting and defending his private law rights. In order to determine what are the private law rights and liabilities of the tenant the county court must determine the public law issue whether the notices of increase are valid. The challenge to the

A validity of the notices is therefore a collateral (public law) issue in an ordinary action concerning the (private law) rights and liabilities of landlord and tenant. The general rule requiring such challenges to be made under R.S.C., Ord. 53, does not apply. The tenant could equally well commence an action for or counterclaim for a declaration that his private law rights and liabilities are unaffected by the purported notice of increase.

B Lydiard following. (1) In the present case, if the defence is successful on the merits, then there is no question of the court exercising its discretion. The respondent must win as of right: see An Bord Bainne Co-operative Ltd. (Irish Dairy Board) v. Milk Marketing Board [1984] 2 C.M.L.R. 584, 588, para. 13, 589, para. 15. The position of a defendant cannot be worse than that of a plaintiff. (2) R.S.C., Ord. 53, is not C suitable in the circumstances of the present case because the defence raised substantial issues of fact which cannot conveniently be determined in judicial review proceedings: Reg. v. Jenner [1983] 1 W.L.R. 873, 877. (3) As to the justice of R.S.C., Ord. 53, being applied to the present case, there is a peculiar injustice in relation to a poor litigant, such as the respondent who has to rely on legal aid. The risk to an impecunious litigant is that the legal aid committee might conclude that the sum D involved is too small to justify the grant of legal aid, on the ground that a private litigant would not bring proceedings for so small a sum.

Scrivener Q.C. in reply.

[LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON said that their Lordships did not wish to hear the appellants on the respondent's first submission.]

It is not disputed that O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, E cannot interfere with private law rights. Accordingly, it must first be ascertained whether the present claim involves a private or public law remedy. For this purpose it is necessary to consider the pleadings. The defence discloses that it is the decision of a local authority which is being attacked. The registrar will then know that it can only be a review-type approach. It is apparent that it will not be open to the public authority to plead limitation in this case, for the Limitation Acts F do not apply in this type of case. The defendant has to set up here a specific defence of ultra vires and the onus is on him to prove that defence.

In the present case, the attack is on the decision of a public authority. In Cannock Chase District Council v. Kelly [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1, the attack was on the notice to quit served on the tenant. That is a G considerable difference. The Cannock Chase case was rightly decided, for it was not concerned with a public law attack. In the present case, it is an attack on a public law claim albeit it affects the respondent's rights in private law; for it is a claim for an increase in rent.

Assuming this is an action for a declaration, the local authority could not plead the Limitation Act. The respondent, if going for judicial review, which again is a discretionary remedy, is subject to the three H month period and the necessity to obtain leave. It follows that if the respondent is right, by bringing an action for a declaration a defendant could sidestep the provisions of section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and judicial review would become a dead letter against public authorities. It is for this reason that the House should consider O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 in this connection. The object of section 31(6) was not to assist applicants, but to prevent the harassment of public authorities. [Reference was made to Reg. v. Bromley London Borough Council, Ex parte Lambeth London Borough Council, The Times, 16 June 1984, Hodgson J.]

A section 31(2) type of declaration is the correct type of declaration to be sought in relation to public law rights. It cannot be right that if judicial review by way of a declaration is refused against a public authority, that an applicant can then commence fresh proceedings by way of an action for a declaration in the Chancery Division. The appellants are not attempting to take away the respondent's rights, but they do state that his right to proceed against a public authority is governed by the decision of this House in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237. If the above submission be correct, can it be right for a defendant to sit back and do nothing? On a point of procedure, Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 36 (1981), para. 30, n. 2 shows that the plea of "never indebted" was abolished in 1889. See also Odgers, Pleading and Practice, 19th ed. (1966), p. 83.

If the defendant founds his defence on the invalidity of specific resolutions of the local authority, he must aver them. The onus is on the defendant. In Cannock Chase District Council v. Kelly [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1, 7E, 10D, the local authority called no evidence. As to the limits of a declaration, Wade, Administrative Law, 5th ed., p. 529 is adopted.

A defence such as the present does not suffice against the claim of a public authority because it still leaves the resolution of the public authority intact. But it does not avail the defendant to put in a counterclaim, for the decision of the local authority is not confined to him, but includes all other council tenants.

In conclusion, there is a presumption of regularity in relation to the decisions and resolutions and acts of a public body: O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 285A. Further, the purpose of section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 is to maintain the good administration of public law. [Reference was also made to Wade, Administrative Law, 5th ed., pp. 304–306, 308–310.]

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

29 November. LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON. My Lords, the question in this appeal is whether it is an abuse of process for an individual, who claims that his existing rights under a contract have been infringed by a decision of a public authority, to challenge the decision in defence to an action at the instance of the public authority for payment, instead of by judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53. The appeal is a sequel to the decisions of this House in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286.

Immediately before 6 April 1981, the respondent was, and had been for some time, the tenant of a flat at Tangley Grove in Wandsworth on a weekly tenancy at a weekly rent of £12·06. He had a secure tenancy in the sense of section 28 of the Housing Act 1980. The landlords were the

A London Borough of Wandsworth, the appellants. On 2 March 1981, the appellants gave notice to the respondent under section 40(1) and (4) of the Act of 1980 that with effect from 6 April 1981, the rent would be increased to £16·56 per week. The respondent regarded the increase as unreasonable and he so informed the appellants. He refused to pay the increased rent; instead he paid the old rent of £12·06 and an increase of 8 per cent. which he regarded as reasonable. The following year in B March, the appellants gave notice of a further increase in the rent to £18·53 with effect from 5 April 1982. The respondent again refused to pay the increased rent and paid only such rent as he considered reasonable.

On 16 August 1982, the appellants took proceedings against the respondent in Wandsworth County Court claiming arrears of rent, and C also claiming possession of the premises on the ground that the rent lawfully due had not been paid. Non-payment of rent is ground 1 for recovery of possession under Schedule 4 to the Act of 1980. The respondent defended the action on the ground that the appellants' decisions to make the increases, and the increases themselves were ultra vires and void as being unreasonable. He also counterclaimed for a declaration that the notices of increase of rent were ultra vires and void D and of no effect, and for a declaration that the rent payable under his tenancy was £12·06 per week.

The action has caused a considerable divergence of judicial opinion so far. The appellants applied to strike out the paragraphs of the defence and counterclaim which asserted that the decisions and notices were void. Mr. Registrar Price dismissed the application to strike out. E Judge White allowed the appellants' appeal against the registrar's order, and stayed the proceedings to allow the respondent to apply for leave to apply for judicial review out of time. The respondent did apply for such leave but his application was refused. He then appealed to the Court of Appeal and that court, by a majority (Robert Goff and Parker L.JJ., Ackner L.J. dissenting) allowed his appeal against the order of Judge White.

F Until 6 April 1981, the respondent had a contractual right to occupy the flat, provided he paid the rent of £12·06 and complied with the other terms of the tenancy. That was an ordinary private law right under a contract. But by section 40 of the Act of 1980, the appellants were entitled to vary the terms of the tenancy unilaterally by a notice of variation, subject to certain conditions not here material. In addition to G complying with the express statutory conditions, the appellants when they exercised their power under section 40(4) were also bound to act reasonably in the Wednesbury sense: see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 K.B. 223. That is made clear beyond doubt by the Housing Act 1957, section 111(1), which provides as follows:

H "The general management, regulation and control of houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the authority, and the authority may make such reasonable charges for the tenancy or occupation of the houses as they may determine." (Emphasis added.)

In Luby v. Newcastle-under-Lyme Corporation [1964] 2 Q.B. 64, 72, Diplock L.J. (as my noble and learned friend then was) referring to this provision, said:

> " 'Reasonable' in the context in which it appears in section 111(1) of the Housing Act 1957, is in my view to be construed as the converse of 'unreasonable' in the sense in which it is used by Lord Greene M.R. [in the Wednesbury Corporation case [1948] 1 K.B. 223, 229] . . . The court's control over the exercise by a local authority of a discretion conferred upon it by Parliament is limited to ensuring that the local authority had acted within the powers conferred. It is not for the court to substitute its own view of what is a desirable policy in relation to the subject matter of the discretion so conferred. It is only if it is exercised in a manner which no reasonable man could consider justifiable that the court is entitled to interfere."

The respondent seeks to show in the course of his defence in these proceedings that the appellants' decisions to increase the rent were such as no reasonable man could consider justifiable. But your Lordships are not concerned in this appeal to decide whether that contention is right or wrong. The only issue at this stage is whether the respondent is entitled to put forward the contention as a defence in the present proceedings. The appellants say that he is not because the only procedure by which their decision could have been challenged was by judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53. The respondent was refused leave to apply for judicial review out of time and (say the appellants) he has lost the opportunity to challenge the decisions. The appellants rely on the decisions of this House in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 and Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286. The respondent accepts that judicial review would have been an appropriate procedure for the purpose, but he maintains that it is not the only procedure open to him, and that he was entitled to wait until he was sued by the appellants and then to defend the proceedings, as he has done.

In order to deal with these contentions, it is necessary to consider what was decided by the House in those two cases. The question raised in O'Reilly [1983] 2 A.C. 237 was the same as that in the present case, although of course, the circumstances were different. In O'Reilly Lord Diplock said, at p. 274:

> "All that is at issue in the instant appeal is the procedure by which such relief ought to be sought. Put in a single sentence the question for your Lordships is: whether in 1980 after R.S.C., Ord. 53 in its new form, adopted in 1977, had come into operation it was an abuse of the process of the court to apply for such declarations [sc. that a decision of a public authority was void] by using the procedure laid down in the Rules for proceedings begun by writ or by originating summons instead of using the procedure laid down by Ord. 53 for an application for judicial review . . ."

In that case four prisoners in Hull prison had started proceedings, in three cases by writ and in one case by originating summons, each

A seeking to establish that a disciplinary award of forfeiture of remission of sentence made by the Board of Visitors of Hull Prison was void because the board had failed to observe the rules of natural justice. This House held that the proceedings were an abuse of the process of the court, and that the only proper remedy open to the prisoners was by way of judicial review under Ord. 53. There are two important differences between the facts in O'Reilly and those in the present case. B First, the plaintiffs in O'Reilly had not suffered any infringement of their rights in private law; their complaint was that they had been ordered to forfeit part of their remission of sentence but they had no right in private law to such a remission, which was granted only as a matter of indulgence. Consequently, even if the board of visitors had acted contrary to the rules of natural justice when making the award, the C members of the board would not have been liable in damages to the prisoners. In the present case what the respondent complains of is the infringement of a contractual right in private law. Secondly, in O'Reilly the prisoners had initiated the proceedings, and Lord Diplock, throughout in his speech, treated the question only as one affecting a claim for infringing a right of the plaintiff while in the present case the respondent is the defendant. The decision on O'Reilly is therefore not D directly in point in the present case, but the appellants rely particularly on a passage in a speech of Lord Diplock, with whose speech the other members of the Appellate Committee agreed, at p. 285:

> "Now that those disadvantages to applicants [for judicial review] have been removed and all remedies for infringements of rights protected by public law can be obtained upon an application for E judicial review, as can also remedies for infringements of rights under private law if such infringements should also be involved, it would in my view as a general rule be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to F proceed by way of an ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities.
> "My Lords, I have described this as a general rule; for though it may normally be appropriate to apply it by the summary process of striking out the action, there may be exceptions, particularly where the invalidity of the decision arises as a collateral issue in a claim for infringement of a right of the plaintiff arising under private law, G or where none of the parties objects to the adoption of the procedure by writ or originating summons. Whether there should be other exceptions should, in my view, at this stage in the development of procedural public law, be left to be decided on a case to case basis—a process that your Lordships will be continuing in the next case in which judgment is to be delivered today [Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286]."

The last paragraph in that quotation shows that Lord Diplock was careful to emphasise that the general rule which he had stated in the previous paragraph might well be subject to exceptions. The question for your Lordships is whether the instant appeal is an exception to the general rule. It might be possible to treat this case as falling within one of the exceptions suggested by Lord Diplock, if the question of the invalidity of the appellants' decision had arisen as a collateral issue in a claim by the respondent (as defendant) for infringement of his right arising under private law to continue to occupy the flat. But I do not consider that the question of invalidity is truly collateral to the issue between the parties. Although it is not mentioned in the appellants' statement of claim, it is the whole basis of the respondent's defence and it is the central issue which has to be decided. The case does not therefore fall within any of the exceptions specifically suggested in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237.

Immediately after the decision in O'Reilly, the House applied the general rule in the case of Cocks [1983] 2 A.C. 286. The proceedings in O'Reilly had begun before the Supreme Court Act 1981 (especially section 31) was passed. The proceedings in Cocks were begun after that Act was passed, but for the present purpose nothing turns on that distinction. Cocks was an action by a homeless person claiming that the local housing authority had a duty to provide permanent accommodation for him. The council resolved that the plaintiff had become homeless "intentionally" in the sense of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. Consequently the plaintiff had no right in private law to be provided with permanent housing accommodation by the authority. The plaintiff raised an action in the county court claiming, inter alia, a declaration that the council were in breach of their duty to him in not having provided him with permanent accommodation. In order to proceed in his action he had to show as a condition precedent that the council's decision was invalid. This House held that the plaintiff was not entitled to impugn the council's decision in public law otherwise than by judicial review, notwithstanding that the effect of the decision was to prevent him from "establishing a necessary condition precedent to the statutory private law right which he [was seeking] to enforce": see per my noble and learned friend, Lord Bridge of Harwich, at p. 294E. The essential difference between that case and the present is that the impugned decision of the local authority did not deprive the plaintiff of a pre-existing private law right; it prevented him from establishing a new private law right. There is also the same distinction as in O'Reilly [1983] 2 A.C. 237, namely, that the party complaining of the decision was the plaintiff.

Although neither O'Reilly nor Cocks [1983] 2 A.C. 286 is an authority which directly applies to the facts of the instant appeal, it is said on behalf of the appellants that the principle underlying those decisions applies here, and that, if the respondent is successful, he will be evading that principle. My Lords, I cannot agree. The principle underlying those decisions, as Lord Diplock explained in O'Reilly [1983] 2 A.C. 237, 284, is that there is a "need, in the interests of good administration and of third parties who may be indirectly affected by the decision, for speedy certainty as to whether it has the effect of a decision that is valid in public law." The main argument urged on behalf of the appellants was that this is a typical case where there is a need for

A speedy certainty in the public interest. I accept, of course, that the decision in this appeal will indirectly affect many third parties including many of the appellants' tenants, and perhaps most if not all of their ratepayers because if the appellants' impugned decisions are held to be invalid, the basis of their financial administration since 1981 will be upset. That would be highly inconvenient from the point of view of the appellants, and of their ratepayers, and it would be a great advantage to B them if persons such as the respondent who seek to challenge their decision were limited to doing so by procedure under Order 53. Such procedure is speedy and avoids prolonged uncertainty about the validity of decisions. An intending applicant for judicial review under Order 53 has to obtain leave to apply, so that unmeritorious applications can be dismissed in limine and an application must normally be made within a C limited period of three months after the decision which has impugned, unless the court allows an extension of time in any particular case. Procedure under Order 53 also affords protection to public authorities in other ways, which are explained in O'Reilly and which I need not elaborate here. It may well be that such protection to public authorities tends to promote good administration. But there may be other ways of obtaining speedy decisions; for example in some cases it may be possible D for a public authority itself to initiate proceedings for judicial review. In any event, the arguments for protecting public authorities against unmeritorious or dilatory challenges to their decisions have to be set against the arguments for preserving the ordinary rights of private citizens to defend themselves against unfounded claims.

It would in my opinion be a very strange use of language to describe E the respondent's behaviour in relation to this litigation as an abuse or misuse by him of the process of the court. He did not select the procedure to be adopted. He is merely seeking to defend proceedings brought against him by the appellants. In so doing he is seeking only to exercise the ordinary right of any individual to defend an action against him on the ground that he is not liable for the whole sum claimed by the plaintiff. Moreover he puts forward his defence as a matter of right, F whereas in an application for judicial review, success would require an exercise of the court's discretion in his favour. Apart from the provisions of Order 53 and section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, he would certainly be entitled to defend the action on the ground that the plaintiff's claim arises from a resolution which (on his view) is invalid: see for example Cannock Chase District Council v. Kelly [1978] 1 G W.L.R. 1, which was decided in July 1977, a few months before Order 53 came into force (as it did in December 1977). I find it impossible to accept that the right to challenge the decision of a local authority in course of defending an action for non-payment can have been swept away by Order 53, which was directed to introducing a procedural reform. As my noble and learned friend Lord Scarman said in Reg. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Ex parte Federation of Self Employed H and Small Businesses Ltd. [1982] A.C. 617, 647G "The new R.S.C., Ord. 53 is a procedural reform of great importance in the field of public law, but it does not—indeed, cannot—either extend or diminish the substantive law. Its function is limited to ensuring 'ubi jus, ibi remedium.'" Lord

Wilberforce spoke to the same effect at p. 631A. Nor, in my opinion, did section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 which refers only to "an application" for judicial review have the effect of limiting the rights of a defendant sub silentio. I would adopt the words of Viscount Simonds in Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. Ministry of Housing and Local Government [1960] A.C. 260, 286 as follows:

> "It is a principle not by any means to be whittled down that the subject's recourse to Her Majesty's courts for the determination of his rights is not to be excluded except by clear words."

The argument of the appellants in the present case would be directly in conflict with that observation.

If the public interest requires that persons should not be entitled to defend actions brought against them by public authorities, where the defence rests on a challenge to a decision by the public authority, then it is for Parliament to change the law.

I would dismiss the appeal.

The defendants took part in a peaceful, non-obstructive assembly on a highway in respect of which there was in force an order under section 14A of the Public Order Act 1986,[1] as inserted by section 70 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, prohibiting the holding of trespassory assemblies. They were convicted before justices of taking part in a trespassory assembly knowing it to be prohibited, contrary to section 14B(2) of the Act of 1986, as inserted. On appeal, the Crown Court held that there was no case for them to answer on the basis that the holding of a peaceful, non-obstructive assembly was part of the public's limited rights of access to the highway and so was not prohibited by the order. The Divisional Court allowed an appeal by the Director of Public Prosecutions. G might enjoy for any reasonable purpose, provided that the activity in question did not amount to a public or private nuisance and did not obstruct the highway by unreasonably impeding the public's primary right to pass and repass, and within those qualifications there was a public right of peaceful assembly on the highway; that (per Lord Clyde) a peaceful assembly for a reasonable period that did not unreasonably obstruct the highway was not necessarily unlawful, nor did it necessarily constitute a trespassory assembly within sections 14A and 14B(2) of the Act of 1986, the matter being essentially one to be judged in the light of the particular facts; that (per Lord Hutton) the right of public assembly could, in certain circumstances, be exercised on the highway provided that it caused no obstruction to persons passing along the highway and that the tribunal of fact found that it had been a reasonable user; and that, in the circumstances, the Crown Court had been entitled to allow the defendants' appeals (post, pp. 254G–255A, F–G, 257D–G, 279C–F, 281B–F, G–H, 288D–E, 291A–B, 292H–293B, 294A).

APPEAL from the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division.

This was an appeal by the defendants, Margaret Jones and Richard D Lloyd, by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Lloyd of Berwick, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Clyde) given on 14 January 1988 from the judgment of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (McCowan L.J. and Collins J.) on 23 January 1997 allowing an appeal by the Director of Public Prosecutions by case stated from the decision of the Crown Court at Salisbury (Judge MacLaren Webster Q.C. and justices). E The Crown Court on 4 January 1996 had allowed appeals by the defendants against their convictions by Salisbury justices on 3 October 1995 of offences of trespassory assembly contrary to section 14B(2) of the Public Order Act 1986, as inserted by section 70 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

The point of law of general public importance certified by the Divisional Court was: "Where there is in force an order made under F section 14A(2) [of the Act of 1986, as inserted], and on the public highway within the area and time covered by the order there is a peaceful assembly of 20 or more persons which does not obstruct the highway, does such an assembly exceed the public's right of access to the highway so as to constitute a trespassory assembly within the terms of section 14A?"

The facts are stated in their Lordships' opinions. G

Edward Fitzgerald Q.C., Keir Starmer and Anthony Hudson for the defendants. The public's right of access in the context of the criminal offence of trespassory assembly is not exceeded if the use of the highway is a reasonable use of the highway. A peaceful, non-obstructive assembly is a reasonable use of the highway.

H The definition of "limited" in section 14A(9) of the Act of 1986 is merely illustrative of the type of circumstances in which the public's right of access to land is not absolute. It does not restrict or cut down the public's pre-existing common law right of access. The extent of the public's

A right of access is therefore left untouched by section 14A and is found in the common law. That limited right is not necessarily exceeded by a peaceful, non-obstructive assembly. It is to be inferred from the wording of section 14A(1)(a), including the reference to "conduct," that an assembly can be held on the public highway that does not of itself exceed the limits of the public's right of access to the highway. Parliament intended courts to consider the conduct of the assembly and whether its conduct was B reasonable. If the law were otherwise, much reasonable conduct would amount to a trespass and therefore would be made unlawful by an order under section 14A. It is both inappropriate and contrary to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1953) (Cmd. 8969) for the freedom to carry out such activities to be dependent on the forbearance of the relevant authorities. It is C inappropriate for such a fundamental civil liberty to be subject to potentially arbitrary enforcement.

The early trespass cases (Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142 and Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752) established that the public's right of access extended beyond that of the right to pass and repass and recognised that the breadth of that right would be subject to further D extensions as society developed. The more recent obstruction cases, applying the test in a modern setting and in the context of a criminal offence, show that the test includes consideration of whether the use in question is a "reasonable user" of the highway. Lord Esher M.R.'s formulation of the public's right of access in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, at pp. 146–147 necessarily requires a consideration of what is "reasonable" and necessarily recognises that the answer will change as society does. His E judgment is to be preferred to those of Lopes and Kay L.JJ. as the authoritative statement of the law in 1893, since it was the leading judgment and was cited with approval in Hickman v. Maisey. The "reasonable extensions" recognised as necessary by the Court of Appeal in Hickman v. Maisey in 1900 are found in the subsequent cases on obstruction. Burden v. Rigler [1911] 1 K.B. 337 demonstrates that in F determining whether a public meeting held on a highway is unlawful it is necessary to look at the circumstances of the assembly. McCowan L.J. and Collins J. erred in relying upon Ex parte Lewis (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 191 in support of their conclusion that no right of peaceful, non-obstructive assembly on the highway exists in English law. Ex parte Lewis is of little assistance because (a) the ratio of the decision concerned the jurisdiction G of the Divisional Court to review the decisions of magistrates to refuse to issue summonses; (b) the comments about the public's right of access were obiter; (c) those comments were essentially concerned with the right on the part of the public to occupy Trafalgar Square for the purposes of holding public meetings; (d) Trafalgar Square was completely regulated by Act of Parliament; and (e) any other comments about the public's right of access to the highway are ambiguous and/or not inconsistent with a development H of that right, as demonstrated by Harrison v. Duke of Rutland and Hickman v. Maisey. Reg. v. Graham (1888) 16 Cox.C.C. 420 fails to take account of the concept of reasonable user. [Reference was also made to Review of Public Order Law (1985) (Cmnd. 9510).]

The test of "reasonable user" applied in the obstruction cases is of particular relevance as, like the offence of trespassory assembly, it involves the adoption and application of the civil test of the public's right of access in relation to a criminal offence. To the extent that the definition of the public's right of access found in the obstruction cases differs from the civil law test of trespass, the former is the applicable test when considering the criminal offence of trespassory assembly. The obstruction cases, e.g., Nagy v. Weston [1965] 1 W.L.R. 280 and Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (1986) 85 Cr.App.R. 143, establish that a person whose use of a highway is reasonable has a lawful excuse even if he is a demonstrator. The right to demonstrate peacefully on the public highway has received judicial recognition in Hubbard v. Pitt [1976] Q.B. 142, 174–175, 177D–G, 178E–H; Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, 85 Cr.App.R. 143, 151–152 and Lord Scarman's statement in his report on The Red Lion Square Disorders of 15 June 1974 (1975) (Cmnd. 5919), p. 38, para. 6. Concepts based on the protection of private rights of ownership must be modified when dealing with a publicly owned highway, the public ownership of which engages the state's duty to protect and foster the right to peaceful demonstration. [Reference was made to Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v. Canada (1991) 77 D.L.R. (4th) 385, 393–394; Lowdens v. Keaveney [1903] 2 I.R. 82, 86–87, 89–91; Cooper v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1985) 82 Cr.App.R. 238, 242 and section 137 of the Highways Act of 1980.

Rights, although not "positive" in the sense that they are enshrined in statute, nonetheless exist in the sense that under English law it is recognised that citizens are entitled to act unless their conduct is restricted by law: see Wheeler v. Leicester City Council [1985] A.C. 1054, 1065C and Attorney-General v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 A.C. 109, 178. Individuals have freedom, and therefore a right, to engage in activity on the highway so long as it does not constitute a civil wrong or a criminal offence in other words, so long as it does not transgress that which is reasonable and usual. Collins J. [1998] Q.B. 563, 571 erred in rejecting the approach of the Crown Court on the ground that the public's right of access, "must mean a right given by law." It is a misconceived approach in the context of English law, to look for a positive right of freedom of assembly. It is necessary to start from the premise that the public has right of access, including potentially to assemble, except to the extent that that right is restricted by law. The law restricts the right of access to the extent that it does not amount to passage or repassage and reasonable and usual user. If, in a particular set of circumstances, an assembly constitutes reasonable and usual usage, the public has a right to so assemble. The magistrates will take account of that is usual. Collins J.'s analysis at pp. 571–572, that "a right to do something only exists if it cannot be stopped: the fact that it would not be stopped does not create a right to do it" is, in the present context, also misconceived. The public does have a right of access to public highways. The argument is over the extent of that right. The public's right of access is a right to engage in activity on the highway that is reasonable and usual. If such activity is neither a trespass nor a criminal offence it cannot be stopped unless and until the limits of reasonableness are exceeded. [Reference was made to articles 10 and 11 of

A the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundmental Freedoms (1953) (Cmd. 8969).] The judgment of the Divisional Court creates a fundamental divergence between English laws and the Convention. The highway should be regarded as a public place or open space where all activities may reasonably go on. The test of reasonableness will be the same in all cases, but the fact that the land in question is private rather than public property may be a factor to be taken into B account. [Reference was made to Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th ed. (1965), pp. 270–272 and Aldred. v. Miller, 1924 J.C. 117, 120.]

Collins J. erred in distinguishing Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire as he did, at p. 573D: see the commentary of Professor Sir John Smith on the decision of the Divisional Court [1997] Crim.L.R. 599, 600. C Moreover, the judgment of Glidewell L.J. in Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, at p. 150, makes it clear that lawful excuse is not limited as suggested by Collins J. "in terms of offending" in the context of the criminal offence of obstruction. The effect of the Divisional Court's judgment is to create an unfortunate dichotomy whereby peaceful non-obstructive assembly is deemed a reasonable user of the highway and therefore lawful when obstruction charges are preferred but unreasonable D user of the highway and therefore unlawful when trespassory assembly charges are preferred.

Starmer following. The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms is relevant in two respects: (a) as an aid to statutory interpretation; (b) as a yardstick against which to resolve any uncertainty in the common law or to guide its development: E see Derbyshire County Council v. Times Newspaper Ltd. [1992] Q.B. 770.

The obligation on a contracting party to the Convention under article 1 to "secure" to its citizens the right to freedom of peaceful assembly under article 11 and to provide an "effective remedy" in cases of arguable violation (article 13) requires domestic law to recognise a "right" to peaceful assembly; a mere practice of tolerance or non-interference (even if established on the facts) is not enough, being ineffective and F illusory. The analysis of article 11(1) by Collins J. is wrong. The wording of article 11 suggests a positive right of peaceful assembly and limits restrictions on that right: see Rassemblement jurassien v. Switzerland (1979) 17 D. & R. 93. In keeping with the constant jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice and the Commission of Human Rights, any restrictions on the right of peaceful assembly should be narrowly construed. An G unfettered discretion on the part of a local authority or private landlord to restrict the public's right of peaceful assembly is wholly inconsistent with the requirements of article 11(2). For the proper approach to restrictions such as those under article 11(2), see Sunday Times v. United Kingdom (1979) 2 E.H.R.R. 245. An unfettered discretion to restrict the public's right of peaceful assembly is not prescribed by law because the circumstances in which it can be exercised are arbitrary, nor will any H restriction necessarily pursue a legitimate aim, and the pre-conditions of necessity will not be met. [Reference was made to Attorney-General v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 A.C. 109, 283 and Anderson v. United Kingdom [1998] E.H.R.L.R. 218.]

The wording of article 11 has to be read with article 1 (the obligation to secure Convention rights) and article 13 (the obligation to provide an effective remedy for arguable violations). For proper approach to article 13, see Plattform "Ärzte für das Leben" v. Austria (1988) 13 E.H.R.R. 204, 209–210, paras. 25, 28–34. If the Director of Public Prosecutions were right in his assertion that the right of peaceful assembly under article 11 is "secured" in the United Kingdom through tolerance or non-interference, article 11 read in conjunction with article 13 would be rendered meaningless. The narrow view advocated by him is wholly inconsistent with the approach of the European Court of Human Rights to positive obligations arising under article 11. This approach is consistent with the "principle of effectiveness" developed by the court and the Commission. The conclusion should be that section 14A of the Act of 1986 and/or the common law of civil trespass to the highway can be reconciled with the Convention only if the right to peaceful assembly is recognised wthin the public's right of access to the highway. If this is right, recourse to article 11(2) is unnecessary. [Reference was made to The Greek Case (1969) 12 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights, pp. 170–171, paras. 392–394.]

The right to peaceful assembly under article 11 of the Convention includes a right to assemble on the highway: Rassemblement jurassien v. Switzerland, p. 17 D. & R. 93, pp. 118–119, para. 3, Plattform and Anderson v. United Kingdom [1998] E.H.R.L.R. 218.

Unless the order in issue in this case is construed narrowly so as to exclude the assembly in issue, it cannot be justified as "necessary in a democratic society" under article 11(2) of the Convention: Christians against Racism and Fascism v. United Kingdom (1980) 21 D. & R. 138, 149–150. No issue under article 11(1) arose there because (i) the effect of an order under section 3(3) of the Public Order Act 1936, now section 13(1) of the Act of 1986, was to ban all public processions, with one or two exceptions, not just those taking place in prohibited circumstances, and (ii) a right to process has always been recognised. The pre-conditions to making an order under section 3(3) of the Act of 1936 were much stricter than those under section 14A of the Act of 1986. The House of Lords should draw on the Commission's comments about the narrow circumspection of the order in question and, by analogy, construe the order in question in these proceedings so as to ring-fence and thereby preserve the applicants' right of peaceful assembly under article 11 of the Convention. The principle of proportionality derived from paragraph (2) of articles 10 and 11 requires section 14A of the Act of 1986 to be construed so as to ensure, if possible, that an order made under that section does not infringe the rights guaranteed under paragraph (1) of articles 10 and 11.

Chappell v. United Kingdom (1987) 10 E.H.R.R. 510 does not advance the issue for determination. It concerned rights of access to Stonehenge itself and was not dealing with article 11 rights on the highway.

The "margin of appreciation," being a principle of international law applicable on the international plane, is irrelevant to the determination of the present issues: see Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights (1995) pp. 12–15. In any event, as Christians

A against Racism and Fascism v. United Kingdom shows, the Strasbourg bodies apply a fairly strict test even when the margin of appreciation is in play.

Victor Temple Q.C. and Michael Butt for the Director of Public Prosecutions. The question whether an assembly on the highway is a trespassory assembly is to be determined only by reference to the common law relating to rights of access to the highway and the principles of B trespass. This is a consequence of the clear language of section 14A(9) of the Act of 1986. It is clear from the definition of "limited" in section 14A(9) that, where the land in question is a highway or road, to which there is only a limited right of access for the public, use of the land in excess of the right is intended to fall within the "prohibited circumstances" of section 14A(5)(b). It is also clear that the draftsman has C singled out highways as being the starting-point of any test, so that all that one has to do is to look at the public right of access to the highway. Since the authorities are all one way in showing that this is limited to passing and trepassing for the purposes of legitimate travel and purposes incidental thereto, section 14A(9) is not opening the floodgates to general use of the highway. [Reference was also made to section 328 and 329 of the Highways Act 1980.]

D The limits of the public's rights of access to the highway have been established by a very long line of clear and settled authority: see Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue, vol. 21 (1995), pp. 77–78, para. 110; Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142, 146–147, 152, 154, 155–156; Dovaston v. Payne (1795) 2 H.Bl. 527; Reg. v. Pratt (1855) 4 E. & B. 860; Llandudno Urban District Council v. Woods [1899] 2 Ch. 705; Hickman v. E Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752; Fielden v. Cox (1906) 22 T.L.R. 411 and Liddle v. Yorkshire (North Riding) County Council [1934] 2 K.B. 101. Any extension to the right to pass and repass must always be consistent with the paramount principle that the right of the public is that of passage.

If the applicants are correct and the public's right of access is based on reasonableness, that would, being contrary to a long line of authority, constitute a fundamental and radical extension to the common law, which F is not a matter for the judiciary: see C. (A Minor) v. Director of Public Prosecutions [1996] A.C. 1.

Use of the highway for purposes other than passing and repassing, etc., is prima facie trespass. In particular, there is no right to use the highway for static meetings, assemblies, protests or demonstrations, peaceful or otherwise. Such activities, while commonly taking place on the highway G without hindrance or objection, are nevertheless acts of trespass if they are not licensed or permitted. The Salvation Army holding a service on the highway do, strictly speaking, commit a trespassory offence. The order in this case was made for good reason, anticipating trouble. Where no order is made, as would be the case with the Salvation Army, charitable collections, tourists and so on, the fact that there is, strictly speaking, an offence does not in practice give rise to problems, tolerance and common H sense inevitably prevailing. However, it is still necessary to have the power to remove even prima facie peaceful groups, because otherwise the position could arise where the first 20 were joined by another 20, and so on, and they became violent or, in the case of Stonehenge, make an excursion over the perimeter fence. [Reference was made to Dovaston v. Payne, 2 H.Bl. 527, 530; Reg. v. Pratt, 4 E.&B. 860, 868–869; Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, [1893] 1 Q.B. 142, 152–153; Llandudno Urban District Council v. Woods [1899] 2 Ch. 705, 709; Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752, 755–756, 757–758 and Fielden v. Cox.]

Certain activities incidental to passage and repassage on the public highway may be considered necessary, usual and reasonable for the purpose of exercising the right. Such activities will not be trespass if they do not go further than use of the highway as a highway and are not inconsistent with the paramount idea that the right of the public is a right of passage: see Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142, 146, 147, 156; Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752, 756, 757–758 and Randall v. Tarrant [1955] 1 W.L.R. 255, 259–260. An activity which is "lawful" in itself is not prevented thereby from being a trespass on the highway: see Reg. v. Pratt, 4 E.&B. 860 and Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142, 146. There is no authority for the proposition that a static assembly, meeting or demonstration on the public highway is to be considered a use incidental to the right of passage and repassage. Such use is wholly inconsistent with the dedication of a public highway, and must therefore prima facie be a trespass on the highway: see De Morgan v. Metropolitan Board of Works (1880) 5 Q.B.D. 155, 157; Homer v. Cadman (1886) 16 Cox C.C. 51, 54; Ex parte, Lewis (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 191, 197 and Reg. v. Graham (1888) 16 Cox C.C. 420 and compare L. L. Ferguson Ltd. v. O'Gorman [1937] I.R. 620, 644, 648. Attempts to demonstrate the existence of a common law right to hold assemblies on the highway (see the argument advanced in Burden v. Rigler [1911] 1 K.B. 337) are misconceived. In that case a political meeting held on the highway in the course of an election was at least tacitly licensed by the urban authority and could not therefore have been a trespass against it. No evidence of obstruction or nuisance had been called. The justices were held to have been wrong in finding that all meetings on the highway were unlawful for the purposes of the Public Meeting Act 1908, but it is plain that the judgment of Lord Alverstone C.J. was concerned with the question of the statute and the matter of obstruction. It has nothing to say about trespass and does not establish any general principle that the only meetings on a highway that are unlawful are those that cause a material obstruction.

F

In principle, where a highway vests in the highway authority by virtue of section 263 of the Act of 1980, there appears to be nothing to prevent it from seeking and obtaining relief for acts of trespass on it. Indeed, both at common law and now by statute it has not only the right but the duty to remove obstruction interfering with free passage along the highway and assert and protect the rights of the public to the use and enjoyment of it: see section 130 of the Act of 1980. In practice, however, throughout the 20th century acts amounting to civil trespass on the highway have been dealt with by way of the criminal offence of obstruction under successive Highway Acts, or by way of prosecutions for public nuisance. For the first time (apart from the offence of burglary), section 14A of the Act of 1986 brings consideration of the civil wrong of trespass into the criminal domain.

H

A Nothing in the obstruction and nuisance cases, or other authority, suggests that the defence of "reasonable use" is relevant where trespass is the issue, as in the context of trespassory assembly. The fact that the defendant is or may be a civil trespasser is immaterial in deciding the lawfulness or otherwise of his activity for the purposes of the criminal offence of obstruction: Lowdens v. Keaveney [1903] 2 I.R. 82 and Nagy v. Weston [1965] 1 W.L.R. 280. Essentially the same test is to be applied in B cases of public nuisance: see Reg. v. Clark (No. 2) [1964] 2 Q.B. 315. These cases establish a defence that excuses liability for specific criminal offences. They do not establish rights that did not exist before. They neither establish nor propose that activities on the highway that may be reasonable in the context of obstruction and nuisance cannot thereby be trespass. "Lawful excuse" in a crimnal case is not the same as a positive right in C civil law: There is no suggestion in Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, 85 Cr.App.R. 143 or any of the obstruction cases that the concept of "reasonable use" has been borrowed from the civil law of trespass, still less does section 137 of the Act of 1980 deem any particular activity to be a reasonable or unreasonable use of the highway. "Reasonable user" has never been a defence to a civil accusation of trespass. It follows that there is nothing inconsistent in an activity being "reasonable" for the D purposes of section 137 and yet remaining a civil wrong in trespass for the purpose of founding an offence under section 14B of the Act of 1986. In such circumstances, the court is saying no more than that it shall not attract a criminal sanction. Further, to say that the public's rights of access to the highway are now determined simply by what is reasonable and usual is an unjustified extension of the principle in the obstruction and nuisance E cases and ignores the clear line of authority in the trespass cases. If an activity is to avoid being a trespass on the highway, it must be incidental to the right of passage and repassage and must not trangress the usual and reasonable mode of using the highway as a highway, or otherwise have the consent of the owner of the surface. The concept of trespass on highways has laid dormant for most of the century. That concept, firmly established in the common law, is now the foundation of section 14A of F the Act of 1986. There can be no warrant for grafting on to it the body of case law that has grown up around obstruction and nuisance.

Recourse to the European Convention to assist in interpretation is neither necessary nor permissible where, as here, English law is settled and unambiguous. It is neither uncertain, nor developing, nor incomplete. Nor is the United Kingdom yet in the position where the courts must resolve G conflicts between the Convention and national law: Derbyshire County Council v. Times Newspapers Ltd. [1992] Q.B. 770, 812E. Any discussion about rights in English law must take into account the difference between countries whose written constitutions confer clearly defined rights on citizens, and countries such as the United Kingdom without written constitutions where rights are only really definable in terms of the extent to which they are restricted or abrogated. Rights such as freedom of H peaceful assembly are "secured" in the United Kingdom for the purposes of article 1 of the Convention through toleration, or non-interference. No general assessment as to whether such rights are secured in accordance with article 1 can be made without reference to tradition and practical experience. Freedom of assembly inevitably raises a number of problems, especially where public meetings are involved. These pose threats to public order through the disruption of communications, the prospect of confrontation with the police and the danger of violence with rivals, the latter claiming their own freedom to demonstrate. The European Commission of Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights have confirmed that in these particular circumstances there are positive duties on a state to protect those exercising their right of freedom of peaceful assembly from violent disturbance by counter-demonstrators.: see Plattform "Ärzte für das Leben" v. Austria (1988) 13 E.H.R.R. 204, 210, para. 32. In none of the cases brought against the United Kingdom under article 11 has it been argued that the relevant freedoms do not exist in the United Kingdom, and the only questions have been whether there has been a restriction on the freedoms and, if so, whether it has been justified under article 11(2). Each case has been decided against the complaint on the basis either that there has been no interference with the freedoms or that, if there has, it was justified under article 11(2) (the so-called state's "margin of appreciation"): Chappell v. United Kingdom, 10 E.H.R.R. 510 and Anderson v. United Kingdom [1998] 2 E.H.R.L.R. 218.

In England, the state and the courts recognise and give practical effect to a "right" of peaceful assembly. Peaceful, non-obstructive demonstrations on the highway are in fact permitted. In 1985 the Government declined to extend to static assemblies the power to ban that was provided in respect of processions and marches: see Review of Public Order Law (1985) (Cmnd. 9510), p. 2, para. 1.7, p. 31–32, para. 5.3. In 1994, however, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 provided a limited such power by the insertion of section 14A into the Act of 1986. The power provided in section 14A to prohibit trespassory assemblies represents an encroachment, albeit limited, on the right to freedom of assembly. This right has never been absolute and has always been subject to the requirement of good order. By 1994, however, events had largely overtaken the 1985 decision. These included various attempts to defy the exclusion of the public from the Stones at Stonehenge and led to successive annual outbreaks of violence and disorder: see Chappell v. United Kingdom and section 19 of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979, as amended by section 33 of and Schedule 4, paragraph 45 to The National Heritage Act 1983.

In any event, such interference with the freedom of peaceful assembly as is caused by a section 14A(2) order is justified under article 11(2) of the Convention. The conditions required to be met before an order under section 14A(1) will issue are entirely compatible with article 11(2): see Rassemblement jurassien v. Switzerland (1979) 17 D. & R. 93, 120. [Reference was also made to section 14A(6) of the Act of 1986.]

It is to be observed that, while English law recognises and gives effect to a right of peaceful assembly as such, there is no legal right to exercise that freedom on the public highway, although commonly that is where assemblies/demonstrations/protests do in fact take place without objection or hindrance.

A Fitzgerald Q.C. in reply. As to "judicial legislation," the concept of reasonable user is nothing new but is simply rationalising the law and two conflicting lines of authority. There is no reason why the common law cannot develop it; indeed, Parliament has expressly left the development of these matters to the courts.

There must be some objective evidence to justify an inference that persons may behave unreasonably. If the assembly is not peaceful and non-B obstructive and there is evidence that the persons involved are a group of conspirators, that right render the user unreasonable.

Article 11(1) of the Convention guarantees a right of peaceful assembly on the highway. That right can only be restricted in pursuit of a legitimate aim under article 11(2), e.g, for the prevention of disorder or crime, and where restriction is "necessary," i.e., is proportionate to the legitimate aim C pursued. If the public's rights of access to a highway include all such uses as are reasonable but not inconsistent with the rights of others to passage, e.g., peaceful assembly, article 11 is complied with in full. If they exclude a right of peaceful assembly, article 11 is not complied with. There is no content to the right given by article 11(1) if the argument for the Director of Public Prosecutions is correct.

D Their Lordships took time for consideration.

4 March 1998. LORD IRVINE OF LAIRG L.C. My Lords, this appeal raises an issue of fundamental constitutional importance: what are the limits of the public's rights of access to the public highway? Are these rights so restricted that they preclude in all circumstances any right of E peaceful assembly on the public highway?

On 1 June 1995 at about 6.40 p.m. Police Inspector Mackie counted 21 people on the roadside verge of the southern side of the A344, adjacent to the perimeter fence of the monument at Stonehenge. Some were bearing banners with the legends, "Never Again," "Stonehenge Campaign 10 years of Criminal Injustice" and "Free Stonehenge." He concluded that they F constituted a "trespassory assembly" and told them so. When asked to move off, many did, but some, including the defendants, Mr. Lloyd and Dr. Jones, were determined to remain and put their rights to the test. They were arrested for taking part in a "trespassory assembly" and convicted by the Salisbury justices on 3 October 1995. Their appeals to the Salisbury Crown Court, however, succeeded. The court held that neither of the defendants, nor any member of their group, was "being destructive, violent, G disorderly, threatening a breach of the peace or, on the evidence, doing anything other than reasonably using the highway."

About an hour before, a different group of people had scaled the fence of the monument and entered it. They had been successfully escorted away by police officers without any violence or arrests; but there were no grounds for apprehension that any of the group of which Mr. Lloyd and Dr. Jones were members proposed an incursion into the area of the H monument.

An appeal by way of case stated to the Divisional Court [1998] Q.B. 563 followed. It was assumed for the purposes of that appeal (per McCowan L.J., at p. 568C) that (a) the grass verge constituted part of the public highway; and (b) the group was peaceful, did not create an obstruction and did not constitute or cause a public nuisance.

A

The defendants had been charged with "trespassory assembly" under section 14B(2) of the Public Order Act 1986 (as inserted by section 70 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994). Section 14A(1) (as inserted) of the Act of 1986 permits a chief officer of police to apply, in certain circumstances, to the local council for an order prohibiting for a specified period "trespassory assemblies" within a specified area. An order of that kind may be obtained only in respect of land "to which the public has no right of access or only a limited right of access;" had been obtained in this case; and covered the area in which the defendants, with others, had assembled.

Section 14A(5) provides:

> "An order prohibiting the holding of trespassory assemblies operates to prohibit any assembly which—(a) is held on land to which the public has no right of access or only a limited right of access, and (b) takes place in prohibited circumstances, that is to say, without the permission of the occupier of the land or so as to exceed the limits of any permission of his or the limits of the public's right of access." (Emphasis added.)

Section 14A(5) thus indicates that a "trespassory assembly" must be "trespassory" in the sense that it must involve the commission of the tort of trespass by those taking part, either by entering land to which they have no right of access, or by exceeding a limited right of access to land.

Section 14A(9) provides, inter alia:

> "In this section ... 'limited,' in relation to a right of access by the public to land, means that their use of it is restricted to use for a particular purpose (as in the case of a highway or road) . . ."

The offence with which the defendants were charged is set out in section 14B(2): "A person who takes part in an assembly which he knows is prohibited by an order under section 14A is guilty of an offence."

The Divisional Court reinstated the defendants' convictions. It held that a peaceful assembly on the public highway exceeds the limits of the public's right of access (within the meaning of section 14A(5)). The "particular purpose" mentioned in the definition of "limited" in section 14A(9) was held not to include the use of the highway for peaceful assembly.

F

The central issue in the case thus turns on two interrelated questions: (i) what are the "limits" of the public's right of access to the public highway at common law? and (ii) what is the "particular purpose" for which the public has a right to use the public highway?

G

The basis of the Divisional Court's decision

The reasoning underlying the Divisional Court's judgments is not altogether clear. McCowan L.J. stated, at p. 570:

H

> "counsel for the defendants ... argued as he did before the Crown Court that any assembly on the highway is lawful as long as it is peaceful and non-obstructive of the highway. This view appears to

A have been accepted by the Crown Court. In my judgment, however, it is mistaken. It leaves out of account the existence of the order made under section 14A and its operation to prohibit the holding of any assembly which occurs to restrict the limited right of access to the highway by the public."

In my judgment that reasoning is circular. There is no suggestion in B the Act of 1986 that the making of any order under section 14A(1) in itself defines the limits on the public's right of access to the highway. Rather, the conditions under which it is appropriate to make an order, and the conditions for the breach of such an order, are defined by reference to the existing limits upon the public's right of access. In other words, section 14A presupposes limited rights of access; it does not purport to impose such limits.

C Collins J. concluded, at pp. 571–572, that, at common law, an assembly on the highway, however peaceable, exceeds the limits of the public's right of access. This is the conclusion which lies at the heart of the Divisional Court's decision.

In addition, Collins J. rejected the defendants' argument that article 11(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human D Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1953) (Cmd. 8969) requires that there is a right of assembly on the public highway (albeit a right which may be subject to restrictions under article 11(2)), as opposed merely to a toleration of assemblies. Collins J. concluded, at p. 574, that the common law conforms with the Convention right of assembly because "The reality is that peaceful and non-obstructive assemblies on the highway are normally permitted."

E Thus in broad terms the basis of the Divisional Court's decision is the proposition that the public's right of access to the public highway is limited to the right to pass and repass, and to do anything incidental or ancillary to that right. Peaceful assembly is not incidental to the right to pass and repass. Thus peaceful assembly exceeds the limits of the public's right of access and so is conduct which fulfils the actus reus of the offence of F "trespassory assembly."

The position at common law

The Divisional Court's decision is founded principally on three authorities. In Ex parte Lewis (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 191 the Divisional Court held obiter that there was no public right to occupy Trafalgar Square for the purpose of holding public meetings. However, Wills J., giving the G judgment of the court, had in mind, at p. 197, an assembly "to the detriment of others having equal rights ... in its nature irreconcilable with the right of free passage ..." Such an assembly would probably also amount to a public nuisance, and, today, involve the commission of the offence of obstruction of the public highway contrary to section 137(1) of the Highways Act 1980. Such an assembly would probably also amount to H unreasonable user of the highway. It by no means follows that this same reasoning should apply to a peaceful assembly which causes no obstruction nor any public nuisance.

In Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142 the plaintiff had used the public highway, which crossed the defendant's land, for the sole and deliberate purpose of disrupting grouse-shooting upon the defendant's land, and was forcibly restrained by the defendant's servants from doing so. The plaintiff sued the defendant for assault; and the defendant pleaded justification on the basis that the plaintiff had been trespassing upon the highway. Lord Esher M.R. held, at p. 146:

> "on the ground that the plaintiff was on the highway, the soil of which belonged to the Duke of Rutland, not for the purpose of using it in order to pass and repass, or for any reasonable or usual mode of using the highway as a highway, I think he was a trespasser." (Emphasis added.)

Plainly Lord Esher M.R. contemplated that there may be "reasonable or usual" uses of the highway beyond passing and repassing. He continued, at pp. 146–147:

> "Highways are, no doubt, dedicated prima facie for the purpose of passage; but things are done upon them by everybody which are recognised as being rightly done, and as constituting a reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such. If a person on a highway does not transgress such reasonable and usual mode of using it, I do not think that he will be a trespasser."

Lopes L.J., by contrast, stated the law in more rigid terms, at p. 154:

> "if a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired, he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and repass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil ..."

Similarly, Kay L.J. stated, at p. 158:

> "the right of the public upon a highway is that of passing and repassing over land the soil of which may be owned by a private person. Using that soil for any other purpose lawful or unlawful is a trespass."

The rigid approach of Lopes and Kay L.JJ. would have some surprising consequences. It would entail that two friends who meet in the street and stop to talk are committing a trespass; so too a group of children playing on the pavement outside their homes; so too charity workers collecting donations; or political activists handing out leaflets; and so too a group of members of the Salvation Army singing hymns and addressing those who gather to listen.

The question to which this appeal gives rise is whether the law today should recognise that the public highway is a public place, on which all manner of reasonable activities may go on. For the reasons I set out below in my judgment it should. Provided these activities are reasonable, do not involve the commission of a public or private nuisance, and do not amount to an obstruction of the highway unreasonably impeding the primary right of the general public to pass and repass, they should not constitute a trespass. Subject to these qualifications, therefore, there would be a public right of peaceful assembly on the public highway.

The third authority relied upon by the Divisional Court is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752. In that case, the defendant, a racing tout, had used a public highway crossing the plaintiff's property for the purpose of observing racehorses being trained on the plaintiff's land. A. L. Smith L.J. expressly followed the approach of Lord Esher M.R. in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland. Applying that reasoning, he accepted, at p. 756, that a man resting at the side of the road, or taking a sketch from the highway, would not be a trespasser. The defendant's activities, however, fell outside "an ordinary and reasonable user of the highway" and so amounted to a trespass. Collins L.J. similarly approved Lord Esher M.R.'s approach, noting, at pp. 757–758, that:

> "in modern times a reasonable extension has been given to the use of the highway as such ... The right of the public to pass and repass on a highway is subject to all those reasonable extensions which may from time to time be recognised as necessary to its exercise in accordance with the enlarged notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised, but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage."

Romer L.J. was to similar effect, at p. 759.

I do not, therefore, accept that, to be lawful, activities on the highway must fall within a rubric "incidental or ancillary to" the exercise of the right of passage. The meaning of Lord Esher M.R.'s judgment in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, at pp. 146–147, is clear: it is not that a person may use the highway only for passage and repassage and acts incidental or ancillary thereto; it is that any "reasonable and usual" mode of using the highway is lawful, provided it is not inconsistent with the general public's right of passage. I understand Collins L.J.'s acceptance in Hickman v. Maisey, at pp. 757–758, of Lord Esher M.R.'s judgment in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland in that sense.

To commence from a premise, that the right of passage is the only right which members of the public are entitled to exercise on a highway, is circular: the very question in this appeal is whether the public's right is confined to the right of passage. I conclude that the judgments of Lord Esher M.R. and Collins L.J. are authority for the proposition that the public have the right to use the public highway for such reasonable and usual activities as are consistent with the general public's primary right to use the highway for purposes of passage and repassage.

Nor can I attribute any hard core of meaning to a test which would limit lawful use of the highway to what is incidental or ancillary to the right of passage. In truth very little activity could accurately be described as "ancillary" to passing along the highway: perhaps stopping to tie one's shoe lace, consulting a street-map, or pausing to catch one's breath. But I do not think that such ordinary and usual activities as making a sketch, taking a photograph, handing out leaflets, collecting money for charity, singing carols, playing in a Salvation Army band, children playing a game on the pavement, having a picnic, or reading a book, would qualify. These examples illustrate that to limit lawful use of the highway to that which is literally "incidental or ancillary" to the right of passage would be to place an unrealistic and unwarranted restriction on commonplace day-to-day activities. The law should not make unlawful what is commonplace and well accepted. A

Nor do I accept that the broader modern test which I favour materially realigns the interests of the general public and landowners. It is no more than an exposition of the test Lord Esher M.R. proposed in 1892. It would not permit unreasonable use of the highway, nor use which was obstructive. It would not, therefore, afford carte blanche to squatters or other uninvited visitors. Their activities would almost certainly be unreasonable or obstructive or both. Moreover the test of reasonableness would be strictly applied where narrow highways across private land are concerned, for example, narrow footpaths or bridle-paths, where even a small gathering would be likely to create an obstruction or a nuisance. B C

Nor do I accept that the "reasonable user" test is tantamount to the assertion of a right to remain, which right can be acquired by express grant, but not by user or dedication. That recognition, however, is in no way inconsistent with the "reasonable user" test. If the right to use the highway extends to reasonable user not inconsistent with the public's right of passage, then the law does recognise (and has at least since Lord Esher M.R.'s judgment in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142 recognised) that the right to use the highway, goes beyond the minimal right to pass and repass. That user may in fact extend, to a limited extent, to roaming about on the highway, or remaining on the highway. But that is not of the essence of the right. That is no more than the scope which the right might in certain circumstances have, but always depending on the facts of the particular case. On a narrow footpath, for example, the right to use the highway would be highly unlikely to extend to a right to remain, since that would almost inevitably be inconsistent with the public's primary right to pass and repass. D E

A highway may be created either by way of the common law doctrine of dedication and acceptance, or by some statutory provision. Dedication presupposes an intention by the owner of the soil to dedicate the right of passage to the public. Whilst the intention may be expressed, it is more often to be inferred; but the requirement of an inference of an intention to dedicate does not, in my judgment, advance the question of the extent of the public's right of user of the highway. The dedication is for the public's use of the land as a highway and the question remains: what is the proper extent of the public's use of the highway? Given that intention to dedicate is usually inferred, it would be a legal fiction to assert that actual intention was confined to the right to pass and repass and activities incidental or ancillary to that right. There is no room in the judgment of Collins L.J. in Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752, 757–758 for the fiction of an immutable, subjective original intention. Neither highway users nor the courts are in any position to ascertain what the landowner's original intentions may have been, years or even centuries after the event. In many cases, where the intention to dedicate is merely inferred from the fact of user as of right, there will not even have been a subjective intention. Nor would it be sensible to hold that the extent of the public's right of user F G H

A should differ from highway to highway, as necessarily it would if actual subjective intention were the test. It is time to recognise that the so-called intention of the landowner is no more than a legal fiction imputed to the landowner by the court.

It would have been possible for the common law to have imposed tight constraints on the public's right of user of the highway in one of two ways. First, it could have held that the right was no wider than the bare B minimum required for the use of the highway as such: a test of necessity. Or, secondly, it could have been held that the right was static, so that a user which could not have been in contemplation as reasonable and usual at the time of dedication could never become a lawful user in changing social circumstances. I have already demonstrated that the former has been rejected. Nor could the latter be sustained. I doubt whether, when a C highway was first dedicated in, say, the early 19th century, a landowner would have contemplated the traversal at very high speed of the land dedicated by vehicles powered by internal combustion engines. The fact is that the common law permits vehicles to be driven at high speed on the highway because that is a reasonable user in modern conditions: it would be a fiction to attribute that to an actual intention at the time of dedication.

D I conclude therefore the law to be that the public highway is a public place which the public may enjoy for any reasonable purpose, provided the activity in question does not amount to a public or private nuisance and does not obstruct the highway by unreasonably impeding the primary right of the public to pass and repass: within these qualifications there is a public right of peaceful assembly on the highway.

E Since the law confers this public right, I deprecate any attempt artificially to restrict its scope. It must be for the magistrates in every case to decide whether the user of the highway under consideration is both reasonable in the sense defined and not inconsistent with the primary right of the public to pass and repass. In particular, there can be no principled basis for limiting the scope of the right by reference to the subjective intentions of the persons assembling. Once the right to assemble within F the limitations I have defined is accepted, it is self-evident that it cannot be excluded by an intention to exercise it. Provided an assembly is reasonable and non-obstructive, taking into account its size, duration and the nature of the highway on which it takes place, it is irrelevant whether it is premeditated or spontaneous: what matters is its objective nature. To draw a distinction on the basis of anterior intention is in substance to G reintroduce an incidentality requirement. For the reasons I have given, that requirement, properly applied, would make unlawful commonplace activities which are well accepted. Equally, to stipulate in the abstract any maximum size or duration for a lawful assembly would be an unwarranted restriction on the right defined. These judgments are ever ones of fact and degree for the court of trial.

H Further, there can be no basis for distinguishing highways on publicly owned land and privately owned land. The nature of the public's right of use of the highway cannot depend upon whether the owner of the subsoil is a private landowner or a public authority. Any fear, however, that the rights of private landowners might be prejudiced by the right as defined are unfounded. The law of trespass will continue to protect private landowners against unreasonably large, unreasonably prolonged or unreasonably obstructive assemblies upon these highways.

Finally, I regard the conclusion at which I have arrived as desirable, because it promotes the harmonious development of two separate but related chapters in the common law. It is neither desirable in theory nor acceptable in practice for commonplace activities on the public highway not to count as breaches of the criminal law of wilful obstruction of the highway, yet to count as trespasses (even if intrinsically unlikely to be acted against in the civil law), and therefore form the basis for a finding of trespassory assembly for the purposes of the Act of 1986. A system of law sanctioning these discordant outcomes would not command respect.

Wilful obstruction of the highway

By section 137 of the Act of 1980: "(1) If a person, without lawful authority or excuse, in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway he is guilty of an offence ..." The relevant case law was extensively considered by the Divisional Court in Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (1986) 85 Cr.App.R. 143.

The appeal was by animal rights supporters, who had been demonstrating against the use of animal fur both outside and in the doorway of a furrier's shop. They handed out leaflets, held banners and attracted groups of passers-by who blocked the street. The issue whether they were guilty of the statutory offence was held (per Glidewell L.J., at pp. 150–151) to turn on three questions: (i) was there an obstruction (with "any stopping on the highway," unless de minimis, counting as an obstruction)? (ii) was the obstruction deliberate? and (iii) was the obstruction without lawful excuse?

The latter question, if the obstruction was not unlawful in itself (as in the case of unlawful picketing), was "to be answered by deciding whether the activity in which the defendant was engaged was or was not a reasonable user of the highway." Glidewell L.J. instanced, at p. 150:

> "what is now relatively commonplace, at least in London and large cities, distributing advertising material or free periodicals outside stations, when people are arriving in the morning. Clearly, that is an obstruction; clearly, it is not incidental to passage up and down the street because the distributors are virtually stationary. The question must be: is it a reasonable use of the highway or not? ... It may be decided that if the activity grows to an extent that it is unreasonable by reason of the space occupied or the duration of time for which it goes on that an offence would be committed, but it is a matter on the facts for the magistrates . . ."

In so holding Glidewell L.J. applied the reasoning of the Divisional Court in Nagy v. Weston [1965] 1 W.L.R. 280, where the activity in question, the sale of hot dogs in the street, "could not ... be said to be incidental to the right to pass and repass along the street." The question was one of fact: "whether the activity was or was not reasonable."

I find it satisfactory that there is a symmetry in the law between the

A activities on the public highway which may be trespassory and those which may amount to unlawful obstruction of the highway.

Article 11 of the European Convention

If, contrary to my judgment, the common law of trespass is not as clear as I have held it to be, then at least it is uncertain and developing, so B that regard should be had to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in resolving the uncertainty and in determining how it should develop: Derbyshire County Council v. Times Newspapers Ltd. [1992] Q.B. 770, per Balcombe L.J., at p. 812B–C, and Butler-Sloss L.J., at p. 830A–B; and see Attorney-General v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 A.C. 109, 283, per Lord Goff of Chieveley. Article 11 confers a "right to freedom of peaceful assembly" C and then entitles the state to impose restrictions on that right. The effect of the Divisional Court's decision in this case would be that any peaceful assembly on the public highway, no matter how minor or harmless, would involve the commission of the tort of trespass.

Its conclusion is that all peaceful assemblies on the highway are tortious, whilst seeking to justify that state of affairs by observing that D peaceful assemblies are in practice usually tolerated. In my judgment it is none to the point that restrictions on the exercise of the right of freedom of assembly may under article 11 be justified where necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. If the Divisional Court were correct, and an assembly on the public highway always trespassory, then there is not even a prima facie right to assembly on the public highway in our law. Unless the common law recognises that assembly on E the public highway may be lawful, the right contained in article 11(1) of the Convention is denied. Of course the right may be subject to restrictions (for example, the requirements that user of the highway for purposes of assembly must be reasonable and non-obstructive, and must not contravene the criminal law of wilful obstruction of the highway). But in my judgment our law will not comply with the Convention unless its starting-point is F that assembly on the highway will not necessarily be unlawful. I reject an approach which entails that such an assembly will always be tortious and therefore unlawful. The fact that the letter of the law may not in practice always be invoked is irrelevant: mere toleration does not secure a fundamental right. Thus, if necessary, I would invoke article 11 to clarify or develop the common law in the terms which I have held it to be; but for the reasons I have given I do not find it necessary to do so. I would G therefore allow the appeal.

LORD SLYNN OF HADLEY. My Lords, in section 14A of the Public Order Act 1986 (inserted by section 70 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994) Parliament gave a new power of control to local councils and to the police to deal with assemblies of 20 or more persons on land H to which the public had a limited right of access or no right of access.

A chief officer of police who reasonably believes that such an assembly is intended to be held and that it is likely to be held without the permission of the occupier of the land, or to conduct itself in such a way as to exceed the public's limited right of access, and to cause significant damage to land or buildings of historical or archaeological importance, may apply to the council of the district for an order "prohibiting for a specified period the holding of all trespassory assemblies in the district or a part of it, as specified:" section 14A(1). It is thus necessary to show that the land is such that the public has no or only a limited right of access, and

> "'limited,' in relation to a right of access by the public to land, means that their use of it is restricted to use for a particular purpose (as in the case of a highway or road):" section 14A(9) (emphasis added).

With the consent of the Secretary of State the council may then make an order prohibiting such assemblies for a period not exceeding four days and in respect of an area not exceeding five miles from a specified centre. When such an order is made: "A person who takes part in an assembly which he knows is prohibited by an order under section 14A is guilty of an offence:" section 14B(2) (as inserted).

This new offence is thus subject to important conditions being satisfied before prosecutions can be brought—the reasonable belief of the chief officer of police as to the matters specified, the consent of the Secretary of State and the decision of the council to make such an order, but it is plain that Parliament in 1994 was intending to give additional powers to councils and to the police to disperse trespassory assemblies over and above any other remedies (often slower and less effective) which might be available where people trespassed, committed nuisance or were violent.

On 22 May 1995 Salisbury District Council made an order prohibiting the holding of trespassory assemblies within a four-mile radius of Stonehenge for a period from 29 May to 1 June 1995 inclusive.

It is agreed that on 1 June 1995 a group of people were on the grass verge of the A344 road. The group was not fixed or static; people came and went. At about 6.45 p.m. the present defendants were on the verge in a group said by the police to have numbered 21 persons. A police inspector formed the view that this group constituted a prohibited trespassory assembly and they were told to move on. Some apparently did. The two defendants refused and were subsequently charged with the offence under section 14B(2) of the Act. They were convicted by the Salisbury justices but on appeal the Crown Court ruled that there was no case to answer and allowed the appeal.

The Crown Court found that the group, including the defendants, were not "destructive, violent, disorderly, threatening a breach of the peace or, on the evidence, doing anything other than reasonably using the highway." The court further concluded that the group's use of the highway was a "reasonable user" and that the conduct of the defendants and the group as a whole did not exceed the public's right of access to the highway.

The Divisional Court on appeal allowed the appeal and ruled that a peaceful assembly of 20 or more persons on the highway which does not obstruct the highway is still a trespassory assembly for the purposes of section 14B(2). The sole question on the appeal to your Lordships is thus whether the public has the right of access to the highway in order to assemble there when it does not at the time obstruct the highway and when those present are not violent and are not threatening a breach of the peace.

A It cannot, of course, be said that the public has no right of access to the highway; it is not suggested that the public's right of access is absolute. The question is what are the limits to the right (not, it should be noted, the practice) of the public to use or be on the highway. For this purpose it is not necessary to distinguish between "highway" and "road" since the definition of "limited" includes both, though no issue has been raised that the place where the defendants were was not a highway. I assume that it B was and that as such the public had some right of access to it.

It is necessary to remember when considering this case that both at common law and by the Highways Act 1980 the public have an analogous right of way over bridleways and footpaths. It is not, however, necessary in this case to consider the case of a private road or other place where the permission of the occupier is needed and where additional factors may C need to be taken into account, but the arguments here have implications in principle for both.

It is hardly surprising that the public's rights of access to and use of the highway have been considered on previous occasions by the courts though in different contexts. As I see it the essential feature of the public's right was explained in the judgment of Lopes L.J., with whom in substance Kay L.J. agreed, in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142. D Lopes L.J. said, at p. 152: "The interest of the public in a highway consists solely in the right of passage . . ." He quotes, at p. 153, Crompton J. in Reg. v. Pratt (1855) 4 E. & B. 860, 868–869 who said:

> ". . . I take it to be clear law that, if a man use the land over which there is a right of way for any purpose, lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing and repassing, he is a trespasser."

Lopes L.J. added: "I do not think the language used by the learned judges in that case too large or that it in any way imperils the legitimate use of highways by the public." He said, at p. 154:

> "The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that, if a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that F in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired, he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and repass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil, who has, subject to this easement, precisely the same estate in the soil G as he had previously to any easement being acquired by the public."

Thus the core right is to pass and to repass although I do not think that Lopes L.J. would have said that uses incidental to passing and repassing—stopping to adjust a bridle or to repair a carriage wheel—would have constituted a trespass. Lord Esher M.R. was more specific. He said, at p. 146:

> "on the ground that the plaintiff was on the highway, the soil of which belonged to the Duke of Rutland, not for the purpose of using it in order to pass and repass, or for any reasonable or usual mode of using the highway as a highway, I think he was a trespasser."

He added, at pp. 146–147, that if the language of Erle J. and Crompton J. were construed too largely the effect might be to interfere > "with the universal usage as regards highways in this country in a way which would be mischievous, and would derogate from the reasonable exercise of the rights of the public. Construed too strictly, it might imply that the public could do absolutely nothing but pass or repass on the highway, and that to do anything else whatever upon it would be a trespass. I do not think that is so. Highways are, no doubt, dedicated prima facie for the purpose of passage; but things are done upon them by everybody which are recognised as being rightly done, and as constituting a reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such. If a person on a highway does not transgress such reasonable and usual mode of using it, I do not think that he will be a trespasser."

It does not seem to me that his words "any reasonable or usual mode of using the highway as a highway" or "a reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such" (emphasis added) were intended to include acts done by people who were not in the ordinary sense of the term "passing and repassing along the highway." This is how A. L. Smith L.J. appears to have read Lord Esher M.R. in his judgment in Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752, 755–756. He then said: "I quite agree with what Lord Esher M.R. said in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, though I think it is a slight extension of the rule as previously stated ..." (Emphasis added.) He accepted that for a man to stop to rest or to take a sketch in the highway would not be considered an act of trespass but he continued:

> ". . . I cannot agree with the contention of the defendant's counsel that the acts which this defendant did, not really for the purpose of using the highway as such, but for the purpose of carrying on his business as a racing tout to the detriment of the plaintiff by watching the trials of racehorses on the plaintiff's land, were within such an ordinary and reasonable user of the highway as I have mentioned."

Collins L.J. said, at pp. 757–758:

> "The question must in the last resort be whether what the defendant did after he got upon the highway comes within the ordinary and reasonable use of the highway as a highway, that is, for the purpose for which it is dedicated to the public. Now primarily the purpose for which the highway is dedicated is that of passage, as is shown by the case of Dovaston v. Payne (1795) 2 H.Bl. 527; and, although in modern times a reasonable extension has been given to the use of the highway as such, the authorities show that the primary purpose of the dedication must always be kept in view. The right of the public to pass and repass on a highway is subject to all those reasonable extensions which may from time to time be recognised as necessary to its exercise in accordance with the enlarged notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised, but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage." (Emphasis added.)

A It seems to me that Collins L.J. is saying no more than that developments which were incidental to the right of passage might be accepted as falling within the public's right of limited access to the highway.

That ruling as to the law had already been reflected in two cases involving specifically the holding of public meetings in Trafalgar Square. Thus in Reg. v. Graham (1888) 16 Cox C.C. 420, 429–430 Charles J., rejecting the claim that there was a right of public meeting in Trafalgar B Square or any other thoroughfare, said:

> "So far as I know the law of England, the use of public thoroughfares is for people to pass and repass along them. That is the purpose for which they are, as we say, dedicated by the owner of them for the use of the public, and they are not dedicated to the public use for any other purpose that I know of than for the purpose of passing and C repassing ..."

Similarly, in Ex parte Lewis, 21 Q.B.D. 191, 197, Wills J. said that a public right of passage is a "right for all Her Majesty's subjects at all seasons of the year freely and at their will to pass and repass without let or hindrance."

D It was reflected subsequently in Randall v. Tarrant [1955] 1 W.L.R. 255 where Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. said, at p. 259:

> "The rights of members of the public to use the highway are, prima facie, rights of passage to and from places which the highway adjoins; but equally clearly it is not a user of the highway beyond what is legitimate if, for some purposes, a driver of a vehicle pauses from time E to time on the highway. Nobody would suggest to the contrary. On the other hand, it is well established that a highway must not be used in quite a different manner from passage along it and the pretext of walking up and down along it will not legitimise such a use."

and in Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 17th ed. (1995), p. 861, para. 17-41:

> F "The right of the public in respect of a highway is limited to the use of it for the purpose of passing and repassing and for such other reasonable purposes as it is usual to use the highway; if a member of the public uses it for any other purpose than that of passing and repassing he will be a trespasser."

The right of assembly, of demonstration, is of great importance but in G English law it is not an absolute right which requires all limitations on other rights to be set aside or ignored.

These cases, in limiting or linking rights of user by the public of the highway to passage or repassage, in themselves exclude a right to stay on the highway other than for purposes connected with such passage, but they are to be read with cases of wider application which reject the possibility of a right of staying on or wandering over land being acquired by user or H prescription. See, for example, Attorney-General v. Antrobus [1905] 2 Ch. 188, where a claim of a right for the public to visit Stonehenge acquired by user was rejected, and in In re Ellenborough Park [1956] Ch. 131 where a claim that the public had acquired a right to wander in a pleasure park was asserted. In the latter case, Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. said, at p. 184: A

"There is no doubt, in our judgment, but that Attorney-General v. Antrobus was rightly decided; for no such right can be granted (otherwise than by statute) to the public at large to wander at will over an undefined open space, nor can the public acquire such a right by prescription." B

On existing authority, I consider that the law is clear. The right is restricted to passage and reasonable incidental uses associated with passage.

It seemed to be suggested or at least implicit in argument that demonstrations and assemblies are a new development of the late 20th century and cannot have been in the mind of judges when they defined the law in the 19th century and even as late as Sir Raymond Evershed M.R.'s C judgment to which I have referred. This is plainly wrong as the two Trafalgar Square cases (and 19th century descriptions of contemporary conditions) show, even though the extent, nature, size and object of such demonstrations and assemblies have changed. I am willing to assume that more people are now more conscious of the importance of assembly and demonstration than they were in previous centuries, but I do not see that this in itself is enough to justify changing the nature and scope of the D public's right to use the highway. That it cannot in itself justify as of right assemblies or demonstrations on private land is obvious. The defendants' argument in effect involves giving to members of the public the right to wander over or to stay on land for such a period and in such numbers as they choose so long as they are peaceable, not obstructive, and not committing a nuisance. It is a contention which goes far beyond anything E which can be described as incidental or ancillary to the use of a highway as such for the purposes of passage; nor does such an extensive use in my view constitute a reasonable, normal or usual use of the highway as a highway. If the defendants' claim is right, it seems to me to follow that other uses of the highway than assembly would be permitted—squatting, putting up a tent, selling and buying food or drinks—so long as they did not amount to an obstruction or a nuisance. To get over the fence from F adjoining land (as could have happened here) and to sit or stand on the highway, including the verge, in order to demonstrate does not seem to me to be a normal or usual use of the highway as such and has nothing to do with passing and repassing.

The fact that the purpose of the demonstration or assembly is one which most or many people would approve does not change what is G otherwise a trespass into a legal right. Nor does the fact that an assembly is peaceful or unlikely to result in violence, or that it is not causing an obstruction at the particular time when the police intervene, in itself change what is otherwise a trespass into a legal right of access.

It is objected that very often people on the highway singly or in groups take part in activities which go beyond passage and repassage and are not H stopped. That is no doubt so, but reasonable tolerance does not create a new right to use the highway and indeed may make it unnecessary to create such a right which in its wider definition goes far beyond what is justified or needed. It may well be in the situation with which your

A Lordships are concerned that, but for section 14 of the Act of 1986, nothing would have been done to a peaceful non-obstructive group like the one in which the defendants took part. But Parliament in 1994 has enabled action to be taken over and above existing remedies to deal with trespass on the highway, or on land for entry on which the landowner's permission is required, to deal with what was seen as a growing problem. If Parliament wants to take away that form of control, it can obviously do B so. I do not consider that disapproval of this near statutory power justifies a change in the law by the courts as to the public's rights over the highway, which is what at times seemed to be one of the bases of the defendants' arguments.

Reference was made to cases such as Lowdens v. Keaveney [1903] 2 I.R. 82; Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, 85 Cr.App.R. 143 (under C section 137(1) of the Act of 1980); Nagy v. Weston [1965] 1 W.L.R. 280 and Hubbard v. Pitt [1976] Q.B. 142, which concern wilful obstruction of the passage along a highway without reasonable excuse. That is a different question from the one raised in the present case and I do not consider that the passages relied on from those judgments directly assist in answering it.

Reference was also made to the European Convention for the Protection D of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, not, of course, as in itself governing the legal position in the United Kingdom, but as indicating what our law should now be. It is desirable to look at the Convention for guidance even at the present time, but this is not a case in my opinion where there is any statutory ambiguity to be resolved or any doubt as to what the common law is: see per Butler-Sloss L.J. in Derbyshire County E Council v. Times Newspapers Ltd. [1992] Q.B. 770, 830. In any event, I am not satisfied that the existing law on highways is necessarily in conflict with article 11 of the Convention providing for a right of assembly, or of article 10 relating to freedom of expression. Both provide for exceptions to the rights created. I accept that it is arguable that a restriction on assembly even on the highway may interfere with the right of assembly in some situations, as the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, which F have been referred to, show, but I am not satisfied that there was here such a violation either by the law relating to access to the highway as it stands, or in its application to the facts of this case, which should compel us to change the law as I believe it to be.

It follows in my view that the Crown Court deciding essentially that what happened was a reasonable use of the highway erred in law and that G the Divisional Court was right in the result to reverse their decision. The justices who heard the case through were entitled to find that there had been a trespassory assembly.

The question certified in essence asks whether the lack of obstruction prevents an assembly of 20 or more persons on the highway from being a trespassory assembly. I would answer that in the negative. Put in the way in which the question is framed, i.e. whether such an assembly where there H is no obstruction does exceed the public right of access to the highway so as to constitute a trespassory assembly contrary to section 14A of the Act of 1986, I would answer in the affirmative.

I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD. My Lords, the point which is at issue in this appeal arises out of an incident which took place on 1 June 1995 on the grass verge of the A344 road beside the perimeter fence of the monument at Stonehenge. It relates to the extent of the use which members of the public are entitled to make of a highway in the exercise of the public's right of access to it. The question is whether members of the public who join together to form a peaceful, non-obstructive assembly upon the highway, their purpose being not to pass along the road but to remain in the place where they have gathered for such time as they choose to remain there, are acting in such a way as to exceed their public right of access to the highway.

On 22 May 1995 Salisbury District Council made an order under section 14A(2) of the Public Order Act 1986, as inserted by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, prohibiting the holding of all trespassory assemblies within a radius of four miles from the junction of the A303 and A344 roads adjoining Stonehenge from 2359 hours on Sunday, 28 May 1995 until 2359 hours on Thursday, 1 June 1995. At about 6.40 p.m. on 1 June 1995 the defendants had gathered with others on the grass verge of the perimeter fence to the west of the Heelstone. They were spread out along the verge, which was about five feet wide, over a distance of about 10 to 15 yards. The conduct of the group was entirely peaceful. No obstruction was being caused to anybody who wished to use the highway. No member of the group was on the roadway, and nobody was abusive, offensive or violent to the police or anybody else in any way. There had been some movement, as people joined the group and others left it during the afternoon and those who were on the verge moved around. But the group was in the nature of an assembly, not a procession. Its members were not pausing for conversation, rest or refreshment while passing along the highway. They had taken up a position upon it in a place where they proposed to stay for the time being. It can be assumed that they did so because they believed they had a right to be there.

A police officer who was at the scene formed the view, after counting its members, that this was an assembly of 20 or more persons and that it was a trespassory assembly which had been prohibited by the order made under section 14A. He informed those present of the terms of the order and at about 6.45 p.m. he instructed them to move on. Most of those who were present complied with this instruction. But the defendants refused to do so, and just after 7 p.m. they were arrested on the ground that they were committing an offence under section 14B of the Act by taking part in an assembly which they knew was prohibited by an order under section 14A. They were tried before the Salisbury magistrates and convicted of an offence under section 14B(2). They appealed against their convictions to the Salisbury Crown Court, which allowed their appeals on the ground that the group's user of the highway was a reasonable one which did not exceed the public's right of access. This decision was reversed when the case came before a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division [1998] Q.B. 563 on the ground that the public's right of access to the highway was limited to a right of passage and that an assembly, although peaceful and non-obstructive, could not be said to be on the highway in the exercise of that right. McCowan L.J. rejected, at p. 570, the suggestion that the

A holding of an assembly of 21 persons was incidental to the right of passage and repassage. Collins L.J. said, at p. 571H, that the holding of a meeting, demonstration or vigil on the highway, however peaceable, has nothing to do with the right of passage.

The case has obvious implications for the relationship between the criminal law and the right of peaceful assembly under article 11 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and B Fundamental Freedoms, as it arises out of a prosecution brought under the Act of 1986. But the problem which it has raised seems to me to depend for its answer upon an application of the principles which are to be found in the law of real property and landownership. This is because of the words which section 70 of the Act of 1994 has used to define what it describes as a trespassory assembly. Section 14A(5), which it has inserted C into Part II of the Act of 1986, states:

> "An order prohibiting the holding of trespassory assemblies operates to prohibit any assembly which—(a) is held on land to which the public has no right of access or only a limited right of access, and (b) takes place in the prohibited circumstances, that is to say, without the permission of the occupier of the land or so as to exceed the D limits of any permission of his or the limits of the public's right of access."

"Assembly" for this purpose means an assembly of 20 or more persons, and "land" means land in the open air: see subsection (9). The word "limited" is defined by subsection (9) in these terms:

> "'limited,' in relation to a right of access by the public to land, means E that their use of it is restricted to use for a particular purpose (as in the case of a highway or road) or is subject to other restrictions."

This section may be contrasted with section 14 of the Act of 1986 which deals with the imposition of conditions on public assemblies. Section 16 defines "public assembly" as "an assembly of 20 or more F persons in a public place which is wholly or partly open to the air." It defines "public place" for this purpose as meaning any highway and any place to which the public or any section of it has access, on payment or otherwise, as of right or by virtue of express or implied permission. The technique which section 14 uses to enable the police to control assemblies of this kind is that of enabling the police to impose conditions on the place where it may be held, its numbers and its duration. A person who G knowingly fails to comply with any of these conditions commits an offence. The assumption is that, so long as the conditions are complied with, a public assembly in a public place is lawful and that the police have no power to require its members to disperse.

The technique which section 14A uses is entirely different. It brings into the arena of the criminal law the rights, if any, which the public have as against the occupier of the land in private law. It does so by enabling H the police to take action against those taking part in an assembly if the occupier of the land would be entitled to treat the assembly as trespassing on his land. But the police may exercise their powers independently of the occupier, whose knowledge of or consent to the action which they are taking is not required. It is sufficient that an order under section 14A is in force for the time being and that the assembly is within the area to which it applies. A

In this situation it is necessary first to identify the extent of the public's right of access to a highway before looking more broadly at the human rights issues which this case has raised. Mr. Fitzgerald for the defendants accepted that the public's right of access was a limited one, and he did not suggest that there was any relevant distinction in this regard between a "road" and a "highway." The definition of "limited" in section 14A(9) uses both expressions. At common law the expression "highway" includes all ways to which the public have access, from footpaths and bridleways to carriageways. It may therefore be said to include a "road," and in particular a road such as the A344 the solum of which is vested in the statutory highway authority. B C

The most important point to note about these expressions is their generality. The certified question refers to "the public highway" (emphasis added). The use of the definite article and the addition of the adjective "public" suggest that a distinction can be drawn between those highways which are public and those which are not. But section 14A(9) refers simply to "a highway." In doing so it follows the wording used in other statutes to which I shall refer later. It also follows the common law, which uses the word "highway" to describe a place to which the public have access in order to exercise the public right. All highways are in that sense "public." The only distinction which might relevantly be drawn is that the land over which a highway passes is not always vested in a public authority. But it has not been suggested that the right of access is different according to the public or private character of the landowner. The conclusions which I would draw from this are that the addition of the word "public" is tautologous, and that anything which we may say about the limits of the public right of access to a highway must be taken, in law, to apply to each and every highway. D E

The next point is that no question arises in this case as to the limits of any permission given by the occupier. But it is worth noting that section 14A(5), by treating an assembly which exceeds the limits of such permission as a trespassory assembly, is relying for its application on a matter which the law would normally be content to leave to the discretion of the occupier. The same may also be said of cases where the assembly is held on land to which the public have a right of access which is limited. The law would normally be content to leave it to the occupier to intervene if any members of the public were acting in a way which exceeded the limits of the public right. Although the right to complain that there is a trespass has been taken out of the hands of the occupier and placed at the disposal of the police by section 14A, the extent of these limits must nevertheless be found in the relationship in private law between the public and the occupier. F G

It may be convenient to begin an examination of this subject with some general statements. A highway is a way over which there is a public right of way. A public right of way is similar to but not in all respects the same as an easement of way. The right is exercisable by anyone whether he owns land or not, whereas an easement is a right exercisable by the owner of H

A land for the time being by virtue of his estate in the land of which he is the dominant proprietor. There are other differences. But a public right of way closely resembles an easement of way in regard to the nature of the user from which its creation may be inferred and the nature of the use which may be made of it. Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue, vol. 21 (1995), pp. 77–78, para. 110, states that it is a right to pass along a highway for the purpose of legitimate travel, not to be on it, except so far B as the public's presence is attributable to a reasonable and proper use of it as such. In the same volume, p. 9, para. 1, it is stated that a highway is a way over which there exists a public right of passage, that is to say a right for all Her Majesty's subjects at all seasons of the year freely and at their will to pass and repass without let or hindrance. In Megarry & Wade, The Law of Real Property, 5th ed. (1984), p. 844 it is stated:

C "The land over which a public right of way exists is known as a highway; and although most highways have been made up into roads, and most easements of way exist over footpaths, the presence or absence of a made road has nothing to do with the distinction. There may be a highway over a footpath, while a well made road may be subject only to an easement of way, or may exist only for the D landowner's benefit and be subject to no easement at all."

In Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 17th ed., p. 861, para. 17-41 the current state of the law as to the question of use is summarised in these terms:

"The right of the public in respect of a highway is limited to the use of it for the purpose of passing and repassing and for such other reasonable purposes as it is usual to use the highway; if a member of E the public uses it for any other purpose than that of passing and repassing he will be a trespasser."

The law of Scotland, which is relevant to this case as section 14A applies also to Scotland (section 42(2)), is the same on the question as to the use which may be made of the public right. In Rankine, The Law of F Land-ownership in Scotland, 4th ed. (1909), p. 325 it is stated that the definition of a highway in English law as "a right of passage in general to all the King's subjects" applies also to Scotland. At p. 327 it is observed that "the public right of passage, called a highway" is regarded as a limitation or restriction on the landowner's use of his property. In Wills' Trustees v. Cairngorm Canoeing and Sailing School Ltd., 1976 S.C.(H.L.) 30, 125 Lord Wilberforce said: "A public right of way on highways is G established by use over the land of a proprietor . . ."

But it is worth nothing that there are some important differences between the law of Scotland and the law of England as to the constitution of the right. I think that it is right to mention this, because Scots law does not regard the assertion that actual intention is confined to the right to pass and repass and to activities incidental or ancillary to that right as a legal fiction. This is regarded in Scotland as a matter of fact which requires H to be established by the evidence. The differences between the laws of the two countries on this matter were discussed in Mann v. Brodie (1885) 10 App.Cas. 378. Lord Blackburn observed, at p. 385, that any reference to the law of England in that case, which was to be governed by the law of Scotland, was apt to mislead unless the difference of the law of the two countries was borne in mind. He pointed out, at p. 386, that, although in both countries a right of public way may be acquired by prescription, it was in England never practically necessary to rely on prescription to establish a public way. It was enough that there was evidence on which those who had to find the fact might find that there was a dedication by the owner whoever he was. Lord Watson said, at pp. 390–391, that the constitution of such a right according to the law of Scotland does not depend upon any legal fiction, but upon the fact of user by the public, as matter of right, continuously and without interruption, for the full period of the long prescription. There are many examples in the Scottish authorities of cases where the parties have joined issue on the question whether the evidence of user was sufficient to establish this fact: e.g. Duke of Atholl v. Torrie (1850) 12 D. 328, affirmed (1852) 1 Macq. 65; Macpherson v. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society Ltd. (1888) 13 App.Cas. 744. As Rankine, pp. 329–330, puts it: "The books are rich in illustrations of this matter, for no actions have been more obstinately fought out than cases of right of way."

The statutes which make provision as regards highways in England and Wales and as regards roads in Scotland follow the approach of the common law as to the nature of the public right of access. Section 328(1) of the Highways Act 1980 provides that in that Act, except where the context otherwise requires, "highway" means the whole or part of a highway other than a ferry or waterway. Section 329(1) defines "bridleway," "carriageway," "footpath" and "footway" respectively as meaning a way over which the public have a right of way on horseback, for the passage of vehicles or on foot only, as the case may be. As the term "highway" is not itself defined, it is necessary to apply the common law meaning of the word as a way over which members of the public have a right to pass and repass. Section 151(1) of the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984 is more explicit on this point. It defines "road" as meaning any way over which there is a public right of passage by whatever means. From this it follows that it is not possible to draw any relevant distinction as regards the nature of the public right of access between a highway which passes over land which is in private ownership and a highway which is vested in the statutory highway or roads authority.

It seems that at one time the extent of the right of passage was stated more narrowly than appears from the current textbooks. In Ex parte Lewis, 21 Q.B.D. 191 it was held that there was no right in the public to occupy Trafalgar Square for the purpose of holding public meetings there. Wills J. said, at p. 197:

> "The only 'dedication' in the legal sense that we are aware of is that of a public right of passage, of which the legal description is a 'right for all Her Majesty's subjects at all seasons of the year freely and at their will to pass and repass without let or hindrance.' A claim on the part of persons so minded to assemble in any numbers, and for so long a time as they please to remain assembled, upon a highway, to the detriment of others having equal rights, is in its nature irreconcilable with the right of free passage, and there is, so far as we have been able to ascertain, no authority whatever in favour of it."

A In Reg. v. Graham, 16 Cox C.C. 420, 429–430 Charles J. addressed the jury in these terms:

> "I have anxiously considered the observations of Mr. Asquith" —counsel for the defendant Graham—"and I can find no warrant for telling you that there is a right of public meeting either in Trafalgar Square or any other public thoroughfare. So far as I know the law of B England, the use of public thoroughfares is for people to pass and repass along them. That is the purpose for which they are, as we say, dedicated by the owner of them to the use of the public, and they are not dedicated to the public use for any other purpose that I know of than for the purpose of passing and repassing; and, if you come to regard Trafalgar Square as a place of public resort simply, it seems to C me it would be very analogous to the case of public thoroughfares ..."

In Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142, 152 Lopes L.J. said that the interest of the public in a highway consisted solely in the right of passage. He went on to say, at p. 154:

> "The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that, if a D person uses the soil of a highway for any purpose other than that in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired, he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and repass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil, who has, subject to this easement, precisely the same estate in the soil E as he had previously to any easement being acquired by the public."

Kay L.J., at p. 158, was to the same effect. He said that the right of the public upon a highway is that of passing and repassing over the land the soil of which may be owned by a private person, and that using the land for any other purpose lawful or unlawful was a trespass.

F I note in passing that he also made the point that, for trespass, the purpose need not be unlawful in itself, it being enough that it should be a user of the soil for a purpose other than that which is the proper use of a highway, namely that of passing and repassing along it. These observations seem to me to be directly in point in the present case. On this approach it would not matter in the least whether the assembly was or was not a G peaceful one or whether or not it was causing an obstruction to anyone. The motives or behaviour of those who constitute the assembly are irrelevant to the question whether there is a trespass. The mere fact that it was a use of the soil for a purpose other than that of passing or repassing along the highway would be enough to make it a trespassory assembly.

But the strict approach indicated by the earlier authorities was departed from by Lord Esher M.R. in the same case. He observed, at p. 146, that, H if the proposition that the use of the highway for any purpose, lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing or repassing was a trespass were to be construed too largely, the effect might be to interfere with the universal usage as regards highways in a way which would derogate from the reasonable exercise of the rights of the public. He went on to give this explanation, at pp. 146–147: A

> "Construed too strictly, it might imply that the public could do absolutely nothing but pass or repass on the highway, and that to do anything else whatever upon it would be a trespass. I do not think that is so. Highways are, no doubt, dedicated prima facie for the purpose of passage; but things are done upon them by everybody which are recognised as being rightly done, and as constituting a reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such. If a person on a highway does not transgress such reasonable and usual mode of using it, I do not think that he will be a trespasser." (Emphasis added.) B

In Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752, 755 A. L. Smith L.J. said that he agreed with what Lord Esher M.R. said in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, although he thought that it was a slight extension of the rule as previously stated which showed that the right of the public was merely to pass and repass along the highway. He gave, at p. 756, as examples of acts which no reasonable person would regard as trespassing, that of a man who sat down by the road for a time to rest himself or who took a sketch from the highway—of which the modern equivalent might be the tourist who pauses to take a photograph. But it is important to notice that the distinction which he drew was between acts which were an ordinary and reasonable use of the highway as such, which were permissible, and acts which were not within that description, which were not. Collins L.J. put the matter in this way, at pp. 757–758: C D

> "The right of the public to pass and repass on a highway is subject to all those reasonable extensions which may from time to time be recognised as necessary to its exercise in accordance with the enlarged notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised, but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage. This is in effect what Lord Esher M.R. said in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland." E F

While therefore Lord Esher M.R. may be said to have extended the previous statements of the law, the extension which he was willing to accept did not depart from the essential principle. The test of what is ordinary and reasonable is not to be applied in the abstract, as one may legitimately do in order to discover whether the activity is in itself lawful. It has to be applied in the context of the exercise of the right of passage, which is the only right which members of the public are entitled to exercise when "using the highway as a highway" (emphasis added): see his words at p. 146. So the question remains whether what is being done is an ordinary and reasonable thing for a person to do while using the highway as such in the exercise of that right. G

Some of the cases indicate a disinclination on the part of the judges to favour resort to the courts for a remedy in cases where the trespass was so trivial or technical that no reasonable person would have objected to it: Llandudno Urban District Council v. Woods [1899] 2 Ch. 705, where the H

A objection was to a clergyman holding services and delivering addresses on the seashore; Fielden v. Cox (1906) 22 T.L.R. 411, where the defendants had set up appliances on the highway for the purpose of catching moths. But the fact that some activities on the highway are or ought to be tolerated does not mean that they are being done there in the exercise of the public's right of access to it. It is the extent of the right of access, not the question whether the activity in question ought to be tolerated, which B is in issue in the present case. For the purposes of section 14A(5) the question is not whether the assembly is of a kind which a reasonable occupier of the land would tolerate, but whether it exceeds the limits of any permission of his or the limits of the public's right of access.

We were referred to a number of later authorities, but these seem to me to be illustrations of the application of the law as settled by these C previous cases and not to indicate that the law is in need of any further extension or relaxation as to the test to be applied. For example, in Randall v. Tarrant [1955] 1 W.L.R. 255, 259 Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. said:

> "The rights of members of the public to use a highway are, prima facie, rights of passage to and from places which the highway adjoins; but equally clearly it is not a user of the highway beyond what is D legitimate if, for some purposes, a driver of a vehicle pauses from time to time on the highway. Nobody would suggest to the contrary. On the other hand, it is well established that a highway must not be used in quite a different manner from passage along it and the pretext of walking up and down along it will not legitimise such a use."

These observations are consistent with the opinion which the Lord President (Lord Dunedin) expressed in M'Ara v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, E 1913 S.C. 1059. The question in that case was whether the magistrates were entitled to issue a proclamation ordering that "persons shall not assemble or congregate or hold meetings" in certain streets of the city unless they had been licensed to do so. It was held that they had no power to do so either under the Act of 1606, c. 17, for staying unlawful conventions or at common law. As the Lord President explained, at F pp. 1074–1075, they had power by means of the police to move the people on if they were causing an obstruction or their conduct was such as to be likely to amount to a breach of the peace. What they could not do without statutory authority was to create an offence and impose penalties. (It should be noted that the Lord President was referring here to the magistrates not as judges—not as a tribunal of fact of that kind—but as members of the town council, with the power at common law by means of G the police—and by proclamation, if necessary—of moving on people who were causing an obstruction. The Lord President said, as to the limits of the public right of access, at p. 1073:

> "As regards the common law, I wish most distinctly to state it as my opinion that the primary and overruling object for which streets exist is passage. The streets are public, but they are public for passage, H and there is no such thing as a right in the public to hold meetings as such in the streets."

He went on to say that, although the streets are for passage and that passage is paramount to everything else, this does not necessarily mean that anyone is doing an illegal act if he is not at the moment passing along—the whole question being one of degree. As for the right of free speech, he said that it undoubtedly exists but that: "the right of free speech is a perfectly separate thing from the question of the place where that right is to be exercised." I think therefore that the law as stated by Lord Esher M.R. in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142 can be taken to be the law as it must be applied between members of the public who seek to exercise the public's right of way on a highway and the occupier of the land which has been dedicated to that right. The question is one of degree. But the principle which must be applied is that the highway is for passage, and such other uses as may be made of it as of right must be capable of being recognised as a reasonable and usual mode of using the highway as such.

This brings me to the wider questions which were raised in the course of the argument. Mr. Fitzgerald's submission was that the assembly in this case was a reasonable use of the highway because it was an entirely peaceful one and because it was not obstructing anybody. His argument was that this was a reasonable use of the highway, not because it was incidental or accessory to the activity of passing and repassing along it, but because as a purpose and end in itself it was reasonable. He said that the test which had been stated by Lord Esher M.R. was capable of development to bring it into line with what society in the late 20th century would consider to be reasonable. In order to strike a fair balance between the rights to freedom of expression and of assembly and the rights of those who wished to pass and repass on the highway, an assembly which was causing an obstruction could not be considered to be reasonable. But an assembly which was not obstructive and was otherwise lawful was a reasonable and usual use of the highway simply because the activity was in itself a reasonable one. So it should not be regarded as a trespassory assembly within the meaning of section 14A.

I do not think that this broad argument can be reconciled with Lord Esher M.R.'s statement of the law or with principle. In my opinion the distinction between the use of a highway for passage and its use as a place of assembly as an end in itself is a fundamental one, although the question is ultimately one of fact. The purpose of those who are said to have formed an assembly may be to remain in the place where they have gathered for a short time only before continuing to pass along the road, in which case it may be inferred that they are making reasonable use of the highway as a highway. Or it may be that their purpose to remain there indefinitely, in which case the only inference which can be drawn is that they are using the highway as a place of assembly. This point that the right is to pass or repass, not to remain, is perhaps best illustrated by using the language which Farwell J. adopted in Attorney-General v. Antrobus [1905] 2 Ch. 188 when he was asking himself whether the public could acquire by user the right to visit a public monument.

In that case also, as it happens, Stonehenge was the subject of the controversy—although in rather different circumstances, as the monument was then in private ownership. The owner of the land had enclosed the monument by fencing on the view that this was necessary for its protection. The Attorney-General wished to remove the fencing in order to keep the

A place open so that the public could visit it. The action failed, because there could be no public right of way to the monument acquired by mere user or by the fact that the public had been in the habit of visiting it. Farwell J. said, at p. 198, that the jus spatiandi—the right to walk about or to promenade—was not known to our law as a possible subject matter of prescription. He said, at p. 206, that the public had no jus spatiandi or manendi—the right to stay or remain—within the circle. In In re B Ellenborough Park [1956] Ch. 131, in which it was held that the jus spatiandi, in regard to a right to use a pleasure park, could be acquired by grant as an easement, Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. observed, at p. 163, that Farwell J.'s rejection of it may have been derived in part from its similar rejection by the law of Rome, and that there was no other judicial authority for adopting the Roman view in this respect into English law. C But as to the matter of public right he went on to say, at p. 184:

> "There is no doubt, in our judgment, but that Attorney-General v. Antrobus was rightly decided; for no such right can be granted (otherwise than by statute) to the public at large to wander at will over an undefined open space, nor can the public acquire such a right by prescription."

D Although the use of these Latin words may seem out of date in present circumstances, they serve nevertheless as a valuable reminder of the place which the right to assemble must occupy in the context of the law relating to real property. Easements and public rights to land which are acquired by user or by dedication are limited rights, as against the occupier or owner of the land which is affected by them. They are granted or acquired E for a particular purpose only, and they are not to be confused with the use of the land for other purposes. Thus a right of way or passage is entirely different from a right to walk about or a right to remain in one place. The law recognises that a right of way or passage may be acquired by user or by dedication. But it takes a different view of the right to walk about or to remain in one place. These are not rights which the public can acquire by user or by dedication. If rights of this kind can be acquired at F all they can be acquired only by express grant. So they cannot be included among the rights of access which the public can enjoy as of right without the consent of the landowner.

The assembly which was said by the police to have formed on this occasion was undoubtedly a peaceful and non-obstructive one and, as it was on the grass verge of a road which was vested in the statutory highway G authority, it may reasonably be said to have been doing no harm to anybody. But the consequences of accepting that anyone who was behaving in this way was exercising the public's right of access to the highway—was doing so as of right and not by mere tolerance—would have implications far beyond the facts of this case. It would affect the position of every private owner of land throughout the country over which there is a public right of way, irrespective of whether this is a made-up road or a footpath H or bridleway. The right of assembly which Mr. Fitzgerald was seeking to establish was what would be described in the terms of property law as a right to remain. I wish to stress that the purpose for which the defendants were seeking to remain where they had gathered is not material in this context. Any member of the public may use a highway for passage in the exercise of the public right whatever his reason may be for doing so. In the same way, if such a thing as a public right to assemble and remain in one place on the highway were to be recognised, the purpose of those who wished to exercise it would be immaterial. If it was an unlawful purpose it could be stopped on that ground. But if it was lawful there would be nothing to prevent those who wished to exercise it from remaining where they were for however long they wished, whatever their number and whatever their purpose might be in doing so.

It is not difficult to see that to admit a right in the public in whatever numbers to remain indefinitely in one place on a highway for the purpose of exercising the freedom of the right to assemble could give rise to substantial problems for landowners in their attempts to deal with the activities of demonstrators, squatters and other uninvited visitors. It would amount to a considerable extension of the rights of the public as against those of both public and private landowners which would be difficult for the courts to control by reference to any relevant principle. The margin between what is and what is not a nuisance is an imprecise one, as to which he who wishes to put a stop to it may be in difficulty in obtaining an immediate remedy. The test of reasonable use of the highway as such is consistent with the rule that the public's right of way is essentially a right of passage. It is also consistent with the law as to the kind of user which must be shown in order to show that a public right of way has been constituted over the land of the proprietor. The proposition that the public are entitled to do anything on the highway which amounts in itself to a reasonable user may seem at first sight to be an attractive one. But it seems to me to be tantamount to saying that members of the public are entitled to assemble, occupy and remain anywhere upon a highway in whatever numbers as long as they wish for any reasonable purpose so long as they do not obstruct it. I do not think that there is any basis in the authorities for such a fundamental rearrangement of the respective rights of the public and of those of public and private landowners.

E

Mr. Fitzgerald said that, whatever the difficulties might be in regard to the holding of assemblies on footpaths and bridleways over the property of private landowners, there was no good reason why the same view should be applied to highways which were vested in the statutory highway authority. He said that, as highways which are used as roads by the public are now almost all in public ownership and as section 14A had brought the whole issue of trespass into the realm of public law, there should now be a coherent system of public law to deal with assembly cases. His argument was that the approach which the criminal law had taken in obstruction cases showed that the concept of reasonable user was capable of providing the required symmetry.

G

I do not need to go into a detailed analysis of the obstruction cases. We were referred to Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, 85 Cr.App.R. 143, in which the question was considered in the context of the offence which is created by section 137(1) of the Act of 1980 where a person without lawful authority or reasonable excuse in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway. In that context it is necessary to consider whether what was done was in itself reasonable, striking a

H

A balance between the right to free speech and to demonstrate on the one hand and the need for peace and good order on the other: per Otton L.J., at p. 151.

Mr. Fitzgerald said that the common law was capable of development within the concept of reasonable user in order to rationalise what he accepted were two conflicting lines of authority. But I do not think that section 14A requires us to attempt such an exercise. On the contrary, the B intention of Parliament as disclosed by the language of that section was to rely upon the existing state of the law relating to trespass as between members of the public and the occupiers of land to which members of the public have no right of access or only a limited right of access. Like it or not, this approach makes the lack of symmetry of which Mr. Fitzgerald complains inevitable. The private law upon which section 14A depends for C its application is concerned to regulate the rights of the owners and occupiers of land in regard to the use of their land by the public. Public law, which is concerned with the relationship between the state and its citizens, depends upon entirely different concepts. Furthermore it is a striking feature of the present case that the question whether the law relating to the public's right of access should be rationalised in order to give the public greater freedom in the exercise of that right is being D discussed in a case to which no landowner is a party. It seems to me to be contrary to elementary concepts of justice that the rights of landowners as against the public in relation to access to their land should be diminished by a decision of your Lordships' House when nobody who is in a position to defend their interest has yet been heard.

We were invited to have regard to the European Convention for the E Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms both as an aid to statutory interpretation and as a yardstick against which to resolve any uncertainty in the common law or to guide its development. I do not think that there is any need to have resort to the Convention as an aid to statutory interpretation, as there is no ambiguity in the statutory provisions which are relevant to this case. Nor do I think that there is any uncertainty as to the test which must be applied under the common law relating to the F use which the public may make of a highway in the exercise of the public's right of access. In Attorney-General v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 A.C. 109, 283G, Lord Goff of Chieveley said that he conceived it to be his duty, when he was free to do so, to interpret the law in accordance with the obligations of the Crown under the treaty. Adopting this approach, in Derbyshire County Council v. Times Newspapers Ltd. G [1992] Q.B. 770, 830B–C Butler-Sloss L.J. said that, where there was an ambiguity in the law or the law was otherwise unclear or so far undeclared by an appellate court, the English court was not only entitled but obliged to consider the implications of the Convention. For the defendants it was contended that the law is unclear because the inconsistency between the private law relating to trespass and the criminal law relating to obstruction in public places had still to be reconciled. For the reasons which I have H already given I do not accept that there is such an inconsistency.

In any event it seems to me that there are clear indications in the Convention that restrictions on the exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms such as the freedom of assembly under article 11(1) of the Convention may be justified where this is necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. This is stated in terms in article 11(2). Article 1 of the First Protocol states that every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions and that no one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law. The precise effect of these provisions in regard to the right of a landowner to exclude trespassers from his property was not explored in the course of the hearing before us. But I do not think that it would be right to regard the Convention as providing unqualified support to the argument that the public's right of access should be enlarged so as to enable the public to exercise what article 11(1) of the Convention describes as "the right to freedom of peaceful assembly" wherever there is a public right of access to a highway. Such an enlargement would be bound to result in loss of the protection of the owners of land which the existing state of the law gives to them. In that sense and to that extent it could be said that they were being deprived of their right to the quiet enjoyment of their possessions contrary to article 1 of the First Protocol.

It seems to me therefore that what I can best describe as the horizontal effect of the defendants' argument as to the Convention in regard to the private rights of landowners gives rise to questions of considerable difficulty. I am not persuaded that the balance which is struck in private law between the rights of the public and those of landowners is in need of adjustment in order to enable members of the public to exercise their freedom of assembly. In practice members of the public are allowed to assemble in public places as they wish without objection or hindrance so long as they do not obstruct others and are peaceful. As Lord Goff of Chieveley said in Attorney-General v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 A.C. 109, 283F, everybody is free to do anything in this country, subject only to the provisions of the law. The law of trespass exists to protect the interests of landowners where such assemblies exceed the limits which they are willing to tolerate. Such provisions as exist in public law, as in the case of section 14A, may be justified on the ground that they have been carefully drafted having regard to the need to protect the public from arbitrary action on the part of the police while at the same time enabling the police to intervene to prevent disorder or crime. I do not think that the Convention requires us to attempt to reform the private law relating to trespass on which section 14A relies in order to mitigate the effects of its application to trespassory assemblies which are held in breach of an order obtained under that section.

For these reasons I would answer the certified question in the affirmative and dismiss the appeal.

LORD CLYDE. My Lords, the defendants were convicted of having taken part in an assembly which they knew was prohibited under section 14 of the Public Order Act 1986. The question is whether the assembly was a prohibited one. Section 14A(5) explains what is meant by a prohibited, or a "trespassory," assembly. The relevant words for the purposes of the present case are that the assembly "(a) is held on land to which the public has ... only a limited right of access, and (b) takes place in the prohibited circumstances ..."

A There is no doubt but that the assembly in the present case took place on a highway and that a highway is land to which the public had a limited right of access. So one has next to consider the prohibited circumstances. Those circumstances are defined in section 14A(5)(b). The critical qualification here claimed is that the assembly so took place "as to exceed ... the limits of the public's right of access." So the question comes to be B what is the extent of the public's right of access. That is a quite general question which will apply universally, whether an individual member of the public or a group of people is involved. It will also be applicable to any other kind of public road, subject to any particular limitations which may restrict the use of such a road, whenever or however imposed.

The Act gives a little further explanation. Section 14A(9) defines "limited" in relation to a right of access by the public to land as meaning C that "their use of it is restricted to use for a particular purpose (as in the case of a highway or road) or is subject to other restrictions." So one has to consider what was the particular purpose for which Parliament considered the use of a highway was restricted.

The fundamental purpose for which roads have always been accepted to be used is the purpose of travel, that is to say, passing and repassing D along it. But it has also been recognised that the use comprises more than the mere movement of persons or vehicles along the highway. The right to use a highway includes the doing of certain other things subsidiary to the user for passage. It is within the scope of the right that the traveller may stop for a while at some point along the way. If he wishes to refresh himself, or if there is some particular object which he wishes to view from E that point, or if there is some particular association with the place which he wishes to keep alive, his presence on the road for that purpose is within the scope of the acceptable user of the road. The view was expressed by A. L. Smith L.J., in Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752, 756, that if a man took a sketch from the highway no reasonable person would treat that as an act of trespass. So, as it seems to me, the particular purpose for F which a highway may be used within the scope of the public's right of access includes a variety of activities, whether or not involving movement, which are consistent with what people reasonably and customarily do on a highway. In Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142, 146 Lord Esher M.R. defined trespass in terms of a person being on the highway "not for the purpose of using it in order to pass and repass, or for any reasonable or usual mode of using the highway as a highway . . ." But G what is reasonable or usual may develop and change from one period of history to another. That was recognised by Collins L.J. where in Hickman v. Maisey he said, at pp. 757–758:

> "The right of the public to pass and repass on a highway is subject to all those reasonable extensions which may from time to time be recognised as necessary to its exercise in accordance with the enlarged H notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised, but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage."

On the other hand the purpose for which the road is used must be for ordinary and lawful uses of a roadway and not for some ulterior purpose for which the road was not intended to be used. Thus in Hickman v. Maisey it was held to be a trespass for someone to use the road as a vantage point for observing the performance of racehorses undergoing trial. To use the language of Collins L.J., that was a use of the highway "in a manner which is altogether outside the purpose for which it was dedicated ..." So also in the earlier case of Harrison v. Duke of Rutland it was held to be a trespass for a person to use the road for the purpose of disrupting the adjoining landowner's enjoyment of his sporting rights.

But it must immediately be noticed that the public's right is fenced with limitations affecting both the extent and the nature of the user. So far as the extent is concerned the user may not extend beyond the physical limits of the highway. That may often include the verges. It may also include a lay-by. Moreover, the law does not recognise any jus spatiendi which would entitle a member of the public simply to wander about the road, far less beyond its limits, at will. Further, the public have no jus manendi on a highway, so that any stopping and standing must be reasonably limited in time. While the right may extend to a picnic on the verge, it would not extend to camping there.

So far as the manner of the exercise of the right is concerned, any use of the highway must not be so conducted as to interfere unreasonably with the lawful use by other members of the public for passage along it. The fundamental element in the right is the use of the highway for undisturbed travel. Certain forms of behaviour may of course constitute criminal actings in themselves, such as a breach of the peace. But the necessity also is that travel by the public should not be obstructed. The use of the highway for passage is reflected in all the limitations, whether on extent, purpose or manner. While the right to use the highway comprises activities within those limits, those activities are subsidiary to the use for passage, and they must be not only usual and reasonable but consistent with that use even if they are not strictly ancillary to it. As was pointed out in M'Ara v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1913 S.C. 1059 and in Aldred v. Miller, 1924 J.C. 117 the use of a public street for free unrestricted passage is the most important of all the public uses to which public streets are legally dedicated. No issue regarding the nature of the user arises in the present case. It appears that everyone was behaving with courtesy and civility and restraint. Moreover there was no obstruction at all to any traffic.

In the generality there is no doubt but that there is a public right of assembly. But there are restrictions on the exercise of that right in the public interest. There are limitations at common law and there are express limitations laid down in article 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. I would not be prepared to affirm as a matter of generality that there is a right of assembly at any place on a highway at any time and in any event I am not persuaded that the present case has to be decided by reference to public rights of assembly. If a group of people stand in the street to sing hymns or Christmas carols they are in my view using the street within the legitimate scope of the public right of access to it, provided of course that they do so for a

A reasonable period and without any unreasonable obstruction to traffic. If there are shops in the street and people gather to stand and view a shop window, or form a queue to enter the shop, that is within the normal and reasonable use which is matter of public right. A road may properly be used for the purposes of a procession. It would still be a perfectly proper use of the road if the procession was intended to serve some particular purpose, such as commemorating some particular event or achievement. B And if an individual may properly stop at a point on the road for any lawful purpose, so too should a group of people be entitled to do so. All such activities seem to me to be subsidiary to the use for passage. So I have no difficulty in holding that in principle a gathering of people at the side of a highway within the limits of the restraints which I have noted may be within the scope of the public's right of access to the highway.

C In my view the argument for the defendants, and indeed the reasoning of the Crown Court, went further than it needed to go in suggesting that any reasonable use of the highway, provided that it was peaceful and not obstructive, was lawful, and so a matter of public right. Such an approach opens a door of uncertain dimensions into an ill-defined area of uses which might erode the basic predominance of the essential use of a D highway as a highway. I do not consider that by using the language which it used Parliament intended to include some distinct right in addition to the right to use the road for the purpose of passage.

I am not persuaded that in any case where there is a peaceful non-obstructive assembly it will necessarily exceed the public's right of access to the highway. The question then is, as in this kind of case it may often turn out to be, whether on the facts here the limit was passed and the E exceeding of it established. The test then is not one which can be defined in general terms but has to depend upon the circumstances as a matter of degree. It requires a careful assessment of the nature and extent of the activity in question. If the purpose of the activity becomes the predominant purpose of the occupation of the highway, or if the occupation becomes more than reasonably transitional in terms of either time or space, then it F may come to exceed the right to use the highway.

The only point which has caused me some hesitation in the circumstances of the present case is the evident determination by the two defendants to remain where they were. That does seem to look as if they were intending to go beyond their right and to stay longer than would constitute a reasonable period. But I find it far from clear that there was G an assembly of 20 or more persons who were so determined and in light of the fluidity in the composition of the grouping and in the consistency of its component individuals I consider that the Crown Court reached the correct conclusion.

I do not find it possible to return any general answer to the certified question. The matter is essentially one to be judged in light of the particular facts of the case. But I am prepared to hold that a peaceful H assembly which does not obstruct the highway does not necessarily constitute a trespassory assembly so as to constitute the circumstances for an offence where an order under section 14A(2) is in force. I would allow the appeal.

LORD HUTTON. My Lords, on 1 June 1995 a number of people were present in the vicinity of Stonehenge. There were tourists and sightseers, and there were also a number of people who were present because it was the tenth anniversary of a disturbance known as "the Battle of the Beanfield" when the police had had to eject persons who had tried to enter the site of Stonehenge.

About 6.45 p.m. on 1 June the two defendants together with about 19 other persons, constituting a group of more than 20 persons, were on the grass verge between the perimeter fence of Stonehenge and the metal surface of the roadway of the A344. Some of the group were carrying banners with the words "Never Again," "Stonehenge Campaign 10 years of Criminal Injustice" and "Free Stonehenge." The grass verge was about 4 feet 6 inches to 5 feet wide and the group, which was not static but fluid, was moving around on the verge and was spread out over 10 to 15 yards. It is not in dispute that the grass verge is to be considered as part of the public highway.

In 1994 Parliament amended the Public Order Act 1986 by section 70 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 which inserted section 14A and section 14B after section 14. The effect of section 14A in relation to the circumstances of the present case can be broadly stated as follows: where a chief officer of police reasonably believes that an assembly of 20 or more persons is intended to be held in any district at a place on land to which the public has only a limited right of access, and that the assembly is likely to conduct itself in such a way as to exceed the limits of the public's right of access and may result in serious disruption to the life of the community or in significant damage to a monument of historical, architectural, archaeological or scientific importance on the land, he may apply to the council of the district for an order prohibiting for a specified period the holding of all trespassory assemblies in the district or in part of it. On receiving such an application a council in England, with the consent of the Secretary of State, may make such an order.

On 22 May 1995 Salisbury District Council made an order pursuant to section 14A that the holding of all trespassory assemblies within a radius of four miles from the junction of the A303 and A344 roads adjoining the monument at Stonehenge were prohibited for four days commencing at 23.59 hours on 28 May 1995 and terminating at 23.59 hours on 1 June 1995.

Section 14A(5) provides:

> "An order prohibiting the holding of trespassory assemblies operates to prohibit any assembly which—(a) is held on land to which the public has no right of access or only a limited right of access, and (b) takes place in the prohibited circumstances, that is to say, without the permission of the occupier of the land or so as to exceed the limits of any permission of his or the limits of the public's right of access."

Section 14A(9) provides:

A Section 14B(2) provides: "A person who takes part in an assembly which he knows is prohibited by an order under section 14A is guilty of an offence."

The two defendants were charged with an offence under section 14B(2). They were tried before the Salisbury justices and on 3 October 1995 they were each convicted of that offence. They appealed against their convictions to the Salisbury Crown Court and their appeals were heard by Judge B MacLaren Webster Q.C. and two justices on 3 and 4 January 1996. At the close of the prosecution case the defendants submitted that there was no case to answer and the Crown Court accepted this submission and allowed the appeals in a fully reasoned judgment setting out its findings and conclusions. The Director of Public Prosecutions appealed by case stated to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, constituted by C McCowan L.J. and Collins J., which allowed the Director's appeal and ordered that the case be remitted to the Salisbury Crown Court to be reheard by a differently constituted bench.

In its judgment the Crown Court set out its findings of fact. These included:

> "At no time was either appellant or, for that matter any other person D in the group of people in the area extending 10 to 15 yards westward from the Heelstone abusive, obstructive or in any way offensive or violent to the police or anyone else. None of those to whom Inspector Mackie addressed himself was in the roadway—the A344 itself, they were not obstructing the freedom of movement of others on the verge nor were they causing a public nuisance ... I pause to remind us that we have found that the assembly of 20 or more people was merely E that. It was a presence. It was not, let alone any member of it, let alone either of the appellants, other than present. Neither as a group nor as individuals were any of those 20, and in particular, of course, the defendants (whom it must always be remembered we have to consider individually as distinct both from the group and each other) being destructive, violent, disorderly, threatening a breach of the peace F or, on the evidence, doing anything other than reasonably using the highway."

Therefore the issue which arose for determination before the Crown Court and the Divisional Court was whether the entirely peaceful assembly which did not obstruct passage along the highway constituted a trespassory assembly because it was taking place "so as to exceed the limits of ... the G public's right of access" to the highway, the A344.

The conclusion of the Crown Court was stated as:

> "we find that everything that was done by the appellants was done peaceably and in good order. Although Lord Denning M.R. in Hubbard v. Pitt [1976] Q.B. 142 was dealing with an interlocutory injunction and Otton J. in Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, H 85 Cr.App.R. 143 with obstruction (which, let it be recalled, did not occur in the instant case), we too are of the view that the passage cited from Lord Denning, at pp. 178–179, is, to adopt and adapt the words of Otton J., at p. 152, of importance when considering whether appellants (behaving as we find, on the evidence thus far, these appellants to have been behaving), have committed a criminal offence of knowingly taking part in a prohibited assembly. What the order prohibited was a trespassory assembly. We accept Mr. Butt's contention [for the prosecution] that a trespassory assembly is one where the public's right of access to land has been exceeded. We do not in the light of our conclusion on that aspect have to consider whether the appellants knew they were taking part in a prohibited assembly. Their user of the highway was a reasonable user. Accordingly, for the reasons we have sought to explain we have unanimously reached the conclusion that the evidence is not such that properly directed we could properly convict of that offence. Accordingly there is no case for the appellants to answer and their appeals must be allowed."

In the case stated to the Divisional Court two questions were stated for its opinion:

"(i) Where there is in force an order under section 14A(2), and on the public highway within the area and time covered by the order there is a peaceful assembly of 20 or more persons which does not obstruct the highway, does such assembly exceed the public's rights of access to the highway so as to constitute a trespassory assembly within the terms of section 14A? (ii) In order to prove an offence under section 14B(2), is it necessary for the prosecution to prove that each of the 20 or more persons present is exceeding the limits of the public's right of access or merely that 20 or more persons were present and that some of them were exceeding the limits of the public's right of access?"

The Divisional Court answered the first question in the affirmative. In his judgment in the Divisional Court [1998] Q.B. 563, 570 McCowan L.J. stated:

"In the present case counsel for the defendants, Mr. Starmer, argued as he did before the Crown Court that any assembly on the highway is lawful as long as it is peaceful and non-obstructive of the highway. This view appears to have been accepted by the Crown Court. In my judgment, however, it is mistaken. It leaves out of account the existence of the order made under section 14A and its operation to prohibit the holding of any assembly which occurs to restrict the limited right of access to the highway by the public. I would accordingly answer the first question posed by the Crown Court for this court in the affirmative. Counsel for the defendants also argued before us that a right to passage and repassage must include anything incidental thereto. I would accept that, but it leaves the question of what is incidental to passage or repassage. Passing the time of day with an acquaintance whom one happens to meet on the highway might well qualify, but I would reject the suggestion that the holding of an assembly of 21 persons possibly could, any more than I would accept counsel's suggestion, by way of analogy, that a photographer on a public highway adjacent to the Queen's land taking photographs from the highway of members of the Royal Family on that land would only be doing something which was incidental to his right of passage or repassage on that highway."

A Collins J. stated, at pp. 571–572:

> "The holding of a meeting, a demonstration or a vigil on the highway, however peaceable, has nothing to do with the right of passage. Such activities may, if they do not cause an obstruction, be tolerated, but there is no legal right to pursue them. A right to do something only exists if it cannot be stopped: the fact that it would not be stopped does not create a right to do it."

He said, at p. 573:

> "The existence of a lawful excuse for doing something does not necessarily establish a legal right to do it. In the context of the criminal offence of obstruction, lawful excuse is naturally seen in terms of offending and not in terms of civil trespass."

It was agreed before the Divisional Court that the second question should be answered in the negative, in the sense that the prosecution need prove no more than that the assembly consisted of 20 or more persons and that the particular person accused was taking part in that assembly knowing it to be prohibited by an order under section 14A.

The point of law of general public importance stated for the opinion D of this House is the same as that contained in the first question stated for the opinion of the Divisional Court:

> "Where there is in force an order made under section 14A(2), and on the public highway within the area and time covered by the order there is a peaceful assembly of 20 or more persons which does not obstruct the highway, does such an assembly exceed the public's rights of access to the highway so as to constitute a trespassory assembly within the terms of section 14A?"

My Lords, I consider that in the light of the well known authorities cited to the House the present state of the law is correctly stated in the following passage in Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue, vol. 21, pp. 77–78, para. 110:

> "The right of the public is a right to pass along a highway for the purpose of legitimate travel, not to be on it, except so far as the public's presence is attributable to a reasonable and proper user of the highway as such. A person who is found using the highway for other purposes must be presumed to have gone there for those purposes and not with a legitimate object, and as against the owner of the soil he is to be treated as a trespasser."

G

However I consider that there are indications in the authorities that the public's right to use the highway may be extended and that the important issue before your Lordships' House is whether that right should be extended so that the public has a right in some circumstances to hold a peaceful assembly on the public highway provided that it does not obstruct the use of the highway.

H

To consider this issue I must first turn to the principal authorities which establish the principle stated in Halsbury's Laws of England. In Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142 it was held that the plaintiff was a trespasser when, on the occasion of a grouse drive upon a moor owned by the Duke of Rutland, the plaintiff went upon a highway which crossed it, not for the purpose of using it as a highway, but solely for the purpose of using it to interfere with the defendant's enjoyment of his right of shooting, by preventing the grouse from flying towards the butts occupied by the guns. Lopes L.J. stated, at p. 154:

> "The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that, if a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired, he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and repass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil, who has, subject to this easement, precisely the same estate in the soil as he had previously to any easement being acquired by the public."

> "According to these authorities, the right of the public upon a highway is that of passing and repassing over land the soil of which may be owned by a private person. Using that soil for any other purpose lawful or unlawful is a trespass. I understand those words to mean that the purpose need not be unlawful in itself; as for example, to commit an assault or a felony upon the high road. It is enough that it should be a user of the soil of the high road for a purpose other than that which is the proper use of a highway, namely that of passing and repassing along it."

In Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752 the defendant, who published information as to the performances of racehorses in training, walked backwards and forwards on a portion of the highway over the plaintiff's land about 15 yards in length for a period of about an hour and a half, watching and taking notes of the trials of racehorses on the plaintiff's land. The Court of Appeal following the decision in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland upheld a verdict that the defendant was a trespasser.

In Liddle v. Yorkshire (North Riding) County Council [1934] 2 K.B. 101, 125–127 Slesser L.J. stated the right of the public to use the highway in the terms employed by Lopes L.J. in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, at p. 154, and in Randall v. Tarrant [1955] 1 W.L.R. 255, 259 Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. stated:

> "it is well established that a highway must not be used in quite a different manner from passage along it and the pretext of walking up and down along it will not legitimise such a use."

Therefore, as I have stated, the issue which arises in the present appeal is whether the right of the public to use the highway, as stated by Lopes L.J. in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, should be extended and should include the right to hold a peaceful public assembly on a highway, such as the A344, which causes no obstruction to persons passing along the highway and which the Crown Court found to be a reasonable user of the highway.

A In my opinion your Lordships' House should so hold for three main reason which are as follows. First, the common law recognises that there is a right for members of the public to assemble together to express views on matters of public concern and I consider that the common law should now recognise that this right, which is one of the fundamental rights of citizens in a democracy, is unduly restricted unless it can be exercised in some circumstances on the public highway. Secondly, the law as to trespass on B the highway should be in conformity with the law relating to proceedings for wilful obstruction of the highway under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 that a peaceful assembly on the highway may be a reasonable use of the highway. Thirdly, there is a recognition in the authorities that it may be appropriate that the public's right to use the highway should be extended, in the words of Collins L.J. in Hickman v. Maisey, at p. 758:

C "in accordance with the enlarged notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised, but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage."

I now turn to state these reasons more fully.

D The common law right of public assembly is unduly restricted unless it can be exercised in some circumstances on the public highway

In Hubbard v. Pitt [1976] Q.B. 142, 178–179 Lord Denning M.R. stated:

"Finally, the real grievance of the plaintiffs is about the placards and leaflets. To restrain these by an interlocutory injunction would be contrary to the principle laid down by the court 85 years ago in E Bonnard v. Perryman [1891] 2 Ch. 269, and repeatedly applied ever since. That case spoke of the right of free speech. Here we have to consider the right to demonstrate and the right to protest on matters of public concern. These are rights which it is in the public interest that individuals should possess; and, indeed, that they should exercise without impediment so long as no wrongful act is done. It is often F the only means by which grievances can be brought to the knowledge of those in authority—at any rate with such impact as to gain a remedy. Our history is full of warnings against suppression of these rights. Most notable was the demonstration at St. Peter's Fields, Manchester, in 1819 in support of universal suffrage. The magistrates sought to stop it. At least 12 were killed and hundreds injured. Afterwards the Court of Common Council of London affirmed 'the G undoubted right of Englishmen to assemble together for the purpose of deliberating upon public grievances.' Such is the right of assembly. So also is the right to meet together, to go in procession, to demonstrate and to protest on matters of public concern. As long as all is done peaceably and in good order, without threats or incitement to violence or obstruction to traffic, it is not prohibited: see Beatty v. Gillbanks (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 308. I stress the need for peace and good H order. Only too often violence may break out: and then it should be firmly handled and severely punished. But so long as good order is maintained, the right to demonstrate must be preserved. In his recent inquiry on the Red Lion Square disorders, Scarman L.J. was asked to > recommend that 'a positive right to demonstrate should be enacted.' He said that it was unnecessary: 'The right, of course, exists, subject only to limits required by the need for good order and the passage of traffic:' The Red Lion Square Disorders of 15 June 1974 (1975) (Cmnd. 5919), p. 38. In the recent report on Contempt of Court (1974) (Cmnd. 5794), the committee considered the campaign of the 'Sunday Times' about thalidomide and said that the issues were 'a legitimate matter for public comment:' p. 28, line 7. It recognised that it was important to maintain the 'freedom of protest on issues of public concern:' p. 100, line 5. It is time for the courts to recognise this too. They should not interfere by interlocutory injunction with the right to demonstrate and to protest any more than they interfere with the right of free speech; provided that everything is done peaceably and in good order."

A B C

In Hubbard v. Pitt the issue before the Court of Appeal was whether the judge in the High Court was right to grant an interlocutory injunction. Lord Denning M.R. dissented on this issue from the other members of the court, Stamp and Orr L.JJ., but they did not express an opinion on the right of public assembly.

In Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, 85 Cr.App.R. 143, 151–152 Otton J. cited the above passage from the judgment of Lord Denning M.R. in Hubbard v. Pitt and said:

> "The courts have long recognised the right to free speech to protest on matters of public concern and to demonstrate on the one hand and the need for peace and good order on the other."

If, as in my opinion it does, the common law recognises the right of public assembly, I consider that the common law should also recognise that in some circumstances this right can be exercised on the highway, provided that it does not obstruct the passage of other citizens, because otherwise the value of the right is greatly diminished. The principles of law in Canada governing the right of public assembly are different to those in England, in part because the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives an express right of freedom of expression, but I consider that the reasoning in the following passage in the judgment of Lamer C.J.C. in the Supreme Court of Canada in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v. Canada (1991) 77 D.L.R. (4th) 385, 394 should also apply to the common law right of public assembly:

> "the freedom of expression cannot be exercised in a vacuum ... it necessarily implies the use of physical space in order to meet its underlying objectives. No one could agree that the exercise of the freedom of expression can be limited solely to places owned by the person wishing to communicate: such an approach would certainly deny the very foundation of the freedom of expression."

G

Conformity between the law of trespass to the highway and the law relating to wilful obstruction of the highway

H

Section 137(1) of the Highways Act 1980 provides: "If a person, without lawful authority or excuse, in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway he is guilty of an offence ..."

A In Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire the defendants were members of a group of animal rights' supporters which stood on the public street in the vicinity of a furrier's shop offering leaflets to pedestrians and holding banners. They were charged with an offence contrary to section 137(1). They were convicted by the justices and their appeals to the Crown Court were dismissed. They then appealed by case stated to the Divisional Court. Both in the Crown Court and in the Divisional Court B the submission of the prosecutor was, 85 Cr.App.R. 143, 146:

"that unless the presence of the defendants upon the highway was for the purpose of its lawful use (i.e. passing and repassing over and along it) or some purpose incidental to that lawful use then their presence on the highway constituted an obstruction. [The prosecutor] further contended that the question of 'reasonableness' did not fall to C be decided if the court was satisfied that the presence of the defendants upon the highway was not for the purpose of its lawful use or some purpose incidental to it."

The Crown Court stated its conclusion as follows:

"We considered ourselves bound by the decision in Waite v. Taylor (1985) 149 J.P. 551. We found that to stand in the highway offering D and distributing leaflets or holding a banner was not incidental to its lawful user, and accordingly that each of the defendants had wilfully obstructed the highway contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980. We therefore dismissed the appeals."

The Divisional Court allowed the appeals and quashed the convictions. In his judgment Glidewell L.J., at pp. 147–148, cited the judgment of Lord E Parker C.J. in Nagy v. Weston [1965] 1 W.L.R. 280, 284 in which Lord Parker C.J. said:

"It is undoubtedly true—[counsel for the defendant] is quite right—that there must be proof that the use in question was an unreasonable use. Whether or not the user amounting to an obstruction is or is not an unreasonable use of the highway is a F question of fact. It depends on all the circumstances, including the length of time the obstruction continues, the place where it occurs, the purpose for which it is done, and of course whether it does in fact cause an actual obstruction as opposed to a potential obstruction."

Glidewell L.J. also cited the judgment of Lord Denning M.R. in Hubbard v. Pitt [1976] Q.B. 142, 174–175 where a group of persons picketed the G plaintiffs' offices by standing on the public footpath in front of the premises holding placards and distributing leaflets and Lord Denning M.R., after quoting the passage from the judgment of Lord Parker C.J. in Nagy v. Weston which Glidewell L.J. quoted, continued:

"In the present case the police evidently thought there was no breach of this law. The presence of these half a dozen people on Saturday H morning for three hours was not an unreasonable use of the highway. They did not interfere with the free passage of people to and fro. Of course, if there had been any fear of a breach of the peace, the police could have interfered: see Duncan v. Jones [1936] 1 K.B. 218. But there was nothing of that kind."

Glidewell L.J. then stated, at p. 150:

> "In Nagy v. Weston itself, the activity being carried on, that is to say the sale of hot dogs in the street, could not in my view be said to be incidental to the right to pass and repass along the street. Clearly, the Divisional Court took the view that it was open to the magistrates to consider, as a question of fact, whether the activity was or was not reasonable. On the facts the magistrates had concluded that it was unreasonable (an unreasonable obstruction) but if they had concluded that it was reasonable then it is equally clear that in the view of the Divisional Court the offence would not have been made out. That is the way Tudor Evans J. approached the matter in the recent decision of Cooper v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1986) 82 Cr.App.R. 238, 242 and I respectfully agree with him. As counsel pointed out to us in argument, if that is not right, there are a variety of activities which quite commonly go on in the street which may well be the subject of prosecution under section 137. For instance, what is now relatively commonplace, at least in London and large cities, distributing advertising material or free periodicals outside stations, when people are arriving in the morning. Clearly, that is an obstruction; clearly, it is not incidental to passage up and down the street because the distributors are virtually stationary. The question must be: is it a reasonable use of the highway or not? In my judgment that is a question that arises. It may be decided that if the activity grows to an extent that it is unreasonable by reason of the space occupied or the duration of time for which it goes on that an offence would be committed, but it is a matter on the facts for the magistrates, in my view ... Some activities which commonly go on in the street are covered by statute, for instance, the holding of markets or street trading, and thus they are lawful activities because they are lawfully permitted within the meaning of the section. That is lawful authority. But many are not and the question thus is (to follow Lord Parker's dictum): have the prosecution proved in such cases that the defendant was obstructing the highway without lawful excuse? That question is to be answered by deciding whether the activity in which the defendant was engaged was or was not a reasonable user of the highway."

In his judgment Otton J. referred to the balance between the right to demonstrate and the need for peace and good order and stated, at p. 152:

> "On the analysis of the law, given by Glidewell L.J. and his suggested approach with which I totally agree, I consider this balance would be properly struck and that the 'freedom of protest on issues of public concern' would be given the recognition it deserves."

The importance of this decision, which in my opinion was correct, was that, in deciding whether there was a lawful excuse for a technical obstruction of the highway, the Divisional Court rejected the test applied by the Crown Court, which was that a use of the highway which was not incidental to passing along it could not give rise to a lawful excuse, and applied the test whether the use of the highway (even though not incidental to passage) was reasonable or not.

A In my opinion the law would be left in an unsatisfactory state if your Lordships' House held that in this case the peaceful assembly on the highway, which caused no actual obstruction to persons passing along the highway, constituted a criminal trespass under section 14B of the Act of 1986 because the assembly was not incidental to passage along the highway, whilst the law recognised, as held in Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, that such an assembly may be a reasonable use of the B highway and in consequence there is a lawful excuse under section 137 of the Act of 1980 in respect of a charge of wilfully obstructing the free passage along a highway.

The extension of the public's right to use the highway

In the judgments in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 Q.B. 142 the C words of Crompton J. in Reg. v. Pratt, 4 E. & B. 860, 868–869 were quoted:

> ". . . I take it to be clear law that, if a man use the land over which there is a right of way for any purpose, lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing and repassing, he is a trespasser."

D In Pratt's case Erle J., at pp. 867–868, made a similar statement. But in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland Lord Esher M.R. stated the principle in less restrictive terms, at pp. 146–147:

> "Therefore, on the ground that the plaintiff was on the highway, the soil of which belonged to the Duke of Rutland, not for the purpose of using it in order to pass and repass, or for any reasonable or usual mode of using the highway as a highway, I think he was a trespasser. E But I must observe that I think that, if the language of Erle J., and of Crompton J., in Reg. v. Pratt, were construed too largely, the effect might be to interfere with the universal usage as regards highways in this country in a way which would be mischievous, and would derogate from the reasonable exercise of the rights of the public. Construed too strictly, it might imply that the public could do absolutely nothing but F pass or repass on the highway, and that to do anything else whatever upon it would be a trespass. I do not think that is so. Highways are, no doubt, dedicated prima facie for the purpose of passage; but things are done upon them by everybody which are recognised as being rightly done, and as constituting a reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such. If a person on a highway does not transgress such reasonable and usual mode of using it, I do not think that he G will be a trespasser."

In their judgments in Hickman v. Maisey [1900] 1 Q.B. 752 A. L. Smith and Collins L.JJ. accepted that the right of the public to pass and repass on the highway was subject to some degree of extension. A. L. Smith L.J. stated, at pp. 755–756:

> H "Many authorities, of which the well known case of Dovaston v. Payne, 2 H.Bl. 527 is one, show that prima facie the right of the public is merely to pass and repass along the highway; but I quite agree with what Lord Esher M.R. said in Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, though I think it is a slight extension of the rule as previously stated, namely, > that, though highways are dedicated prima facie for the purpose of passage, 'things are done upon them by everybody which are recognised as being rightly done and as constituting a reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such;' and, 'if a person on a highway does not transgress such reasonable and usual mode of using it,' he will not be a trespasser; but, if he does 'acts other than the reasonable and ordinary user of a highway as such' he will be a trespasser. For instance, if a man, while using a highway for passage, sat down for a time to rest himself by the side of the road, to call that a trespass would be unreasonable. Similarly, to take a case suggested during the argument, if a man took a sketch from the highway, I should say that no reasonable person would treat that as an act of trespass. But I cannot agree with the contention of the defendant's counsel that the acts which this defendant did, not really for the purpose of using the highway as such, but for the purpose of carrying on his business as a racing tout to the detriment of the plaintiff by watching the trials of racehorses on the plaintiff's land, were within such an ordinary and reasonable user of the highway as I have mentioned."

And Collins L.J. stated, at pp. 757–758:

> "Now primarily the purpose for which a highway is dedicated is that of passage, as is shown by Dovaston v. Payne; and, although in modern times a reasonable extension has been given to the use of the highway as such, the authorities show that the primary purpose of the dedication must always be kept in view. The right of the public to pass and repass on a highway is subject to all those reasonable extensions which may from time to time be recognised as necessary to its exercise in accordance with the enlarged notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised, but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage."

It can be contended that these passages in the judgments of Lord Esher M.R. and A. L. Smith and Collins L.JJ. only contemplate an extension of the rights of the public provided that the highway is used "as such," and that the extended use must be connected with using the highway for passing and repassing. But I consider that the passages are open to a broader construction and that they do not exclude a reasonable use of the highway beyond passing and repassing, provided always that the use is not inconsistent with the paramount purpose of a highway, which is for the use of the public to pass and repass. Therefore for your Lordships' House to uphold the defendants' argument would not constitute a reversal of a well established principle but rather would be an extension of the law in a way foreshadowed by earlier judgments. In C. (A Minor) v. Director of Public Prosecutions [1996] A.C. 1 this House was considering whether a long established rule of the criminal law should be set aside and I consider that the approach stated by Lord Lowry, at p. 28B–D, is not applicable to the present case.

Therefore, for the reasons which I have given, I am of opinion that the holding of a public assembly on a highway can constitute a reasonable

A user of the highway and accordingly will not constitute a trespass and I would allow the appeal. But I desire to emphasise that my opinion that this appeal should be allowed is based on the finding of the Crown Court that the assembly in which the defendants took part on this particular highway, the A344, at this particular time, constituted a reasonable use of the highway. I would not hold that a peaceful and non-obstructive public assembly on a highway is always a reasonable user and is therefore not a B trespass.

It is for the tribunal of fact to decide whether the user was reasonable. In Hirst v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, 85 Cr.App.R. 143, 150 Glidewell L.J. makes it clear that a reasonable activity in the street may become unreasonable by reason of the space occupied or the duration of time for which it goes on, "but it is a matter on the facts for the C magistrates, in my view."

If members of the public took part in an assembly on a highway but the highway was, for example, a small, quiet country road or was a bridleway or a footpath, and the assembly interfered with the landowner's enjoyment of the land across which the highway ran or which it bordered, I think it would be open to the justices to hold that, notwithstanding the importance of the democratic right to hold a public assembly, nevertheless D in the particular circumstances of the case the assembly was an unreasonable user of the highway and therefore constituted a trespass.

In conclusion I refer to one further matter. In setting out the facts the judgment of the Crown Court states:

> "At 5.45 p.m. [Inspector Mackie] and other officers saw a sizeable group (he said by that he meant one he estimated at about 20 people) E scale the fence of the monument and enter it. The officers also saw that group escorted out again either by police or security officers without any arrests or violence."

And:

> "Of course the basis of Inspector Mackie's undisputedly reasonable and sensibly intended intervention was to prevent any such thing as F an incursion into the monument such as had occurred an hour earlier in which there was no evidence that the appellants were involved."

I thought for a time in the course of the argument that the decision of the Crown Court might be erroneous because it appears that Inspector Mackie thought that the assembly of which the defendants were a part was about to commit an act of trespass by entering the monument, as had G happened an hour earlier. I consider that there is an argument of some force that a reasonable user of the highway by an assembly may become an unreasonable user so that the non-trespassory assembly becomes a trespassory assembly if it appears that members of the assembly are about to commit unlawful acts. However, this point did not arise in the questions stated for the opinion of the Divisional Court and was not argued before the Divisional Court, and the point does not arise on the question stated H for the opinion of your Lordships' House. Therefore it would not be right to decide the appeal on this point. Accordingly I express no concluded opinion on the point or on the circumstances in which a non-trespassory assembly may become a trespassory assembly.

For the reasons which I have given I would allow the appeal and would answer the certified question before your Lordships' House as follows. "No, if the tribunal of fact finds that the assembly was a reasonable user of the highway." A Appeal allowed. Order of Crown Court restored.

Application for Leave to Move for Judicial Review

Representation

The Applicant appeared in person.
Miss J McNeill (instructed by Messrs Lawford & Co , Richmond) appeared on behalf of the Respondent.

Judgment

Lord Justice Simon Brown:

My Lord, Lord Justice Auld, will give the first judgment.

Lord Justice Auld:

Mrs Subha Ktorides renews an application for leave to challenge by way of judicial review a decision of the University of Nottingham that she has failed part of a one year postgraduate teacher training course. The course, which she began in September 1994, would have resulted, if all had gone well for her, in the award of the postgraduate certificate of education in the summer of 1995.

The course included periods of practical teaching experience in schools with which the University had made arrangements for the purpose. They have been called “partnership schools”. The school or schools with which a student teacher undertook teaching practice contributed to the University's assessment of his or her performance in determining success or failure in the course. Inevitably, the schools' chief contribution concerned the student's performance in the classroom during the periods of teaching practice. The University has a full and detailed document called “A Partnership”, describing the course, its objects and its system in great detail. The members of the partnership, so described, are the University, the schools with which it has arrangements for placements for teaching practice and the student teachers themselves. The document provides in a section headed “Roles and Responsibilities”, the content and organisation of the course. As to assessment of the student's performance, it provides in paragraph 19 that:

> “Partner Schools are responsible for providing the specific context in which students are supported in practising and developing professional skills and qualities.”

It continues:

> “They will have a leading responsibility for the school-based training of students to teach their specialist subjects and develop their understanding of how pupils learn training students to manage classes and assess pupils supervising students in relation to school-based elements of the course assessing student competences in subject application and classroom skills.”

There is then a note to that paragraph which reads:

> “The word ‘leading’ is not meant to imply total responsibility. School of Education method tutors will also be involved in the training aspects listed. The input of both will be important, and will vary during the course.”

In the preceding paragraph, paragraph 18, there is a reference to the involvement of the schools in ensuring that student competencies are assessed and in the awarding of the qualifications to successful students as part of that partnership.

During the academic year the applicant undertook teaching practice at three schools. The first appears to have gone reasonably well, but she experienced difficulties in the second and, to a lesser extent, in the third. She made a number of complaints about one of the schools, mainly of racism and discriminatory behaviour, and about the University and other staff involved in her training, mainly that they gave her inadequate support.

The University Examination Board determined in July 1995 that she had failed the teaching practice element of the course and thus had not qualified for the certificate of education.

At the applicant's request the University agreed to extend or defer the completion of her course into the autumn of 1995 to enable her to undertake a further period of teaching practice at a fourth school. So far as the applicant and the school are concerned, that period of practice seems to have been satisfactory, but the University, through her tutors and others who observed and otherwise appraised her performance, took a different view. In November 1995 the University informed her that she had failed and that the Board of the Faculty of Education had recommended that her course be terminated.

It added that that recommendation would be automatically confirmed unless she requested a hearing by a body called the Board of Undergraduate Studies.

The applicant sought a hearing, making eight specific complaints about the University's treatment of her. These included allegations of improper conduct by her tutor and an external examiner and of failure by the examiners to consider all relevant matters and to consult fully with the placement school when making their assessment.

On 12th January 1996 the University's Undergraduate's Studies Committee, chaired by Professor D J Birch of the Law School, conducted an oral inquiry into the applicant's complaints. I should note the limited powers of that body. It could not substitute a pass for a fail decision, save in limited circumstances, but it could determine whether or not to confirm the decision to terminate the course and, in the latter event, whether the student should be allowed to re-sit some or all of the course constituents.

The Committee concluded that two of the applicant's complaints had some foundation, namely that the examiners had failed to discuss sufficiently with the placement school her performance in teaching practice, and thus had failed to take some relevant considerations into account in reaching their decision. However, the Committee expressed a belief that the examiners would still have failed the applicant if they had followed the procedures properly in those respects. Nevertheless, it considered that her course should not be automatically terminated, as had been indicated by the University, and that she should be offered the opportunity of a further period of teaching practice and assessment.

By letter of 15th January 1996, three days later, the University communicated that decision to the applicant, stating that it would contact her in due course to make arrangements. It appears that there was some discussion between Professor Birch and the applicant after the Committee had sat, in which, according to the applicant, Professor Birch had suggested that more than just two of her criticisms had been regarded as having some foundation and that the University might consider the funding of a “resit” by the applicant of her course at some other university. However, the decision communicated to the applicant in the letter of 15th January 1996 was simply that she should be allowed to “re-sit” her course at the University.

The University wrote again a week later, on 22nd January 1996, to the applicant, inviting her to indicate whether she wished to undertake further teaching practice and reassessment and offering to arrange it. The applicant did not reply to that letter. It does appear, however, from what she has told us this morning that there was some other correspondence passing between her and the University over the next few months in which she pressed the University to change its mind and find that she had passed, or, alternatively, to fund a re-sit of the teaching practice part of the course at another university.

The next indication of the applicant's intention in relation to the University's offer that she could re-sit the teaching practice part of its course came in the form of a solicitor's letter over three months later, of 3rd May 1996. It notified the University of her intention to seek judicial review of the decision of 12th January 1996 upholding the decision of the examiners that she had failed the course.

There was, it seems, further correspondence in which the University expressed its continuing willingness to allow the applicant to retake the teaching practice part of the course and in which the applicant's solicitors indicated her unwillingness to do so. As a result, the University, by a letter of 17th June 1996, informed the applicant's solicitors that it had recorded that she had failed her course and had not accepted its offer to permit her to repeat the practical teaching part of it. It should be noted that it did not terminate her course or her entitlement to redo the teaching part of it.

The applicant has not sought to invoke the visitatorial jurisdiction provided by the University. She has made no approach to the Visitor to challenge the treatment of her complaints by the Committee in January 1996. This application for leave to move for judicial review, which is in respect of the decision of 12th January 1996, was not made until August 1996, that is to say over six months after the event.

The applicant has appeared in person this morning to support her application, and we have also had the benefit of a full written application for leave in amended form and a skeleton argument provided by her former counsel.

The first matter, putting aside the merits with which the applicant has to deal, is whether this court has jurisdiction to deal with her complaint or whether it is properly a matter for the exclusive jurisdiction, in the first instance, of the University Visitor. The well-established rule is that the domestic affairs of a university, including the decisions of its examiners, are matters for resolution by the university, subject to review, in the first instance, by its visitor, and not for this court.

The leading authority for that well-established principle, which appears in a number of others, is Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] 1 AC 795 . It is for the visitor to determine complaints of this sort where the dispute relates to the correct interpretation and fair administration of the domestic law of a university through its statutes and ordinances and other instruments by which it guides its conduct.

The applicant maintains that in the circumstances of this case the Visitor does not have that jurisdiction. She submits that the court should accept jurisdiction for three main reasons. The first is that there is, she maintains, a statutory intrusion into the University's role in the provision of teacher training and certification of teachers by virtue of the provisions of the Education Teachers Regulations 1993 and a supporting ministerial circular enabling the minister to withdraw accreditation of an institution for such training and certification if the institution does not abide by the procedures indicated by the minister as being appropriate for it.

Second, the applicant maintains that the statutory scheme as interpreted by the University in the Partnership Document, to which I have referred, envisages an involvement of others (the placement schools) in the organisation of courses and in the assessment of student performance. Indeed, she maintains, as the document itself indicates, there are three parties involved — the University, the schools and the student teacher herself — in the assessment process. Accordingly, she maintains that the decision is not solely that of the University and review of it is not a matter for its exclusive visitatorial jurisdiction.

Third, the applicant maintains, through the arguments submitted by her former counsel in the written skeleton argument, that recent authorities indicate that the courts may intervene where there has been unfairness by a university in allowing non-academic considerations to intrude on an academic evaluation or where the decision-making is procedurally improper.

As to the first of those contentions, that of statutory intrusion or underpinning, I agree with Popplewell J that the accreditation of the University for the conduct of such a course pursuant to the 1993 regulations and its preparation of a working document in accordance with Government guidance are not sufficient to remove the exclusive jurisdiction of the University Visitor, subject, of course, to the ultimate supervision of this court. It is not sufficient to enable this court to intrude in the University's decision-making process in connection with its own affairs, in particular its assessment of its students. Neither the regulations nor the ministerial circular, to which I have referred, arguably qualifies the University's exclusive role through its visitor in that respect.

As to the sharing of responsibilities for the teacher training part of the course (described in paragraphs 18 and 19 of the Partnership Document), it does not, in my view, remove from the University the final responsibility of the University's examiners, as provided in paragraph 53 of the Document, which reads:

> “The final decision on student assessment is made by the Board of Examiners, which will if necessary take into account the differences between schools in awarding a pass. Assessment is on a pass/fail basis only.”

Whether the final assessment in this case stands, as I have said, is a matter for the exclusive jurisdiction of the University Visitor, to the extent that he can properly intervene.

As to the suggestion of recent erosion of the visitatorial jurisdiction in such matters, there is, as I read the authorities, no basis for it. The exclusive visitatorial jurisdiction, certainly over academic decisions and the proper application of university procedures in reaching them, is alive and well. In my view, there is no arguable basis, certainly in the circumstances of this case, for the assumption by the courts of an overlapping review before the visitor has exercised his jurisdiction.

On the ground of jurisdiction alone I would therefore refuse this application.

There is, in any event, the matter of the applicant's delay in seeking relief by way of judicial review. The decision under challenge is that of the University Committee of 12th January 1996 upholding the decision of the University's examiners that the applicant had failed her course. As I have said, a further six months went by before she made this application. She has sought to explain that delay by reference to her attempts after January 1996 to persuade the University to finance her completion of the teaching part of the course at another institution. However, as Popplewell J observed in refusing leave, a clear and firm decision was made and communicated to the applicant in January 1996 that she had failed but that she could retake the teaching practice part of her course at the University if she wished. She took well over three months before communicating, via her solicitor's letter of 3rd May 1996, that it was a reversal of the decision of failure or nothing that she would accept, and then a further three months or so before she made this application.

Whilst it may be that the applicant harboured hopes that she could persuade the University to fund the continuance of her course at another institution, and indeed that another institution would accept her and accept the qualifications that she would take with her from Nottingham, that can in no way justify the delay that occurred here in seeking to challenge the decision of January 1996.

In my view, the application, more than double the outside period permitted for such an application, was far too late, and there is no satisfactory reason shown for the failure to make it promptly and within the time. For that reason also I would refuse this application.

Lord Justice Henry:

I agree.

LORD JUSTICE SIMON BROWN: Nobody who has listened to the applicant plead her own cause before the court today could fail to be struck by the depth of the resentment she so evidently feels about the way the University of Nottingham has treated her in recent times. Clearly she should be able to have her grievance fully heard and, if it were to prove well-founded on the facts, to have it remedied. The sole question before us today, however, is by what body should it be heard, and, more particularly, is she entitled to have it adjudicated on within the scope of an application for judicial review?

I have to say that there seems to me no room whatever for doubt on this central and fundamental question. All aspects of the applicant's complaint here make it, in my judgment, par excellence a complaint which can, and therefore can only properly, be heard by the university's visitor. The assessment of a student's competence and the decision whether or not to award a particular academic qualification, here a postgraduate certificate in education, is pre-eminently a question to be decided within the regime established by the university's own rules and regulations. True, partner schools here were to have a leading responsibility for assessing the important practical aspect of the student's teaching skills. True too, the Department of Education is interested, no doubt vitally interested, in the proper administration of this aspect of educational training, but, as my Lord has explained and as the Judge below held, these considerations do not begin to take this case out of the long-established principle that the visitor has not only jurisdiction, but indeed exclusive jurisdiction, in cases of this kind.

That view is sufficient to dispose of this application, and that indeed is the ground upon which I, for my part, would reject this application for leave. That is not, however, to say that I disagree with what my Lord has said also on the issue of delay; it is only that delay, as it seems to me, is here an altogether less clear, compelling and indeed decisive basis for refusing leave. One might have been prepared to exercise discretion to overcome the applicant's difficulty resulting from her delay. There is no discretion to override the visitor's exclusive jurisdiction in cases of this kind. The application must, accordingly, be dismissed.

ORDER: Application dismissed.

1. Dr Evans is a lecturer in history at Cambridge University. She has a long running dispute with the University about her failure to obtain promotion. She complains about various aspects of the promotion system and believes that she should have been promoted to professor.

2. There are before the court two sets of proceedings. In the first, CO/4285/2000, she challenges the General Board's Promotions Committee's decision of 17 October 2000 and the General Board's decision of 25 October 2000 not to recommend her for promotion as well as the Appeals Committee's decision of 11 December 2000 to reject her appeal against the General Board's decision. In the second, CO/4472/2001, she challenges the General Board's decision of 10 October 2001 not to propose the creation for her of a personal professorship. The proceedings were stayed pending further consideration of Dr Evans for promotion. Also, the University has tried to resolve Dr Evans grievances internally but has been unable to do so. At one stage Sir Brian Neill became involved as a mediator.

3. When the matters became before Burton J. on paper he gave various directions including one for an oral hearing on notice. The case came before me on 9 May 2002. After hearing argument for most of the day I granted permission but limited to the issue of whether or not the challenged decisions are amenable to judicial review. It seemed to me that this issue lies at the heart of the case and if resolved against Dr Evans would dispose of the case. I gave her the opportunity to lodge any further submission on this issue in writing by 20 May 2002 and gave the Defendant the opportunity of replying in writing on any points of law. Both parties have availed themselves of these opportunities. I further directed that the grant or otherwise of permission on any of the other issues should await the outcome of my decision.

4. Oxford and Cambridge Universities derive their powers from the Oxford and Cambridge Act 1923. They have statutory power to make their own statutes subject to the approval of the Privy Council, and also their own ordinances. They are different from other universities. They have no visitor.

5. A similar application was made by Dr Evans in 1998. She sought leave to bring proceedings for judicial review of a decision of the Promotions Appeals Committee on 2 March 1998, claiming she had been the subject of a miscarriage of justice on a number of grounds. Turner J, in refusing permission (see CO/×./1998 unreported) pointed out that there had for a considerable period been a running dispute between Dr Evans and the University on the basis that she felt her qualifications entitled her to serious consideration for promotion to the position of professor. She had brought proceedings in the employment tribunal and the county court. Turner J. dealt with the various substantive complaints deciding that none of them had any merit before concluding:

> "Quite apart from the specific grounds put forward by the applicant, which themselves lack intrinsic merit, generally, the applicant has failed to satisfy me there is in her application to challenge the decision of the Appeals Committee, any sufficient element of public law to justify the grant of leave. The essence of the dispute between the applicant and the University lies in its role as an employer and her position as an employee. That relationship is governed by the ordinary rules of the law of contract. If and to the extent that the applicant wishes to claim that her employer has acted unfairly towards her, that is capable of resolution as a breach of her private law rights. The mere fact that certain aspects of the government of the University do fall within the field of public law if, by way of example, its decisions have been reached by ignoring well known public law principles, then public law can be successfully invoked. But that is a long way from anything from which the applicant seeks to ventilate in regard to her own promotion and the activities of the Appeals Committee."

The Promotions Process

6. As I understand the process it is as follows. First, candidates are assessed by faculties under published criteria; next, the Promotions Committee of the General Board sits in sub–committees to deal with groups of disciplines. Each candidate is evaluated with two or three sentences of reasons. The third stage is for the whole of the General Board's Promotions Committee to come together. It tries to achieve consistency across the disciplines. This meeting takes a day and in the present case some 129 candidates were assessed against seven criteria. Finally the General Board ratifies the Committee's decision and there is a right of appeal to the Appeals Committee. Dr Evans makes various points about the fairness of the procedure, absence of reasons and so forth but it is unnecessary to go into these at this juncture.

7. The Second challenge complains that the University's General Board did not propose the creation for her of a personal professorship. Here again numerous grounds are advanced including reasons, unlawful delegation of powers by the General Board, breach of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, failure to divulge who considered her application for promotion, breach of legitimate expectation and breach of statutory duty under the Data Protection Act 1998. Again, at this stage I need go into no further detail.

8. Dr Evan's case is that she is not just a discontented employee of the University (although in my view she is certainly that). She goes much further claiming that what the University has been doing is unlawful. She has been campaigning for many years for a complete overhaul and reform of the promotion process, which in her view is out of date and not geared to ensuring that the best qualified candidates are promoted. For example, she says there is no indication how the General Board could satisfy itself from the materials put to it. It should be able to see what it is approving and why rather then merely acting as a rubber stamp. Candidates are given nothing to show how to do better or why they have failed; and they should be.

9. Dr Evans points to the fact that she is an officer holder within the University, a university lecturer in the Faculty of History. She draws attention to the continuity of the office and to the fact she cannot be dismissed. The promotion procedures are ordinances of the University.

10. The demarcation between public law disputes which the Administrative Court will entertain and private law disputes which it will not is not always capable of precise definition. The question to be asked in the present case is whether the decision–makers were exercising public law or private law functions. In this regard the prime focus is not so much on the status and nature of the body making the decision as on the particular function that it is exercising. Where that function relates to employment, cases that have came before the courts have usually fallen on the private law side of the line for the no doubt obvious reason that there are other remedies of a statutory or contractual nature.

11. The indisputable fact is that Dr Evans is an employee of the University. She has a contract of employment with the University, one that incorporates the University's own rules made through ordinances. If the University is in breach of contract through failing to comply with its own rules her remedy is to claim breach of contract. She also has rights giving access to an employment tribunal.

12. Dr Evans, as I have said, makes much of being an officer holder, claiming that this fact gives rise to the availability of public law remedies. But, as Mr Clarke for the University points out, there is a distinction between being an office holder within the University and holding a public office. In this case being an office holder within the University means no more than being an employee within the University.

13. If the University's submission is wrong then the consequences would be to open up judicial review to every disgruntled academic employee at Oxford and Cambridge universities. I cannot believe that to be right. Dr Evans has to attach any claim for judicial review to an impeachable public law decision. In looking at the decision to see what function the decision–makers in this case were performing, the answer seems to me to be clear that they were ones of an employment nature rather than public ones.

14. Dr Evan's second complaint that the General Board did not propose the creation for her of a personal professorship seems to me to emphasise the personal character of this dispute. She is not claiming appointment to an established chair, rather that one should be created for her. I do not regard this as significantly different from an employee in a business who complains that he has not been promoted to a post that should have been tailor made for him.

The Authorities

15. I turn therefore to look and see how the observations of Turner J. in 1998 accord with authority. There is some dispute as to the extent, if any to which the public/private law point was argued before him. In R v Panel on Take–Overs and Mergers ex parte Datafin PLC [1987] 1QB 815 the Court of Appeal had to consider whether decisions of the Take–Over Panel were amenable to judicial review. It concluded that they were. If there is a public duty the court will police it. Lord Donaldson M.R said at 835G:

> "No one could have been in the least surprised if the panel had been initiated and operated under the direct authority of statute law, since it operates wholly in the public domain. Its jurisdiction extends throughout the United Kingdom. Its code and rulings apply equally to all who wish to make take–over bids or promote mergers, whether or not they are members of bodies represented on the panel. Its lack of a direct statutory base is a complete anomaly, judged by the experience of other comparable markets world wide."

The Court looked closely at the underlying circumstances of what the Take– Over panel was doing. This was of much greater relevance than the source of its power.

16. R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Benwell [1985] 1QB 554 was a case where a prison officer obtained judicial review of a decision to dismiss him for a breach of the code of discipline for prison officers. But he had entered the prison service as a person holding the office of constable and not under a contract of employment. Accordingly, he had no private law rights that could be enforced in civil proceedings. In the course of his judgment Hodgson J cited with apparent approval Purchas L.J in R v East Berkshire Health Authority ex parte Walsh [1985] QB 152, 176B:

> "There is a danger of confusing the rights with their appropriate remedies enjoyed by an employee arising out of a private contract of employment with the performance by a public body of the duties imposed upon it as part of the statutory terms under which it exercises its powers. The former are appropriate for private remedies inter parties whether by action in the High Court or in the appropriate statutory tribunal, whilst the latter are subject to the supervisory powers of the court under R.S.C. Ord 53."

Walsh was distinguishable because the disciplinary procedures in that case were incorporated into the contract of service which deprived the procedures and compliance with them of any possible public law character. So in the present case promotion is something to be determined according to Dr Evan's terms of service.

17. University Council of The Vidyodaya University of Ceylon v Linus Silva [1965] 1W.L.R 77 was a Privy Council decision. The University had summarily terminated the Vice–Chancellor's appointment without him being informed of the nature of the allegations against him or being afforded an opportunity of being heard in his own defence. It was held that he was not shown to be in any special position other than a servant of the University and that where there was an ordinary contractual relationship of master and servant the latter could not obtain an order of certiorari if the master had terminated the contract. Lord Morris of Borth–y–Guest said at 90 C:

> "The circumstances that the University was established by statute and is regulated by the statutory enactments contained in the Act does not involve that contracts of employment which are made with teachers and which are subject to the provisions of section 18(e) are other than ordinary contracts of master and servant."

18. That decision was referred to by Lord Wilberforce in Malloch v Aberdeen Corporation [1971] 1W.L.R 1578 where the House of Lords decided by three to two that teachers in Scotland had in general a right to be heard before they were dismissed. He said at 1596F:

"On the other hand, there are some cases where the distinction has been lost sight of, and where the mere allocation of the label - master and servant - has been thought decisive against an administrative law remedy.

One such, which I refer to because it may be thought to have some relevance here is Vidyodaya University Council v Silva [1965] 1W.L.R. 77, concerned with a university professor, who was dismissed without a hearing. He succeeded before the Supreme Court of Ceylon in obtaining an order for certiorari to quash the decision of the University, but that judgment was set aside by the Privy Council on the ground that the relation was that of master and servant to which the remedy of certiorari had no application. It would not be necessary or appropriate to disagree with the procedural or even the factual basis on which this decision rests, but I must confess that I could not follow it in this country in so far as it involves a denial of any remedy of administrative law to analogous employments. Statutory provisions similar to those on which the employment rested would tend to show, to my mind, in England or in Scotland, that it was one of a sufficiently public character, or one partaking sufficiently of the nature of an office, to attract appropriate remedies of administrative law."

19. Dr Evans cited McLaren v The Home Office [1990] I.R.L.R. 338 where the Court of Appeal held that the first instance judge had wrongly taken the view that the relationship between a prison officer and the Home Office was a matter of public law rather than private law and that any claim had to be raised by way of an application for judicial review. Woolf L.J, as he then was, said at paragraph 38 that in resolving the issue whether the prison officer was required to bring his claim by way of judicial review the following principles had to be borne in mind:

"1. In relation to his personal claims against an employer, an employee of a public body is normally in exactly the same situation as other employees. If he has a cause of action and he wishes to assert or establish his rights in relation to his employment he can bring proceeding for damages, a declaration or an injunction (except in relation to the Crown) in the High Court or the County Court in the ordinary way. The fact that a person is employed by the Crown may limit his rights against the Crown but otherwise his position is very much the same as any other employees. However, he may, instead of having an ordinary master and servant relationship with the Crown, hold office under the Crown and may have been appointed to that office as a result of the Crown exercising a prerogative power for, as in this case, a statutory power. If he holds such an appointment then it will almost invariably be terminable at will and may be subject to other imitations but whatever rights the employees has will be enforceable normally by an ordinary action. Not only will it not be necessary for him to seek relief by way of judicial review, it will normally be inappropriate for him to do so××..

2. There can however be situations where an employee of a public body can seek judicial review and obtain a remedy which would not be available to an employee in the private sector. This will arise where there exists some disciplinary or other body established under the prerogative or by statute to which the employer or the employee is entitled or required to refer disputes affecting their relationship. The procedure of judicial review can then be appropriate because it has always been part of the role of the court in public law proceedings to supervise inferior tribunals and the court in reviewing disciplinary proceedings is performing a similar role. As long as the 'tribunal' or other body has a sufficient public law element, which it almost invariable will have if the employer is the Crown and it is not domestic or wholly informal its proceedings and determination can be an appropriate subject for judicial review××.

3. In addition if an employee of the Crown or other public body is adversely affected by a decision of general application by his employer, but he contends that that decision is flawed on what I loosely describe as Wednesbury grounds, he can be entitled to challenge that decision by a way of judicial review××..

4. There can be situations where although there are disciplinary procedures which are applicable they are of a purely domestic nature and therefore, albeit that their > decisions might affect the public, the process of judicial review will not be available××."

It is to be noted that in McLaren's case the employment dispute was regarded as a private law matter despite the fact that the claimant prison officer worked in a public institution.

20. Dr Evans also relied on Clark v University of Lincolnshire and Humberside (C.A. unreported 19 April 2000). The examiners had failed an examination for plagiarism. The Court of Appeal declined to strike out the claimant's claim for breach of contract merely because an application for judicial review would have been more applicable. Clark , however, was not concerned with an employment situation but with the failure of an examination paper, a function that plainly in my judgment crosses the public law boundary.

21. R v The British Broadcasting Corporation ex parte Lavelle [1983] 1W.L.R 23 is a decision that illustrates the caution of the courts in permitting what are really employment issues to embark into the public law field. That case was incidentally one of the decisions cited by Woolf L.J. in McLaren as an example of his fourth principle. An employee of the BBC was refused judicial review of the decision to dismiss her. Woolf J (as he then was) said at 39B:

> "××.it seems to me that while the court must have jurisdiction to intervene to prevent a serious injustice occurring it will only do so in very clear cases in which the applicant can show that there is a real danger and not merely a notional danger that there would be a miscarriage of justice in the criminal proceedings if the court did not intervene."

22. The final authority to which it is necessary for me to refer is The Queen on the application of Galligan v The Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University of Oxford (unreported 22 November 1991). In that case it was conceded that the dispute was amenable to judicial review and so the question was never in issue. The decision under review was very different from those in the present case and, as I said at paragraph 52 of the judgment, the court should be very slow to intervene in a matter arising out of an employment dispute and involving the management of the University.

23. In my judgment the principle to be derived from the authorities and to be applied in a case such as the present is that the court has to look closely at the functions of the body whose decision is being questioned and if they are of a private or employment rather than a public nature there will ordinarily be no basis for the Administrative Court to entertain the dispute. The fact that the University has public functions and that its powers derive from statute will, in the circumstances, be neither here nor there. It is true that many employment cases turn on issues of dismissal whilst here the issue is promotion. But this is still, in my judgment essentially an employment or contractual dispute. The fact that Dr Evans is employed by Cambridge University rather than any other employer such as a school or a business does not make this a public law dispute. There is a useful analogy in the case of R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] E.W.C.A Civ 366 where the background elements of regulations and funding did not make the foundation a public authority for the purposes of the Human Rights 1998.

24. I cannot leave this case without expressing admiration for the research and erudition of Dr Evans in the preparation of her argument both written and oral. Furthermore, she has presented her argument with skill and moderation. In the end, however, I have come to the conclusion as did Turner J. 1998 that her case is in truth a private law dispute and not amenable to the jurisdiction of the Administrative Court. The University has given an undertaking that it will not argue in any breach of contract claim that its promotion procedures are not contractual, but I do not wish to say anything to encourage Dr Evans to prolong her dispute with the University by taking yet further proceedings. That, however, is entirely a matter for her. In the result, this claim for judicial review fails and it is unnecessary for me to go into any of the other matters raised at the application for permission.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: For the reasons given in the judgment that has been handed down the judicial review fails.

MR CLARKE: My Lord, as my Lord can see Dr Evans is not here this morning, and it does not appear that she intends to be present; she sent an email to somebody at the university about an hour ago from which, unless she sent it from a lap−top, it appears that she is in Cambridge this morning. So she is not going to come.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: Yes.

MR CLARKE: My Lord, I invite the court to order that Dr Evans pay the costs of both applications, which have been dismissed now on a substantive basis. I do not invite my Lord to assess those costs, not least because Dr Evans is not here to make any submissions about that, but I would invite the court to accept the principle, ordinary principle, that this has now been a substantive judicial review upon which Dr Evans has failed at the public law threshold.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: Yes.

MR CLARK: My Lord, even if you had only been dealing with it on permission, and if my Lord had refused permission, I would say it is one of those cases where an oral hearing with both parties represented, it was appropriate for the respondent to have its costs. But we have gone beyond that stage now and we are now, I would submit, in the ordinary position where the unsuccessful party should pay the costs.

Now, in fact, it may well be that the party would be able to come to some agreement about the amount of costs hereafter and it will not need to go to a full assessment, but in the absence of Dr Evans here to make any observations about that, I simply invite my Lord to make the order in principle, and the assessment can follow on for a detailed assessment in the usual way?

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: Yes. I am just wondering whether it might be desirable to say that the order should not be drawn up for seven days in order to give her an opportunity to make any further representations that she wants to on costs?

MR CLARKE: I do not anticipate that there would be a problem, my Lord. My only observation, I suppose, would be that she has known of the judgment since it was issued in draft the day before yesterday. She has known what the result was going to be this morning.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: She has, I think, written something saying that she did not want to pay the costs.

MR CLARKE: We have not seen anything ourselves from Dr Evans.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: Well there is a request for leave to appeal. What she says is this, this has been faxed through: "The Court of Appeal found against the university in the applicant's application for leave to appeal over costs in October 1999. The judgment was critical of the university's extravagance in running up costs beyond what was reasonable and proportionate. The judge will have noticed that two senior solicitors from Clifford Chance were present throughout the day's hearing on 9th May. If the respondent appears to seek costs at the handing down of the judgment, the applicant asks for a hearing to be set and for reasonable time to obtain the advice of a costs draughtsman so that she may be in a position to put forward properly–founded arguments about the size of the university's bill."

MR CLARKE: My Lord, what appears to me from that is that Dr Evans does not invite the court not to make any order for costs, but she might simply take issue as to the quantum. In those circumstances, my Lord, I would suggest that the appropriate order is an order for costs to be assessed, and that should not be made subject to any further period of challenge. But that, of course, Dr Evans would have every opportunity on the assessment to make all appropriate points.

The Court of Appeal matter she was referring to, my Lord, was simply a county court case where a costs order was made favourably to the university, and all that happened there was that Dr Evans obtained leave to appeal in respect of the costs order. The matter did not go any further because it was resolved by agreement between the parties.

But, my Lord, in the circumstances Dr Evans has effectively signalled to the court her intention to argue on quantum.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: That seems pretty clear and she is not, I think, taking issue, according to this document, with the principle.

MR CLARKE: Yes, and I would suggest that, my Lord, rather than saying that this order should be left open or not drawn for any period of time, my Lord should make the order. The order then goes–– obviously the costs then go for assessment. If the parties cannot agree the matter then the costs judge will have to deal with it and, of course, Dr Evans can take such advice on costs as it is appropriate and make such submissions as she wishes.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: Yes, very well, I shall make an order for costs and direct that there is to be a detailed assessment.

MR CLARKE:: My Lord, I am grateful.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: Now, as far as her request for permission to appeal, what she says is this: "In view of the immense importance to academic staff at universities of this question of access to public law remedies and its considerable significance as a public interest issue, the applicant seeks permission to appeal. The applicant takes the opportunity to mention that at the time of sending this, on the morning of 5th July, she has received no notice from the respondent that it intends to be present in court for the handing down of the judgment to seek costs. She has had no schedule of the respondent's costs in this matter at any time. She repeats her request to be allowed a hearing if the respondent seeks an award of costs."

MR CLARKE: Well it seems we are going back on to that ground, my Lord, but I would suggest that really does not alter the position as to costs, that is a leave to appeal matter. I would simply say that what my Lord has done is really decided this case as applying well–established principles as to the public/private law divide insofar as it concerns employment disputes, and my Lord has averted to a number of leading cases on that. Although it might be thought to be of importance to Dr Evans, it is not really a case of pressing public interest or general public interest, in my submission. Nor is it a case which establishes any new legal frontier. My Lord has, as I indicated, applied the well–established to principles to the facts of this case and it is not a matter upon which leave to appeal should be granted, certainly not by this court. If Dr Evans wishes to take it further, then perhaps she will try the Court of Appeal.

MR JUSTICE SCOTT BAKER: I am going to refuse permission to appeal. It seems to me that there has already been far too much litigation in relation to this matter and I am not prepared to do anything to encourage it.

As far as the costs are concerned, again, it appears from these two documents that the issue is as to quantum. In the circumstances the order will be made as I indicated.

MR CLARKE: I am most grateful, my Lord.

Lord Justice Potter:

1. This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour Judge Dean QC sitting as a judge of the High Court by which he rejected the application of the first defendant to set aside a judgment obtained against him in default of acknowledgment of service. The action had been brought against the first defendant and the second defendant, as partners trading in industrial alcohol under the name of "Quickstop Group" and, as such, liable to pay for two shipments of alcohol the subject of the claim. Judgment had also been signed against the second defendant who applied with the first defendant to set it aside. The second defendant was successful. Each defendant faced the burden placed upon him by CPR Part 13.3(1)(a), namely to demonstrate that he had "a real prospect of successfully defending the claim". The judge held that the second defendant had a real prospect of success on the basis of his assertion that he was not a partner in, but merely employed by, the Quickstop Group. However, so far as the first defendant was concerned, the judge dealt with the matter upon the merits as they appeared from the evidence before him and held that, in the light of a series of unqualified admissions of the claimants' debt over a prolonged period prior to judgment, there was no real prospect of a successful defence.

2. Before the judge, as on this appeal, there was debate over the precise meaning or emphasis of the test to be applied to the defendant's prospects of success under CPR 13.3.(1)(a); in particular (1) whether it is the same as under CPR Part 24 which uses similar terminology in respect of the criterion for summary judgment against a defendant, namely that he has "no real prospect of successfully defending the claim or issue" (see CPR 24.2(a)(ii)) or (2) whether (if different) the court should adopt the approach set out in Alpine Bulk Transport Co Inc v Saudi Eagle Shipping Co Inc [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep 221, a decision under the equivalent rule of the former Rules of the Supreme Court, as adopted and applied with reference to CPR 13.3.(1) by Moore–Bick J in International Finance Corporation Utexafrica S.p.r.l. (2001) CLC 1361.

3. In the Saudi Eagle , when comparing the test to be met by a defendant under R.S.C. Order 14 ("an arguable case"), with the standard laid down in Evans v Bartram (H.L.) [1937] AC 473 in respect of a defendant seeking to set aside a regular judgment signed in default, the Court of Appeal (per Sir Roger Ormrod) said:

> "× Evans v Bartram × clearly contemplated that a defendant who is asking the court to exercise its discretion in his favour should show that he has a defence which has a real prospect of success. ×
> Indeed it would be surprising if the standard required for obtaining leave to defend (which has only to displace the plaintiff's assertion that there is no defence) were the same as that required to displace a regular judgment of the court and with it the rights acquired by the plaintiff. In our opinion, therefore, to arrive at a reasoned assessment of the justice of the case the court must form a provisional view of the probable outcome if the judgment were to be set aside and the defence developed. The "arguable" defence must carry some degree of conviction."

4. Later, having considered the facts of the case, the court concluded:

"In the circumstances we do not think that the defendants have shown that they have a defence which has any reasonable prospect of success."

5. In the Utexafrica case, Moore–Bick J applied the Saudi Eagle approach to CPR 13.3.(1) in the following passage of his judgment at p.1363:

> "The application is made under 13.3.1 of Civil Procedure Rules which gives the court the power to set aside the default judgment if the defendant has a real prospect of successfully defending the claim. Mr Howard drew my attention to the commentary in paragraph 13.3.1 of Civil Procedure and the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Saudi Eagle in which the court held that in order to set aside a default judgment under Order 13 of the Rules of the Supreme Court the defendant had to show that he had a realistic prospect of defeating the claim. It was said in that case that merely arguing a defence was not sufficient. It had to be a defence which had a real prospect of success which carried some degree of conviction. Mr Popplewell, on the other hand, submitted that unless the defence was one which could be said to have no realistic prospect of success, it must follow that the tests in 13.3.1(a) are satisfied. However logical the proposition may be on its face, it is not one I am able to accept. The fact is that in ordinary language to say that a case has no realistic prospect of success is generally much the same as saying it is hopeless, whereas to say that the case has a realistic prospect of success suggests something better than that it is merely arguable. That is clearly the sense in which the expression was used in the Saudi Eagle and, in my view, it is also the sense in which it is used in Rule 13.3.1(a). There are good reasons for that. A person who holds a regular judgment, even a default judgment, has something of value, and in order to avoid injustice he should not be deprived of it without good reason. Something more than a merely arguable case is needed to tip the balance of justice to set the judgment aside. In my view, therefore, Mr Howard is right in saying the expression "realistic prospect of success" in this context means a case which carries a real conviction."

6. It is perhaps worth mentioning in relation to that passage, that the phrase used by the court in the Saudi Eagle was "any reasonable prospect of success" and that, in making its observation that the defence advanced "must carry some degree of conviction" it was seeking to convey the nuance to be attached to "a real prospect of success" as propounded in Evans v Bartram [1937] AC 473. It nowhere made use of the word "realistic" as the passage in Moore–Bick J's judgment might suggest. However, in this context, I regard use of the words "real" and "realistic" as interchangeable so far as nuance of meaning is concerned.

7. What is clear is that, in drafting the Civil Procedure Rules the draftsman adopted the phrase "real prospect of successfully defending the claim" for the purposes of both CPR 13.3.(1) and 24.2 and, subject to the question of burden of proof, may be taken to have contemplated a similar test under each rule. It was stated by Lord Woolf MR in Swain v Hillman [2001] 1 All ER 91 at 92j that:

> "The words "no real prospect of succeeding" do not need any amplification, they speak for themselves. The word "real" distinguishes fanciful prospects of success × they direct the court to the need to see whether there is a "realistic" as opposed to a "fanciful" prospect of success."

8. I regard the distinction between a realistic and fanciful prospect of success as appropriately reflecting the observation in the Saudi Eagle that the defence sought to be argued must carry some degree of conviction. Both approaches require the defendant to have a case which is better than merely arguable, as was formerly the case under R.S.C. Order 14. Furthermore, both CPR 13.3(1) and 24.2 have provisions whereby, for the purposes of doing justice between the parties, the court can order that judgment be set aside under 13.3.1(b) if it appears to the court that there is some other good reason to do so, and, under 24.2(b) that summary judgment be withheld on the ground that there is some compelling reason why the case or issue should be disposed of at trial.

9. In my view, the only significant difference between the provisions of CPR 24.2 and 13.3(1), is that under the former the overall burden of proof rests upon the claimant to establish that there are grounds for his belief that the respondent has no real prospect of success whereas, under the latter, the burden rests upon the defendant to satisfy the court that there is good reason why a judgment regularly obtained should be set aside. That being so, although generally the burden of proof is in practice of only marginal importance in relation to the assessment of evidence, it seems almost inevitable that, in particular cases, a defendant applying under CPR 13.3(1) may encounter a court less receptive to applying the test in his favour than if he were a defendant advancing a timely ground of resistance to summary judgment under CPR 24.2.

10. It is certainly the case that under both rules, where there are significant differences between the parties so far as factual issues are concerned, the court is in no position to conduct a mini−trial: see per Lord Woolf MR in Swain v Hillman [2001] 1 All ER 91 at 95 in relation to CPR 24. However, that does not mean that the court has to accept without analysis everything said by a party in his statements before the court. In some cases it may be clear that there is no real substance in factual assertions made, particularly if contradicted by contemporary documents. If so, issues which are dependent upon those factual assertions may be susceptible of disposal at an early stage so as to save the cost and delay of trying an issue the outcome of which is inevitable: see the note at 24.2.3 in Civil Procedure (Autumn 2002) Vol 1 p.467 and Three Rivers DC v Bank of England (No.3) [2001] UKHL/16, [2001] 2 All ER 513 per Lord Hope of Craighead at paragraph [95].

11. I would only add that, where there is a claim or judgment for monies due and issues of fact are raised by a defendant for the first time which, standing alone would demonstrate a triable issue, if it is apparent that, with full knowledge of the facts raised, the defendant has previously admitted the debt and/or made payments on account of it, a judge will be justified in taking such acknowledgements into account as an indication of the likely substance of the issues raised and the ultimate success of the defence belatedly advanced.

12. In the instant case, the judge held that, if there was a difference to be detected in the approach set out in the Saudi Eagle and that defined in Swain v Hillman it was unnecessary to resolve it because, upon either approach, the first defendant had no real prospect of success in the light of admissions made prior to judgment.

13. The state of the evidence and the nature of the issues before the judge were as follows.

14. The claim was for a principal sum of US $283,860.00, the balance of the price of two deliveries, one of ethyl alcohol and the other of grain alcohol, made to the defendants by the claimants in the course of March to May 1997. The first delivery was alleged to have been made pursuant to an oral contract made on the telephone between the first defendant and Mr Macaire of the claimants on 9 February 1997 and the second between the first defendant and Mr Duriez on behalf of the claimants on 6 March 1997 as evidenced by subsequent invoices. The price under the ethyl alcohol contract (no.1696.01) was US$681,408 payable on delivery DDU Chimkent, Kazakhstan. The price for the grain alcohol was US$61,360 payable on delivery DDU Alma Ata, Kazakhstan. Each delivery was the subject of a detailed invoice dated 4 March 1997 and 10 March 1997 respectively. Each stated: "Price: US$130.00 per Hectolitre at volume" and "Payment: Cash on Delivery" and provided that the funds would be remitted by telegraphic transfer to the claimant's New York bank under advice to the claimants in London. They were thus on their face outright sales with payment due from the defendant following delivery.

15. It was common ground between the parties that, following their first commercial contacts in 1994, they had entered into an agreement dated 26 October1995 but signed by the first defendant on 15 November 1995 entitled "J V Agreement between Quickstop Group and ED&F Man Alcohol for the sale of ethyl alcohol, 96% in Uzbekistan". That agreement provided that the parties would have a 50% participation in the joint venture and all profits would be shared equally after deduction of all costs relating to the operations of the joint venture. The contracts of sale and spot sales into the Uzbekistan market were to be procured by Quickstop with payment made locally to Quickstop in US$. The title of the product shipped to Tashkent would remain with the claimants until passed to a buyer under the relevant terms and conditions of sale. The claimants would deliver the alcohol to Quickstop's bonded warehouse under All Risks cover to be provided by the claimants till such delivery, with Quickstop providing All Risks insurance cover thereafter until delivery to the local buyer. Quickstop would keep a running account of transactions, supplying the claimants with regular trading statements by way of account. Under the heading ‘Share of the Profit and Loss' it was provided that:

> "Both parties shall declare all related costs of the Joint Venture. Upon sale of the Product and receipt of payment by [the first defendant], a profit shall be calculated. [The first defendant] shall pay [the claimants] for all of [the claimants'] expenses plus 50% of the profit.
> Payment to be made by telegraphic transfer to bank account of Man"

16. The evidence before the judge may be summarised in this way. The application was originally made supported by the first witness statement of Mr Preston the defendants' solicitor on the basis of the defendants' instructions. He spoke to, and exhibited documents in relation to, a total of six shipments of alcohol which he stated were all made under the terms of the joint venture agreement. These showed commercial invoices for various shipments by the claimants to the defendants which were on the face of them similarly outright sales at a price in US$ per litre at volume but with provision for "Payment: Prompt". Mr Preston stated that Quickstop usually managed to increase the prices of those sales to about US$1.60 per litre, sometimes obtaining less and sometimes more from the on–sales. On that basis it was agreed between the parties that US$1.60 should be treated as the average on–sale price and by agreement the claimants consistently invoiced Quickstop thereafter for US$1.30 per litre, representing their costs and share of the profits. It was said that, because the market in Central Asia was volatile and Quickstop's on–sales were often in the form of barter for other commodities which Quickstop would then sell to realise cash, the payments made to the claimants to reimburse them for their costs and share of the profits, were often greatly delayed.

17. Mr Preston stated that the invoices the subject of the claim were the seventh and eighth shipments under the joint venture arrangements. It was stated that Quickstop subsequently sold most of the alcohol shipped, transferring a total of US$458,908 to the claimants on receipt of the proceeds of their on–sales. However it was said the market deteriorated badly and several buyers cancelled leaving several hundred thousand litres unsold in Quickstop's warehouses. A series of problems concerning customs laws and licences in Uzbekistan followed, including certain confiscations with the result that no payments had ever been received in respect of various of the on–sales negotiated and a substantial quantity of the alcohol was in warehouses in Uzbekistan where it remained the legal property of the claimants or had been destroyed by persons unknown to the Quickstop group.

18. It was asserted that in those circumstances, under the provisions of the joint venture agreement, the terms of which were never altered, title to the alcohol in the warehouses had never passed to Quickstop, the obligation to pay the claimants never arose and thus nothing was due to the claimants under the invoices. It was stated that the invoices sent to Quickstop were not documents with contractual force or effect. They merely evidenced the joint venture relationship under the agreement being "mainly issued for the benefit of customs authorities, who required contracts to be registered with them before allowing the goods to pass". Mr Preston referred to a fax dated 27 March 2002 from the claimants' solicitors in which, in response to the request to vacate the judgment, they refused to do so in reliance inter alia upon the fact that the defendants had repeatedly admitted that the outstanding purchase price was due without any suggestion of reliance on the joint venture agreement. In this respect Mr Preston stated that the first defendant recalled being contacted by a representative of the claimant whom he believed to be Mr Orbart and that, in the course of a conversation, the latter had explained that, for accounts purposes, the claimants required a schedule of payments in order to prove the debt. He went on:

> "Mr Mahesh Patel explained that the goods had not been sold so no money was due to the Claimants. The representative acknowledged this point but advised that he needed something from Quickstop Group to acknowledge that money may be forthcoming in the future. It was certainly not Mahesh Patel's intention that monies were in fact due at the time."

19. In response to Mr Preston's witness statement, the claimant's solicitor Mr Smith provided a statement, similarly stated to be made on the basis of instructions and the documents provided to him. He stated as follows so far as the joint venture agreement was concerned:

> "From the very first supply the Agreement was never properly implemented. The Claimants were never given any information regarding Quickstop's sales or profits. Instead, a price was agreed to replace the Claimants' share of the joint venture profits. Then after a few shipments Quickstop began to ask the Claimants to quote a fixed price. The price which the Claimants thereafter charged Quickstop [i.e. the $1.30 appearing on the invoices] was not their cost of acquiring the alcohol plus delivering it but was an entirely separate figure including the Claimants' profit margin. As part of this further agreement it was agreed that no payment by Quickstop was conditional upon their receipt of funds from their purchasers."

20. In connection with the defendants' assertion that the terms of the joint venture continued to apply and, in particular, govern the terms of the relevant shipments, Mr Smith pointed out, at length and in detail various reasons why it was plain on Mr Preston's account, that the joint venture agreement did not continue to govern the relations of the parties. There was no provision in it for payment by Quickstop to the claimants on delivery of the goods supplied, simply a provision for accounting by Quickstop and calculation of the profit against a declaration of expenses by both parties with payment to the claimants of the claimants' expenses plus 50% of the profit. None of these procedures had been followed. Instead, as both sides accepted, there had been an agreement for prompt payment by the defendant of a sum of US$1.30 per litre to include any profit to the claimants. This was against a background where Quickstop did not, as provided for in the joint venture agreement, receive payment locally in US$ but entered into a variety of on–sale transactions including barter in respect of which no accounts were ever produced to the claimants and the profit was left with Quickstop who merely paid the invoice price of the relevant deliveries to the claimant. However, the principal matter relied on by Mr Smith was a series of unqualified after–the–event admissions made by the defendants as to the balance due under the relevant contracts. Because, despite the factual issues before him, the judge relied upon this series of admissions as his ground for refusal of the defendants' application, I propose to set them out at length.

21. On 8 January 1998, a year after the relevant deliveries, the claimants wrote to the first defendant asking him to advise when he would be "sending cash against the outstanding amounts". When no reply was received, a chasing fax was sent on 26 January and again on 11 February 1998 asking "when we may expect settlement of the outstanding sums due". The letter reminded the first defendant of an earlier promise made to Mr Wyper of the claimants in Tashkent that there would be full settlement by the end of December 1997. On 12 March 1998, Mr Orbart, the claimants' financial controller, wrote referring to a conversation between the first defendant and Mr Tuite proposing a repayment schedule in relation to the outstanding debt of US$508,804. It called for payment of $150,000 on 20 March 1998, $200,000 on 20 April 1998 and $158,804 on 20 May 1998. By letter of 17 March the second defendant responded as 'Financial Controller' of Quickstop, stating that Quickstop proposed to pay its outstanding debt in the stages requested save that the dates for payment would be the 30th rather than the 20th of the month. On 23 March 1998 Mr Tuite faxed that the schedule was acceptable and emphasised the importance of ensuring that the first and subsequent tranches were executed without problems.

22. On 30 March 1998 a letter was written by the claimants to the defendants stating:

"Our auditors require confirmation of the net balance with you as at 31st March 1998. Please could you state the balance as at 31st March 1998 in the space below and return it directly to the auditors, Price Waterhouse."

The balance was specified at that date as US$458,804. The defendants duly acknowledged receipt and sent such clarification.

23. On 16 April 1998 the claimants again wrote to the defendants:

> "With regard to the above noted debt, we are still awaiting debt of US$100,000 as per repayment schedule agreed in your letter of 17 March 1998. We have yet to receive the response to our letter of 6 March. We therefore request that you regularise your account by 22 April 1998 and ensure that the agreed repayment schedule is adhered to."

The letter added that if the schedule was not adhered to in the future the debt would be passed to the legal department for recovery.

24. On 8 May 1998 the defendants replied:

> "Further to our telephone conversation today about the outstanding payment, we have been informed by our office in Tashkent that due to a small problem at the central bank they are unable to transfer any funds. They hope to resolve this problem in a few days. As soon as these funds are transferred to our UK bank, we will be able to transfer US$100,000 to your account."

25. Although US$100,000 was then paid, the payment schedule was not adhered to and a further chasing letter on 6 October 1998 having been ignored, the claimants wrote a formal letter on 8 January 1999 referring to a telephone call concerning the outstanding debt and pointing out that the defendants had committed themselves to a repayment schedule that had been submitted to the claimants' auditors. It stated that, in conversations before Christmas, the defendants had undertaken to remit a tranche of cash and discuss a new payment schedule but nothing had been received. The letter insisted on proposals for repayment backed by a guarantee from a financial institution such as a bank by 15 January 1999 and in the absence of such a proposal the matter would be passed to lawyers.

26. On 15 January 1999 the defendants replied by letter headed "Re Outstanding Debt". They proposed a repayment schedule, namely US$50,000 to be paid by the end of business on 22 January with subsequent payments of similar amount until the debt had been paid in full. Thereafter two payments each of US$25,000 (and not $50,000 as proposed) were made on 2 and 14 February 1999 and a third such payment on 14 May 1999.

27. On 8 June 1999 the claimants wrote referring to an indication from the first defendant in a recent meeting with Mr Tuite that the outstanding debt of US$283,860 'would be settled in three to four months' and an undertaking to transfer $28,000 by mid–June. The claimants' letter proposed a schedule for repayment of the balance over a four month period. No reply, nor any payment was received.

28. After further sporadic correspondence, the claimants' letter dated 7 February 2001 addressed to both defendants, stated the writer's understanding that the first defendant had agreed at a meeting with a representative of Man Sugar to whom the first defendant had proposed some sugar business in the near future,

> " × to make a payment by Friday 16 February of US$50,000 on account of the balance owed to Man Alcohols of US$283,860."

The letter asked for confirmation by return fax and an arrangement to make payment by bank transfer to the claimants' New York bank. It proposed a discussion the following week to arrange "to settle the remaining indebtedness". No payment was received and the meeting did not take place.

29. In response to the statement of Mr Smith, the first defendant himself supplied a witness statement on 8 June 2002 largely confirming the earlier contents of Mr Preston's affidavit. In particular he said at paragraph 5 that, while he had never taken legal advice on the meaning of the joint venture agreement until 2002, his understanding was that a joint venture meant that he and the claimants were sharing in the risks and the profits of the business and that "We only got paid once we had received the proceeds of sale, and I understood that we would only have to pay the Claimants after that".

30. He explained the arrangements which had in fact been followed:

> "I agreed to basically offer them an upfront split on the profit. It was simply more convenient for us to use this average price of US$1.30 for the joint venture and it meant that I didn't have to trace the alcohol sales through a variety of other transactions to try and calculate the complete profit after the event. This way the Claimants passed a lot of their market risks to me and I would bear the loss if I could only sell the alcohol for say US$1.50 per litre."

31. He said that, if he had been buying the alcohol, he would simply have accepted a lower "straight sale price" for the alcohol and taken the extra profit himself. He said that, since the claimant seemed happy to perform the administrative tasks of the joint venture by keeping the running accounts and trading statements, he was happy for them to do so. He said that, so far as he was concerned, the agreement set out the general terms on which the claimants were prepared to do business with Quickstop but it was not a manual on how the business would be run and he believed there was flexibility in how things were to be run, the agreement simply setting out the principles. In response to Mr Smith's detailed comments on (i) the inadequacy of any documents produced to show that any of the confiscation measures of the Uzbekistan authorities or the alcohol involved related to the shipments of alcohol in question, (ii) the absence of any evidence that Quickstop had not in fact received payment for those shipments and (iii) the fact that, in the midst of its alleged problems in 1998 and 1999, Quickstop continued to make a number of (albeit insufficient) payments to the claimants, the first defendant stated:

> "I am currently reviewing all my files and documents from this period to try and establish exactly what happened to the quantities of alcohol that were confiscated/destroyed in 1997/98. So far I have only had about two months to collect this information and it will take > some time. These events happened some 4 years ago and many of my employees in Tashkent have left since then. I had assumed that the Claimants would accept their responsibility under the Agreement, but that is obviously not the case now."

32. Finally, the first defendant sought to deal with the admissions made in the letters to which I have referred in the following way. He said that, in early 1998, as the claimants' financial year end approached, he had received a telephone call from Mr Tuite explaining that the claimants needed something on paper from the defendants. The first defendant understood that the claimants were having problems with their auditors and, in order to oblige, he instructed the second defendant to send the claimants a payment schedule which was the fax of 17 March 1998. He said it was never his intention to make any admission of liability to the claimants and that he "just wanted to stop them hassling us". However, he failed to advert to, or explain why, in response to the claimants' later threats to place the matter in the hands of their lawyers, he made the unqualified proposals for payment contained in Quickstop's letters dated 8 May 1998 and 15 January 1999 or failed to reply to any of the later letters recording admissions made by him.

33. The second defendant also made a witness statement in which he stated that he was employed by Quickstop as Financial Controller and was not a partner of the first defendant who controlled the day to day business of Quickstop, including that with the claimants. He (the second defendant) was not aware of how the day to day business was run and had no operational involvement with Quickstop's operations in Central Asia. He was not aware of the terms of the joint venture agreement. However, he spoke to the letter of 17 March 1998 which he had written on the instructions of the first defendant who told him that he had been telephoned earlier by the claimants and told that they were approaching the end of their financial year and needed something to help satisfy the auditors. He said that when he wrote the letter it was not his intention to acknowledge a legally enforceable debt. He later received the letter of 30 March 1998 which asked for him to write to the auditors. He said:

> "We were happy to co–operate with the Claimants because we still had on–going contracts for the supply of sugar in early 1998 and we did not want to jeopardise that business."

34. In relation to the payments made following the letter of 8 January 1999 threatening legal proceedings, he said:

> "I believe that Jitendra Patel simply wanted to make a goodwill gesture to the Claimants and finish the matter."

35. The judge gave an oral judgment immediately following argument. Bearing in mind the detail of the argument he had received on the many documents before him which were presented with the relevant witness statements in a piecemeal rather than a comprehensive manner, I consider that, contrary to the submissions of Mr Thomas for the first defendant, the judgment shows a clear grasp of the effect of those documents. The judge rightly summed up the position of the claimants as being that the joint venture agreement was never properly implemented and that it had subsequently ceased to be implemented altogether, being superseded by a number of sales without reference to an account to be taken in accordance with the joint venture agreement. He also observed that that appeared to be the effect of the defendants' own evidence.

36. The judge was critical of the state of the claimant's evidence, on the grounds that Mr Smith's statement that a price was agreed to replace the joint venture profits and that it had been agreed that payment by the defendants was no longer conditional upon their finding purchasers was lacking in particularity, there being no indication of when or with whom the agreement was made or whether it was oral or in writing. He said that if the case had turned simply on the validity of that statement he could well see that there should be liberty to set aside the judgment. However, the judge also observed that the effect of the first defendant's evidence was to indicate that the fundamental accounting procedures contemplated by the joint venture agreement had been abandoned and superseded by a straight identified sale price which appeared to have no relevance to the success or otherwise of the ability of Quickstop to sell the goods. He said that, in those circumstances, he could not accept the submission for the defendants that it had to be assumed that the term of the agreement which stated that no payments were to be made until receipts had been obtained by the defendants from the local sales must still remain in force. As the judge said:

> "It is one thing to say that the parties are going to share profits and losses upon the basis of credit and on–sales; it is quite a different thing to say that there is going to be a straight sale at a price and, in effect, the seller will simply have to await payment upon the disposal in an uncertain market. It seems to me that once you have abandoned the profit sharing and the accounting provisions which go with it, the basis of the agreement has gone."

37. The judge referred to certain other correspondence (see further below) which showed that very shortly before the invoice changed to US$1.30 per litre, the claimants were using language in letters dated 11 and 16 January which appeared to affirm the continued existence of the joint venture agreement. Also to a letter dated 9 April 1997, some time after the shipments in issue when the claimants wrote to a company in Tajikistan, which was not a designated territory in the joint venture agreement, referring them to "our partner the Quickstop Group" as the medium for any discussion about a business enquiry. However, he weighed against those statements what he described as the mass of later material "which indicates that not only did the defendants admit that they were liable for the actual sums claimed in the particulars of claim, but furthermore they paid off part of the sum due, admitted that they were liable for the balance and stated that they would seek to pay this off by instalments".

38. The judge regarded the reference by the defendants to the request received to acknowledge their outstanding debt for the purposes of the claimants' auditors as wholly inadequate to explain their responses and admissions in relation to correspondence pressing for payment quite independently of the auditors' request. In particular the judge referred to the response of 8 May 1998 and 15 January 1999 in which, in response to letters threatening legal action the debt was acknowledged and funds promised (see paragraphs 24–26 above). He observed that further monies were actually paid following the acknowledgment of 15 January 1999 and stated:

> "Throughout the whole of that correspondence in 1998 and 1999, going through to December 2000, there is not the least suggestion that (a) the money was not due, (b) it was subject to the Joint Venture, (c) there was any suggestion of a denial of liability ×
> × in my judgment this defence is fanciful, almost certainly dishonest and has no chance of success whatsoever.

> I do not believe that any businessman who had written those letters, made those admissions and made those payments would genuinely believe that the debt was not due.
> It was said that the defendants wished to keep a good relationship with Man and therefore made admissions of liability and part payment pursuant to those admissions of liability, simply in the course of good relations. I regard that suggestion as risible. Mr Patel is a man in his 40s, he has been in business for some 20 years and I cannot believe that any businessman would have made those admissions and those payments if he did not genuinely accept liability. No suggestion of any defence was made until this application in witness statements to support an application and to set aside the judgment in default.
> So far as the first defendant is concerned, in the exercise of my discretion, I think it would be a gross injustice to the claimants to set aside this judgment and I refuse to do so."

39. Having been refused permission to appeal on paper, the first defendant made a successful oral application to Rix LJ for permission to appeal. Permission was granted on the basis of concern expressed by Rix LJ over three particular aspects of the evidence before the judge, the second and third of which might have involved misunderstandings on the part of the judge or, at any rate, were points which he failed properly to address when giving his judgment.

40. The points were as follows:

    i) The fact that the claimants' case that there had been a change from what was accepted originally to have been a joint venture arrangement to a position where, by agreement, the parties dealt on a straight sale basis was stated in general terms, and in an unparticularised form, unsupported by first–hand evidence from an employee of the claimants, in which respect the claimants had been criticised by the judge. This was said by Mr Thomas for the first defendant to be of particular significance because

    ii) in relation to the first invoice between the parties which showed the price of US$1.30 per litre, i.e. the invoice dated 20 February 1996, it appeared that there was earlier correspondence demonstrating that the price agreed was agreed in the context of a live joint venture arrangement;

    iii) the judge appeared to have made an error when dealing with the defence case in relation to the acknowledgment of indebtedness contained in the letter of 17 March 1998.

41. Rix LJ also expressed concern:

iv) that the judge may have assumed that because the invoices passing between the parties named a specific price, that in itself indicated that they had reached a straight sale arrangement at the same time abandoning the scheme for profit sharing under the joint venture agreement; and

v) that despite the grave difficulties in the way of the defendants' case, the judge may have erred in treating the application as a mini–trial in the course of which he had been prepared to find dishonesty, without the defendants having had the opportunity of presenting their evidence at trial.

42. On this appeal, Mr Thomas has adopted and addressed us at length upon those concerns.

43. On careful examination of the position I do not consider that, in giving judgment, the judge was subject to any significant error or misunderstanding concerning the matters raised. In relation to concern (i), the judge made clear that on the basis of the assertions of the claimants as to the contractual arrangements alone, he would not have found as he did. His judgment was based not upon the positive evidence of the claimants as to an express agreement that the joint venture arrangements would cease to operate, but upon (a) the incompatibility of everything which appeared to have happened between the parties from an early stage with continuation of the arrangements under that agreement, when combined with (b) the unequivocal and continued acknowledgement of the debt and proposals for payment from 1998 onwards when, over a period of two years, the first defendant was pressed to settle the debt.

44. The judge plainly found, as in my view he was entitled to find, that it simply was not credible that such acknowledgements would have been made (two in the face of threatened legal proceedings) without any suggestion that payment was not due under whatever contractual arrangements existed between the parties. According to the first defendant he had always understood that under the joint venture agreement he had no obligation to make payment until he had himself received payment. He therefore had no need for legal advice to take that point or to reserve his position in correspondence. The only inference which could practically arise from the terms of the correspondence was either that he accepted that payment was due under altered arrangements, or that his assertions that he had never been paid for the particular alcohol concerned were insincere.

45. In relation to concern (ii), the judge did not overlook, nor is there any reason to suppose he misunderstood, the force of the point that in relation to the first invoice in which the US$1.30 price appeared the letters of 11 and 16 January 1996 were indicative that the price was reached on the basis that the joint venture arrangement, but two months old, was in force. The letter of 11 January stated:

> "As per our telecon of yesterday please be advised that we have arranged for a further 10 containers to be shipped to Tashkent for the JV, to depart Hamburg with Bruhn Transport next Friday 19 Jan 96.

46. It also made clear that at that time the "pro forma invoice" would be priced at US$0.99 per litre. The letter of 16 January 1996 referred to another 15 containers being available and stated:

"Our costs on these I'm afraid has gone up to $1.08 per litre so please see if you can get a better price."

47. It is by no means clear that these containers were the same as those the subject of the invoice of 20 February 1996. However, even if they were, that transaction was over a year before the shipments in issue. The broad question was whether, the price of US $1.30 per litre, which it was the first defendant's own case was a price agreed on the basis of a fixed amount to include the claimants' loss of profit was, in February 1996 or subsequently, agreed to be treated as a sale price payable to the claimants in accordance with the terms of the invoice or whether the arrangements for payment and profit sharing under the joint venture agreement continued to regulate the parties' relationship. It is not correct, as submitted by Mr Thomas in his skeleton argument that, despite having his attention drawn to the significance of the letters of 11 and 16 January 1996 the judge completely failed to address them in his judgment. Having referred to the invoice of 20 February 1996, which Mr Bryan for the claimants had identified as the latest date at which the joint venture arrangements must have existed, the judge said that Mr Thomas had asserted for the defendants that prior thereto the claimants were using language which appeared to affirm the continued existence of the agreement and that in this respect he relied upon "a number of documents". He then referred in terms to the letter of 11 January as supporting this argument. It is true that he did not go on specifically to mention the letter of 16 January but in the light of his reference to "documents" there is no reason to think that he did not have it in mind. He picked in particular upon the letter of 11 January because it referred in terms to "the JV". The judge then went on to refer to a letter following that invoice written by representatives of the claimants to possible third party customers in the local area which stated that

"Our business in central Asia is handled in Tashkent by our partner the Quickstop Group."

48. Thus, the judge acknowledged a "grey area" existing around this time. However, he came to the conclusion that he did, namely that by the time of the invoices sued upon, the joint venture arrangement had been abandoned, for two interrelated reasons. He regarded the evidence of Mr Patel that he decided to offer the claimants "an upfront split on the profit based on an average price of US$1.30" with any profit over that figure being retained by the first defendant, together with his later admissions of debt at a time when, on his own evidence, he was meeting difficulties with his on–sales, as demonstrating that:

" × at some point the fundamental accounting procedures contemplated by the Joint Venture Agreement had been abandoned and superseded by a straight identified sale price which had no relevance to the success or otherwise of the ability of the defendants to sell the goods."

49. The judge went on to make the observation I have already quoted at paragraph 36 above. In my view it was a realistic observation rather than one based on any misunderstanding.

50. Concern (iii) is based on Mr Thomas' assertion that the judge misunderstood or misconstrued the evidence of the defendants when he described as "misguided if not misleading" their explanation that the acknowledgement of debt was made simply to accommodate the claimants by demonstrating to their auditors that the claimants had a number of unchallenged trade debts. The judge appeared to base his comment upon the fact that the letter written by the claimants requiring such confirmation was written on 30 March 1998 i.e. it post–dated the letter of 17 March 1998 in which Mr Patel had made his acknowledgement and proposed a schedule of repayment. Mr Thomas rightly points out however that it was the assertion of the defendants that the claimants had telephoned the first defendant prior to the letter of 17 March to say that they needed something to help satisfy their auditors. On that basis, and because the claimants put in no witness statement in rejoinder which contradicted that sequence of events, it does indeed appear that the judge was in error at that point. However, it is a point which is of minimal significance in the overall picture. There was also before the judge a report by Mr Wyper of the claimants on a trip made by him to Uzbekistan in November 1997 which made clear that, well before any question arose in relation to the audited accounts, the first defendant was admitting the sum due, even in the knowledge of his difficulties in Uzbekistan. The relevant part of the report read:

> "He received me with goodwill and told me about his operations there. He has many business interests of which importing ethanol is only a small part and owns two bonded facilities. He talked of the difficulties of conducting business in Uzbekistan but mentioned that he has regularly challenged government decrees - and won! As far as our business is concerned, he said that the money he owes us will be paid by Christmas. He is planning a partial transfer at the end of this month. As for the future, Mr Patel claimed that he wants no more contact with ED&F Man as we are 'not serious'."

Furthermore, after the acknowledgement in March, there were, as I have already made clear, a number of separate admissions and payments made quite independently of any question of assistance with the auditors.

51. As to concern (iv), I have already made clear that I do not consider there is any reason to suppose the judge assumed that the naming of a specific price per se meant that the profit sharing arrangement had been abandoned in favour of a straight sale price. He treated it, together with (a) the subsequent conduct of the parties' business, (b) the absence of any profit accounting as provided in the joint venture agreement, and (c) the clear admissions made, as an indication to that effect. I consider he was correct to do so.

52. Mr Thomas has powerfully submitted that, in deciding as he did, the judge in effect conducted a mini–trial of the issues in a manner impermissible on an application to set aside judgment under CPR 13.3(1)(a). He says there were plainly issues of fact as to whether and, if so, when the provisions of the joint venture agreement were abandoned and, in particular, the provision that Quickstop should not be liable to make any payment to the claimants unless or until payment was received by Quickstop. He further submits that, the judge was wrong to reject the explanation of the first defendant for the series of admissions made that the debt was due.

53. I would accept, as the judge accepted, that without the written admissions that would plainly be correct. However, in a case where, with knowledge of the material facts, clear admissions in writing are unambiguously made by a sophisticated businessman who has ample opportunity to advance his defence prior to judgment signed, a judge is in my view entitled to look at a case "in the round", in the sense that, if satisfied of the genuineness of the admissions, issues of fact which might otherwise require to be resolved at trial may fall away. Here, the broad issue was clear. By the time of the shipments sued upon, were the parties dealing upon the basis of a straight sale by the claimants at an invoiced price covering their costs and profit, or subject to joint venture arrangements under which they carried the risk of non–payment by Quickstop's ultimate buyer? The series of written admissions, if informed and genuine, were a clear indication that the former was the case. In that respect, I consider that the judge was entitled to reject as devoid of substance or conviction such explanation as was advanced for the making of those admissions and in my view he was entitled to conclude that the first defendant lacked any real prospect of successfully defending the claim.

54. As to the final concern expressed by Rix LJ, Mr Thomas submits that, whether or not the judge was right to regard the evidence as insufficient to satisfy the test under CPR 13.3(1)(a), there is reason for this court to set aside the judgment against the first defendant under 13.3(1)(b) because of the judge's observation not only that the defence was fanciful and had no chance of success but that it was "almost certainly dishonest". Mr Thomas submits that (1) the observation cast a slur upon the first defendant's name and reputation which was unnecessary to the judge's finding and which the first defendant should have an opportunity to contest; (2) the second defendant having obtained leave to defend, if a trial proceeds in relation to him, he may himself be prejudiced by reason of the judge's aspersions upon the advancement of a defence to which he was a party and would himself be entitled fully to litigate.

55. It does seem to me unfortunate that the judge felt constrained to make the observation he did as to the likelihood that the defence was dishonest, in a situation where refusal to set aside the judgment inevitably meant that the first defendant would be deprived of the opportunity to give evidence or cross–examine in relation to the circumstances surrounding the admissions made. The observation was unnecessary and collateral to the judge's decision. However, it was not a finding of fraud or dishonesty in relation to any of the transactions in question. It simply went to the bona fides of the first defendant's denial that he had genuinely acknowledged the debt. Were there reason to suppose that the matter will indeed proceed to trial against the second defendant, then there might have been some ‘other good reason' for setting judgment aside against the first defendant on terms that the entire sum claimed be paid into court. However, we have been informed by Mr Bryan that, assuming the appeal is dismissed, the claimants have no intention of pursuing the second defendant to trial. In those circumstances, I do not consider there is good reason to set aside the judgment under CPR 13.3 (1)(b).

56. I would dismiss this appeal.

Lord Justice Peter Gibson:

57. I agree. Potter LJ has set out the reasons for dismissing the appeal so comprehensively that there is nothing which I would wish to add.

Order: Appeal dismissed; costs to be paid by the 1st defendant, such costs agreed between the parties in the sum of £15,000.

(Order does not form part of the approved judgment)

Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank and another

[2003] UKHL 37

2003 March 3, 4, 5; June 26 — Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough, Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry

Ecclesiastical law — Lay rector — Repairs to chancel — Obligation at common law to repair chancel — Parochial church council's statutory power to recover cost of repairs from lay rector — Whether infringing lay rector's Convention right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions — Whether unlawful discrimination in enjoyment of Convention right — Whether parochial church council "public authority" — Whether entitled to enforce liability against lay rector — Chancel Repairs Act 1932 (22 Geo 5, c 20), ss 1, 2 — Human Rights Act 1998 (c 42), s 6, Sch 1, Pt I, art 14, Pt II, art 1

The defendants were the freehold owners of former rectorial land and consequently, as lay rectors or lay impropriators, they were liable at common law to repair the chancel of their parish church. In September 1994 the plaintiff, the parochial church council, served the first defendant with a notice under section 2(1) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932[1] calling upon her to repair the chancel. She disputed the liability, and the plaintiff subsequently brought proceedings against the defendants, pursuant to section 2(2) of the 1932 Act, to recover the cost of chancel repairs. On a preliminary issue the judge held that the defendants were liable for the cost of the repairs. The Court of Appeal allowed the defendants' appeal and held that the plaintiff could not recover the cost of chancel repairs from the defendants on the grounds that a parochial church council was a public authority for the purposes of section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998[2] since it had powers unavailable to private individuals to determine how others should act, that therefore it could not act in a manner which was incompatible with the defendants' rights under the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, and that the defendants' liability to defray the cost of chancel repairs was an indiscriminate form of taxation and amounted to an infringement of their right to peaceful enjoyment of

[1] Chancel Repairs Act 1932, s 2: "(1) Where a chancel is in need of repair, the responsible authority may serve upon any person, who appears to them to be liable to repair the chancel, a notice in the prescribed form . . . stating in general terms the grounds on which that person is alleged to be liable as aforesaid, and the extent of the disrepair, and calling upon him to put the chancel in proper repair. (2) At any time after the expiration of a period of one month from the date when the notice to repair was served, the responsible authority may, if the chancel has not been put in proper repair, bring proceedings against the person on whom the notice was served to recover the sum required to put the chancel in proper repair . . ."

[2] Human Rights Act 1998, s 6: "(1) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. (2) Subsection (1) does not apply to an act if (a) as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation, the authority could not have acted differently; or (b) in the case of one or more provisions of, or made under, primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights, the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions. (3) In this section 'public authority' includes . . . (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature . . . (5) In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection 3(b) if the nature of the act is private."

Sch 1, Pt I, art 14: "The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

Sch 1, Pt II, art 1: see post, para 66.

A their possessions guaranteed by article 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention and unlawful discrimination as between landowners contrary to article 14.

On appeal by the plaintiff—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that a "public authority" for the purposes of section 6 of the 1998 Act could be either a core public authority which exercised functions which were broadly governmental so that they were all functions of a public nature, or a hybrid public authority some of whose functions were of a public B nature; that although the Church of England, as the established church, had special links with central government and performed certain public functions, it was essentially a religious organisation and not a governmental organisation, and parochial church councils were part of the means whereby the Church promoted its religious mission and discharged financial responsibilities in respect of parish churches; that the functions of parochial church councils were primarily concerned with pastoral and administrative matters within the parish and were not wholly of a C public nature, and therefore they were not core public authorities under section 6(1); that (Lord Scott of Foscote dissenting) the fact that the public had certain rights in relation to their parish church was not sufficient to characterise the actions of a parochial church council in maintaining the fabric of the parish church as being of a public nature, so that when the plaintiff took steps to enforce the defendants' liability for the repair of the chancel, it was not performing a function of a public nature, which rendered it a hybrid public authority under section 6(3)(b); that the defendants' chancel repair liability was a private law liability arising out of the D ownership of land, and the enforcement of that liability by the plaintiffs was an act of a private nature and therefore excluded by section 6(5) from coming within the ambit of section 6(3)(b); that (per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough, Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry) in seeking to enforce the defendants' chancel repair liability the plaintiff was acting under primary legislation, namely section 2 of the 1932 Act, and was consequently within the exception in section 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act; that therefore, there were no grounds E upon which the plaintiff could be regarded as a public authority within section 6 of the 1998 Act; and that, accordingly, it had no obligation to act compatibly with Convention rights (post, paras 7, 9, 12–14, 16, 17, 19, 58–64, 86–89, 93, 129, 137, 153, 154, 156–166, 169–173).

(2) That (per Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough and Lord Scott of Foscote) a person's right to peaceful enjoyment of his possessions did not extend to the grant of relief from liabilities incurred under the civil law; that the F defendants had acquired the rectorial property with full knowledge of the potential liability for chancel repair that the acquisition would carry with it; that it was a burden which ran with rectorial land and was similar to any other burden which ran with the land; and that the defendants were not therefore being discriminated against as compared with other owners of rectorial land, nor were they being subjected to an arbitrary form of taxation or being interfered with in the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions contrary to article 14 of, and article 1 of the First Protocol to, the G Convention (post paras 71–75, 91, 92, 133–136).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal

By leave of the House of Lords granted on 11 February 2002 (Lord Hutton, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough and Lord Millett) the plaintiff, the Parochial Church Council of the Parish of Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley, Warwickshire, appealed from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, Robert Walker and Sedley LJJ) on 17 May 2001 allowing an appeal by the defendants, Gail Wallbank and Andrew H

A David Wallbank, from a decision of Ferris J who on 28 March 2000 ruled on a preliminary issue that by virtue of being freehold owners of Glebe Farm, Aston Cantlow, the defendants were lay rectors of the church of St John the Baptist, Aston Cantlow, and were therefore personally liable for the repair of the chancel of the church as set out in a notice served by the plaintiff on the first defendant on 12 September 1994, to recover the sum of £95,260·84, the estimated cost of the repair.

B The facts are stated in the opinions of their Lordships.

Charles George QC and Mark Hill for the plaintiff. The lay rector's duty to repair the chancel is the corollary of his right to receive the tithes of the parish. It is the quid pro quo for the grant to him or his predecessor by the Crown, usually at the time of the Reformation, of the tithes, with or without C glebe land. Where, as in the present case, land has been allotted to him under an inclosure award in lieu of his right to the tithes, the duty to repair becomes the corollary of the right to the land so allotted. The fact that the tithe has ceased to be payable is irrelevant. [Reference was made to Representative Body of the Church in Wales v Tithe Redemption Commission [1944] AC 228.]

The Court of Appeal's decision constituted a windfall for the defendants D in that it let them off their liability and led to their unjust enrichment. That was not the intention of the Human Rights Act 1998.

The parochial church council ("PCC") was not a core public authority for the purpose of section 6 of the 1998 Act. Core authorities are those bodies, whether national or local, through which the state performs its function of administering and protecting its citizens. All the acts of a core E authority must be compatible with Convention rights. If the PCC is a core authority it will never be possible for it to bring a complaint under the Act because it cannot be a victim. [Reference was made to Rothenthurm Commune v Switzerland (1988) 59 DR 251; Ayuntamiento de Mula v Spain Reports of Judgments and Decisions 2001-I, p 531; Hautanemi v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR CD 155 and Holy Monasteries v Greece (1994) 20 EHRR 1.]

F The mere fact that the Church of England is the established church cannot be enough to make a PCC a core public authority. The Church of England is not a department of state and it has no juridical personality. Its ecclesiastical courts are the only parts of the Church of England which are core authorities.

Unlike other public authorities a PCC receives no public funding. The G majority of the funding for the Church comes from its worshipping communities. The members of the PCC are volunteers and there is no provision for payment of attendance allowances to which members of public authorities are normally entitled. The functions of the PCC are essentially private, pastoral and spiritual and include co-operation with the minister in promoting the pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical mission of the Church. Its functions clearly show that a PCC is not a core H public authority.

Section 6 of the 1998 Act draws a distinction between core public authorities and hybrid authorities whose acts must be compatible with Convention rights unless the nature of the act is private. The dividing line between hybrid public authorities and bodies which are not public authorities at all is a fine one. [Reference was made to Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association v Donoghue [2002] QB 48; R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936; R v Bolsover District Council, Ex p Pepper [2001] LGR 43 and R (Molinaro) v Kensington and Chelsea London Borough Council [2002] LGR 336.] A

Although there are occasions when church representatives stand in the place of the state in the exercise of public functions such as marriage, education, care of churchyards and the issue of burial certificates, a PCC's functions relate exclusively to pastoral matters. The functions and powers of PCCs when properly analysed fall short of what is required to constitute all PCCs as hybrid authorities if they have no churchyards and the benefit of chancel repair liability. It is improbable that Parliament intended that some PCCs but not others should be hybrid public authorities. There is no indication that Parliament intended that PCCs should be public authorities at all. B C

If it is held that the PCC is not a core public authority but is a hybrid authority, then the taking of proceedings by the PCC against a lay impropriator for recovery of the costs of chancel repairs is a private act for the purposes of section 6(5) of the 1998 Act. The primary duty of the lay rector is to maintain the chancel in repair. That is not a function of a public nature within the meaning of section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act. One of the functions of the PCC is the maintenance of the fabric of the parish church. That is not a function of a public nature within the meaning of section 6(3)(b) and in exercising it the PCC is not acting as a public authority. D

Where the lay rector has not effected the necessary chancel repairs himself the PCC may effect them and recover the costs of doing so by the statutory procedure introduced by the Chancel Repairs Act 1932. In recovering the cost by that procedure the PCC is enforcing a private law obligation which rests on the owner of rectorial land. The liability to repair the chancel runs with the land and is enforceable against the owner for the time being of the land personally. The PCC's act in serving a repair notice was a private act whereby it was performing the private function of having the church repaired. The fact that liability attaches to the ownership of particular land and is unrelated to church membership confirms that enforcement is a private act. E F

There was no interference with the defendants' property under article 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention The defendants came knowingly into ownership of land which they knew was subject to a certain liability, namely, the liability to repair the chancel of the parish church. In using a mechanism that was open to it to enforce that liability the PCC was not imposing a tax as the Court of Appeal concluded. It is necessary to look at the particular case and not at the generality of the situation. [Reference was made to James v United Kingdom (1986) 8 EHRR 123; Håkansson and Sturesson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 1 and Sunday Times v United Kingdom (1979) 2 EHRR 245.] G

A landowner who has an obligation cannot, when called upon to honour the obligation, rely upon the prohibition of discrimination in article 14 of the Convention. [Reference was made to Wandsworth London Borough Council v Michalak [2003] 1 WLR 617.] The defendants' land already had a burden and the defendants never had unencumbered land when they became lay rectors. The relevant class of comparator would not be landowners H

A generally but other landowners subject to incumbrances including chancel repair liabilities. In such a case there would be no discrimination or different treatment of the defendants from the chosen comparator. There was no discrimination which related to a personal characteristic and the fact of being a lay rector is not such a characteristic. [Reference was made to Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711.]

B Even if the PCC was a public authority for the purposes of the 1998 Act, section 6(1) of the 1998 Act does not apply because the PCC was acting under the compulsion of primary legislation. As a result of the provisions of the 1932 Act the PCC could not have acted differently and is entitled to rely on section 6(2)(a) and/or (b) of the 1998 Act.

Proceedings under the 1932 Act are not discretionary and there are two requirements: to serve a notice of repair and, in default, to sue for the new C statutory debt. A PCC is a charity. It has a duty and not a discretion to bring in outstanding funds. It has no power to waive debts. If the PCC did not follow the procedures set out in the 1932 Act it would be in breach of its statutory duty, and its members would be in breach of their duties as charity trustees and liable to be held to account by the Charity Commissioners.

D Michael Beloff QC and Ian Partridge for the defendants. The PCC is a core public authority for the purposes of section 6(1) of the 1998 Act. A public authority is not defined in the Act but is left to the courts to define. "Public" in its ordinary and natural meaning is the antithesis of private. It is to be assumed at least that the legislature wished to impose domestic law obligations upon certain bodies so that if those bodies complied with their E obligations the United Kingdom would not be liable to suit before the European Court of Human Rights. [Reference was made to Foster v British Gas plc [1991] 1 QB 405; [1991] 2 AC 306.]

Consideration of whether or not a PCC is a public authority requires consideration of its nature, the source of its existence, powers and duties and the nature of the functions which it carries out. The approach adopted by the Court of Appeal was correct.

F The Church of England, as the church by law established, is a public authority. It enjoys a unique position and is regulated by Acts of Parliament. The sovereign appoints its bishops and deans. Archbishops and certain bishops sit ex officio in the House of Lords. The Church of England's status as the established church distinguishes it from other religious bodies. The public have rights in regard to the Church of England in matters such as G baptism, marriage and burial.

The PCC is an integral part of the Church of England. It is the administrative organ of the parish, which is the basic building block of the church. The PCC is a body corporate with perpetual succession and in effect created by statute. It has powers outside those concerning purely religious matters and beyond those which result from the normal rules applicable between individuals, including statutory power to enforce the chancel repair H liability. When the PCC exercises its functions in promoting the mission of the established church, it is acting in the public interest and is performing a public function. The PCC is therefore part of the fabric of the state and satisfies the public authority test. Hautanemi v Sweden 22 EHRR CD 155 and Holy Monasteries v Greece 20 EHRR 1 are not decisions which assist the plaintiff and the latter case suggests that an established church is a public authority.

If it is held that the PCC is not a core public authority but is a hybrid authority, then the taking of proceedings against a lay impropriator, pursuant to the 1932 Act, for the recovery of the cost of chancel repairs is not a "private" act for the purposes of section 6(5) of the 1998 Act. There is no element of mutuality or mutual governance between impropriator and the church in relation to modern repair liability. The enforcement is a function of the PCC supported by statute. The relationship between the plaintiff and defendants arises independently of the volition of either of them. There is a public interest in the repair of historic churches and enforcement of the liability is thus a public function.

The rule of common law which established the liability of the defendants to repair applies to individuals whether or not they are members of the church. It lacks any juridical basis and is wholly capricious. The liability is enforced by a body established by the state by statute, and empowered by the state by statute to enforce the liability. Such an act of enforcement is a public act.

The PCC's action in serving a notice under the 1932 Act on the defendants was unlawful under the 1998 Act by reason of article 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention, read either alone or in conjunction with article 14.

The word "possessions" in article 1 of the First Protocol is to be broadly construed and includes money, which is the possession the defendants have been deprived of. The assumption inherent in Article 1 is that the payment of taxes or other contributions is a deprivation of possessions. Therefore the defendants have been deprived of the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions.

Although it is proper and in the public interest to repair ancient churches, the burden of chancel repairs falls disproportionately on the defendants. It is objectionable that liability can be imposed on those, inter alias, who are not churchgoers, who are not Christians and who do not live in the parish. The chancel repair liability is personal and unlimited and can easily be disproportionate to the value of the land. Therefore the enforcement of the liability to defray the cost of chancel repairs is an unlawful interference with the defendants' personal property rights. [Reference was made to Håkansson and Sturesson v Sweden 13 EHRR 1 and Hentrich v France (1994) 18 EHRR 440.)

The enforcement of the liability also amounts to discrimination in the enjoyment of a Convention right under article 14. The appropriate class of comparator is that of landowners in England at large or in the parish, and there is no objective or reasonable justification for treating the defendants differently. [Reference was made to Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417.]

There was no compulsion of primary legislation which obliged the PCC to act as it did so as to bring it within section 6(2) of the 1998 Act. The liability of the lay rector exists only at common law. The 1932 Act imposes no duty to serve notice or commence proceedings against the defendants or anyone who appears to be liable to repair the chancel.

George QC replied.

A Their Lordships took time for consideration.

26 June. LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD

1 My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of all your Lordships. I too would allow this appeal. On some of the issues your Lordships have expressed different views. I shall state my own views without repeating the facts.

B 2 This case concerns one of the more arcane and unsatisfactory areas of property law: the liability of a lay rector, or lay impropriator, for the repair of the chancel of a church. The very language is redolent of a society long disappeared. The anachronistic, even capricious, nature of this ancient liability was recognised some years ago by the Law Commission in its report on Property Law: Liability for Chancel Repairs (1985) Law Com No 152.
C The commission said "this relic of the past" is "no longer acceptable". The commission recommended its phased abolition.

3 In these proceedings Mr and Mrs Wallbank admitted that, apart from the Human Rights Act 1998, they have no defence to the claim made against them by the Parochial Church Council of the parish of Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley, Warwickshire. The House was not asked to consider whether Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford
D [1935] 2 KB 417 was correctly decided.

4 At first sight the Human Rights Act 1998 might seem to have nothing to do with the present case. The events giving rise to the litigation occurred, and the decision of Ferris J was given, before the Act came into force. But the decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] Ch 51 was based on the provisions of the Human Rights Act, and this decision has wide
E financial implications for the Church of England, going far beyond the outcome of this particular case. The decision affects numerous parochial church councils and perhaps as many as one third of all parish churches. The Church of England needs to know whether, as the Court of Appeal held, it is unlawful now for a parochial church council to enforce a lay rector's obligation to meet the cost of chancel repairs. Accordingly, in order to obtain the decision of the House on this point, the plaintiff
F parochial church council conceded that the Human Rights Act 1998 applies in this case. This concession having been made by the plaintiff, no argument was addressed to your Lordships' House on the question of law thus conceded. I express no view on this question.

5 Assuming the Human Rights Act 1998 is applicable in this case, the overall question is whether the plaintiff's prosecution of proceedings against G Mr and Mrs Wallbank is rendered unlawful by section 6 of the Act as an act by a public authority which is incompatible with a Convention right. In answering this question the initial step is to consider whether the plaintiff is "a public authority".

6 The expression "public authority" is not defined in the Act, nor is it a recognised term of art in English law, that is, an expression with a specific recognised meaning. The word "public" is a term of uncertain import, used
H with many different shades of meaning: public policy, public rights of way, public property, public authority (in the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict c 61)), public nuisance, public house, public school, public company. So in the present case the statutory context is all important. As to that, the broad purpose sought to be achieved by section 6(1) is not in

A doubt. The purpose is that those bodies for whose acts the state is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights shall in future be subject to a domestic law obligation not to act incompatibly with Convention rights. If they act in breach of this legal obligation victims may henceforth obtain redress from the courts of this country. In future victims should not need to travel to Strasbourg.

B 7 Conformably with this purpose, the phrase "a public authority" in section 6(1) is essentially a reference to a body whose nature is governmental in a broad sense of that expression. It is in respect of organisations of this nature that the government is answerable under the European Convention on Human Rights. Hence, under the Human Rights Act 1998 a body of this nature is required to act compatibly with Convention rights in everything it does. The most obvious examples are government departments, local C authorities, the police and the armed forces. Behind the instinctive classification of these organisations as bodies whose nature is governmental lie factors such as the possession of special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest, and a statutory constitution: see the valuable article by Professor Dawn Oliver, "The Frontiers of the State: Public Authorities and Public Functions under the Human Rights Act": [2000] PL 476.

D 8 A further, general point should be noted. One consequence of being a "core" public authority, namely, an authority falling within section 6 without reference to section 6(3), is that the body in question does not itself enjoy Convention rights. It is difficult to see how a core public authority could ever claim to be a victim of an infringement of a Convention rights. A core public authority seems inherently incapable of satisfying the E Convention description of a victim: "any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals" (article 34, with emphasis added). Only victims of an unlawful act may bring proceedings under section 7 of the Human Rights Act 1998, and the Convention description of a victim has been incorporated into the Act, by section 7(7). This feature, that a core public authority is incapable of having Convention rights of its own, is a matter to be borne in mind when considering whether or not a particular F body is a core public authority. In itself this feature throws some light on how the expression "public authority" should be understood and applied. It must always be relevant to consider whether Parliament can have been intended that the body in question should have no Convention rights.

9 In a modern developed state governmental functions extend far beyond maintenance of law and order and defence of the realm. Further, the G manner in which wide ranging governmental functions are discharged varies considerably. In the interests of efficiency and economy, and for other reasons, functions of a governmental nature are frequently discharged by non-governmental bodies. Sometimes this will be a consequence of privatisation, sometimes not. One obvious example is the running of prisons by commercial organisations. Another is the discharge of regulatory functions by organisations in the private sector, for instance, the Law H Society. Section 6(3)(b) gathers this type of case into the embrace of section 6 by including within the phrase "public authority" any person whose functions include "functions of a public nature". This extension of the expression "public authority" does not apply to a person if the nature of the act in question is "private".

A 10 Again, the statute does not amplify what the expression "public" and its counterpart "private" mean in this context. But, here also, given the statutory context already mentioned and the repetition of the description "public", essentially the contrast being drawn is between functions of a governmental nature and functions, or acts, which are not of that nature. I stress, however, that this is no more than a useful guide. The phrase used in the Act is public function, not governmental function.

B 11 Unlike a core public authority, a "hybrid" public authority, exercising both public functions and non-public functions, is not absolutely disabled from having Convention rights. A hybrid public authority is not a public authority in respect of an act of a private nature. Here again, as with section 6(1), this feature throws some light on the approach to be adopted when interpreting section 6(3)(b). Giving a generously wide scope to the C expression "public function" in section 6(3)(b) will further the statutory aim of promoting the observance of human rights values without depriving the bodies in question of the ability themselves to rely on Convention rights when necessary.

12 What, then, is the touchstone to be used in deciding whether a function is public for this purpose? Clearly there is no single test of universal application. There cannot be, given the diverse nature of governmental D functions and the variety of means by which these functions are discharged today. Factors to be taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service.

13 Turning to the facts in the present case, I do not think parochial E church councils are "core" public authorities. Historically the Church of England has discharged an important and influential role in the life of this country. As the established church it still has special links with central government. But the Church of England remains essentially a religious organisation. This is so even though some of the emanations of the church discharge functions which may qualify as governmental. Church schools and the conduct of marriage services are two instances. The legislative F powers of the General Synod of the Church of England are another. This should not be regarded as infecting the Church of England as a whole, or its emanations in general, with the character of a governmental organisation.

14 As to parochial church councils, their constitution and functions lend no support to the view that they should be characterised as G governmental organisations or, more precisely, in the language of the statute, public authorities. Parochial church councils are established as corporate bodies under a church measure, now the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956. For historical reasons this unique form of legislation, having the same force as a statute, is the way the Church of England governs its affairs. But the essential role of a parochial church council is to provide a formal means, prescribed by the Church of England, H whereby ex officio and elected members of the local church promote the mission of the Church and discharge financial responsibilities in respect of their own parish church, including responsibilities regarding maintenance of the fabric of the building. This smacks of a church body engaged in self-governance and promotion of its affairs. This is far removed from the type of body whose acts engage the responsibility of the state under the European Convention.

15 The contrary conclusion, that the church authorities in general and parochial church councils in particular are "core" public authorities, would mean these bodies are not capable of being victims within the meaning of the Human Rights Act 1998. Accordingly they are not able to complain of infringements of Convention rights. That would be an extraordinary conclusion. The Human Rights Act goes out of its way, in section 13, to single out for express mention the exercise by religious organisations of the Convention right of freedom of thought, conscience and religion. One would expect that these and other Convention rights would be enjoyed by the Church of England as much as other religious bodies.

16 I turn next to consider whether a parochial church council is a hybrid public authority. For this purpose it is not necessary to analyse each of the functions of a parochial church council and see if any of them is a public function. What matters is whether the particular act done by the plaintiff council of which complaint is made is a private act as contrasted with the discharge of a public function. The impugned act is enforcement of Mr and Mrs Wallbank's liability, as lay rectors, for the repair of the chancel of the church of St John the Baptist at Aston Cantlow. As I see it, the only respect in which there is any "public" involvement is that parishioners have certain rights to attend church services and in respect of marriage and burial services. To that extent the state of repair of the church building may be said to affect rights of the public. But I do not think this suffices to characterise actions taken by the parochial church council for the repair of the church as "public". If a parochial church council enters into a contract with a builder for the repair of the chancel arch, that could be hardly be described as a public act. Likewise when a parochial church council enforces, in accordance with the provisions of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932, a burdensome incident attached to the ownership of certain pieces of land: there is nothing particularly "public" about this. This is no more a public act than is the enforcement of a restrictive covenant of which church land has the benefit.

17 For these reasons this appeal succeeds. A parochial church council is not a core public authority, nor does it become such by virtue of section 6(3)(b) when enforcing a lay rector's liability for chancel repairs. Accordingly the Human Rights Act 1998 affords lay rectors no relief from their liabilities. This conclusion should not be allowed to detract from the force of the recommendations, already mentioned, of the Law Commission. The need for reform has not lessened with the passage of time.

18 On this footing the other issues raised in this case do not call for decision. I prefer to express no view on the application of article 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention or, more specifically, on the compatibility of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 with Mr and Mrs Wallbank's Convention right under that article. The latter was not the subject of discrete argument.

19 I add only that even if section 6(1) is applicable in this type of case, and even if the provisions of the 1932 Act are incompatible with Mr and Mrs Wallbank's Convention rights under article 1 of the First Protocol, even so the plaintiff council would not be acting unlawfully in enforcing Mr and Mrs Wallbank's liability as lay rectors. Like sections 3(2)

A and 4(6), section 6(2) of the Human Rights Act 1998 is concerned to preserve the primacy, and legitimacy, of primary legislation. This is one of the basic principles of the Human Rights Act. As noted in Grosz, Beatson & Duffy, Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000), p 72, a public authority is not obliged to neutralise primary legislation by treating it as a dead letter. If a statutory provision cannot be rendered B Convention compliant by application of section 3(1), it remains lawful for a public authority, despite the incompatibility, to act so as to "give effect to" that provision: section 6(2)(b). Here, section 2 of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 provides that if the defendant would have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court, the court shall give judgment for the cost of putting the chancel in repair. When a parochial church council acts pursuant to that provision it is acting within C the scope of the exception set out in section 6(2)(b).

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD

20 My Lords, the village of Aston Cantlow lies about three miles to the north west of Stratford-upon-Avon. It has a long history. The parish church, St John the Baptist, stands on an ancient Saxon site. Two images of its exterior can be seen on the website Pictorial Images of Warwickshire, D www.genuki.org.uk/big/eng/WAR/images. It is the church where Shakespeare's mother, Mary Arden, who lived at Wilmcote within the parish, married John Shakespeare. The earliest part of the present structure is the chancel which has been there since the late 13th century. It was built in the decorated style and contains a fine example of the use of flowing tracery: Pevsner & Wedgewood, The Buildings of England: Warwickshire (1965), E pp 19, 75. As time went on the condition of the structure began to deteriorate, and it is now in need of repair. It has been in that state since at least 1990.

21 In January 1995, when this action began, it was estimated that the cost of the repairs to the chancel was £95,260·84. By that date the Parochial Church Council ("the PCC") had served a notice under the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 in the prescribed form on Mrs Wallbank in her capacity as lay F rector calling upon her to repair the chancel. She disputed liability, so the PCC brought proceedings against her under section 2(2) of the Act. When the notice was served on 12 September 1994 it was thought that Mrs Wallbank was the sole freehold owner of Glebe Farm. In fact, as a result of her conveyance of the farm into their joint names in 1990, she is its joint owner together with Mr Wallbank. So a further notice was served on G 23 January 1996 on both Mr and Mrs Wallbank and an application was made for Mr Wallbank to be joined as a defendant in the proceedings. Several years have gone by. The dispute between the parties has still not been resolved. The cost of the repairs must now greatly exceed the amount of the original estimate.

22 On 17 February 2000 Ferris J heard argument on the question whether the liability of the lay rector to repair the chancel or otherwise to H meet the cost of the repairs was unenforceable by reason of the Human Rights Act 1998 or otherwise. He had been asked to determine this question as a preliminary issue. On 28 March 2000 he answered the question in the negative. At the end of his judgment he observed that it had been posed in terms which would only be appropriate if the Act was already in force. The only provisions which were in force then were sections 18, 20 and 21(5): section 22(2). By the time of the hearing in the Court of Appeal on 19 March 2001 the position had changed. The remaining provisions of the Act were brought into force on 2 October 2000: the Human Rights Act 1998 (Commencement No 2) Order 2000 (SI 2000/1851). Mr and Mrs Wallbank were allowed to amend their notice of appeal so that the issues which they wished to raise could be properly pleaded. On 17 May 2001, the Court of Appeal [2002] Ch 51 held that the PCC was a public authority for the purposes of section 6 of the Act. The court also held that the PCC's action in serving the notice on Mr and Mrs Wallbank was unlawful by reason of article 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, read either alone or with article 14 of the Convention.

23 The circumstances in which Mr and Mrs Wallbank are said to be liable for the cost of the repair have been helpfully described by my noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote. I gratefully adopt what he has said about them. It is clear from his account that the liability of the lay impropriator to pay the cost of repairing the chancel has been part of ecclesiastical law for many centuries. As Wynn-Parry J explained in Chivers & Sons Ltd v Air Ministry [1955] Ch 585, 593, it rests on the maxim, which has long been recognised, that he who has the profits of the benefice should bear the burden. But the questions about the scope and effect of the Human Rights Act 1998 which your Lordships have been asked to decide in this appeal, and on which I wish to concentrate, are of current interest and very considerable public importance. They raise issues whose significance extends far beyond the boundaries of the parish of Aston Cantlow.

24 The principal human rights issues which arise are (a) whether Mr and Mrs Wallbank can rely upon an alleged violation of their Convention rights as a ground of appeal when both the act complained of and the decision which went against them at first instance took place before 2 October 2000 ("the retrospectivity issue"), (b) whether the PCC is a public authority for the purposes of section 6(1) of the Act ("the public authority issue") and (c) whether the act of the PCC in serving the notice under the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 on Mr and Mrs Wallbank was incompatible with their rights under article 1 of the First Protocol read either alone or in conjunction with article 14 of the Convention ("the incompatibility issue").

The retrospectivity issue

25 When the case came before the Court of Appeal the PCC conceded that it was open to Mr and Mrs Wallbank to raise the question whether its act in serving the notice was unlawful under section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 by virtue of sections 7(1)(b) and 22(4) of the Act, notwithstanding that service of the notice predated the coming into force of those sections. The Court of Appeal accepted this concession, which they considered it to have been rightly made: [2002] Ch 51, 56, para 7. Those were, of course, early days in the life of the Act. R v Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, R v Kansal (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 69 and R v Benjafield [2003] 1 AC 1099 had yet to come before your Lordships' House. In the light of what was said in those cases about the issue of retrospectivity the PCC gave notice in the Statement of Facts and Issues of its intention to apply for leave to dispute the

A issue in the course of the hearing of this appeal. But in the PCC's written case it is stated that this contention is no longer being pursued. In the result, although the parties were told at the outset of the hearing that it should not be assumed that the House would necessarily proceed on the basis of this concession, the issue was not the subject of argument.

26 I have, nevertheless, given some thought to the question whether it would be appropriate to examine the issue whether the service of the notice B was incompatible with Mr and Mrs Wallbank's Convention rights. The question whether, and if so in what circumstances, effect should be given to the Human Rights Act 1998 where relevant events occurred before it came into force is far from easy. So I should like to take a moment or two to explain why I have come to the conclusion that the concession was properly made and that in this case Mr and Mrs Wallbank are entitled to claim in C these proceedings that the PCC has acted in a way that is made unlawful by section 6(1) of the Act.

27 As Lord Woolf CJ observed in Wainwright v Home Office [2002] QB 1334, 1344G para 22, there has been considerable uncertainty as to whether the Human Rights Act 1998 can apply retrospectively in situations where the conduct complained of occurred before the Act came into force. The position which we have reached so far can, I think, be summarised in D this way.

28 The only provision in the Act which gives retrospective effect to any of its provisions is section 22(4). It directs attention exclusively to that part of the Act which deals with the acts of public authorities: see sections 6 to 9. It has been said that its effect is to enable the Act to be used defensively against public authorities with retrospective effect but not offensively: see E the annotations to the Act by the late Peter Duffy QC in Current Law Statutes, vol 3 (1998). Section 22(4) states that section 7(1)(b) applies to proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place, but that otherwise subsection (1)(b) does not apply to an act taking place before the coming into force of section 7. Section 7(1)(b) enables a person who claims that a public authority has acted in a way which is made unlawful by section 6(1) to rely on his Convention F rights in proceedings brought by or at the instigation of the public authority. Section 6(2)(a) provides that section 6(1) does not apply if as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation the authority could not have acted differently.

29 It has been held that acts of courts or tribunals which took place before 2 October 2000 which they were required to make by primary G legislation and were made according to the meaning which was to be given to the legislation at that time are not affected by section 22(4): see R v Kansal (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 69, 112, para 84; Wainwright v Home Office [2002] QB 1334, 1346–1347, paras 29–36. Section 3(2) states that the obligation in section 3(1) to interpret legislation in a way that is compatible with Convention rights applies to primary and secondary legislation whenever enacted. But the interpretative obligation in section 3(1) cannot be applied H to invalidate a decision which was good at the time when it was made by changing retrospectively the meaning which the court or tribunal previously gave to that legislation. The same view has been taken where the claim relates to acts of public authorities other than courts or tribunals. Here too it has been held that the Act cannot be relied upon retrospectively by introducing a right of privacy to make unlawful conduct which was lawful at the time when it took place: Wainwright v Home Office [2002] QB 1334, 1347G–H, para 40.

30 In this case the act which section 6(1) is said to have made unlawful is the enforcement by the PCC of the liability for the cost of the repairs to the chancel. It is the enforcement of that liability that is said to be an unlawful interference with the personal property rights of Mr and Mrs Wallbank contrary to article 1 of the First Protocol. Service by the PCC of the notice on Mr and Mrs Wallbank under section 2(1) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 took place in September 1994, well before the coming into effect of the Human Rights Act 1998. But the service of the notice under that subsection was just the first step in the taking of proceedings under the 1932 Act to enforce the liability to repair. If, as has happened here, the chancel is not put in proper repair within a period of one month from the date when the notice to repair was served proceedings must be taken by the responsible authority to recover the sum required to put the chancel in proper repair by means of an order of the court: section 2(2). The final step in the process is the giving by the court of judgment for the responsible authority for such sum as appears to it to represent the cost of putting the chancel in proper repair: section 2(3). The arguments before Ferris J and in the Court of Appeal arose out a direction that there should be trial of preliminary issues. The question which is before your Lordships relates to one of those issues. The proceedings are, in that sense, still at the preliminary stage. The stage of giving judgment under section 2(3) has not yet been reached.

31 If the only act of the PCC which was in issue in this case had been the service of the notice on Mr and Mrs Wallbank it would have difficult, in the light of what was decided in R v Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545 and R v Kansal (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 69, to say that that act, which was lawful at the time when the notice was served and was still lawful when the preliminary issue was decided by Ferris J at first instance, had become unlawful following the coming into effect of the Human Rights Act 1998. But the proceedings to give effect to that notice are still on foot. In this situation there is, in my opinion, no issue of retrospectivity. Mr and Mrs Wallbank do not need to rely on section 22(4). It is sufficient for their purpose to say that they wish to rely on their Convention right in the proceedings which the PCC are still taking against them with a view to having the notice enforced. This is something that they are entitled to do under section 7(1)(b).

32 It should be emphasised that the situation which I have outlined avoids the problems which were discussed in R v Lambert and R v Kansal (No 2) about extending section 22(4) to appeals. We are, of course, dealing in this case with an appeal against the decision of a court or tribunal: see section 7(6)(a). But the fact is that the appeal relates to a preliminary issue only. This means that the court has yet to reach the stage in these proceedings when effect can be given to the notice which the PCC have served. That still lies in the future. Section 7(6)(a) states that the expression "legal proceedings" in section 7(1)(b) includes "proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority." The preliminary issue has been examined as part of these proceedings.

33 The question whether the proceedings of which an examination of the preliminary issue forms part are "legal proceedings" as so defined brings

A me to the next issue, which is whether the PCC is a public authority for the purposes of section 6(1) of the Act.

The public authority issue

(a) Introduction

34 Section 6(1) provides that it is unlawful for a public authority to act B in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. The expression "public authority" is not fully defined anywhere in the Human Rights Act 1998. What the Act does instead is to address itself to some particular issues. In all other respects the expression has been left to bear its ordinary meaning according to the context in which it is used. Section 6(3) provides:

> "In this section 'public authority' includes—(a) a court or tribunal, and C (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature, but does not include either House of Parliament or a person exercising functions in connection with proceedings in Parliament."

Section 6(5) provides: "In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private."

D 35 It is clear from these provisions that, for the purposes of this Act, public authorities fall into two distinct types or categories. Courts and tribunals, which are expressly included in the definition, can perhaps be said to constitute a third category but they can be left on one side for present purposes. The first category comprises those persons or bodies which are obviously public or "standard" public authorities: Clayton & Tomlinson, E The Law of Human Rights (2000), vol 1, para 5.08. They were referred to in the course of the argument as "core" public authorities. It appears to have been thought that no further description was needed as they obviously have the character of public authorities. In the Notes on Clauses which are quoted in Clayton & Tomlinson, para 5.06, it was explained that the legislation proceeds on the basis that some authorities are so obviously public authorities that it is not necessary to define them expressly. In other F words, they are public authorities through and through. So section 6(5) does not apply to them. The second category comprises persons or bodies some of whose functions are of a public nature. They are described in Clayton & Tomlinson as "functional" public authorities and were referred to in the argument as "hybrid" public authorities. Section 6(5) applies to them, so in their case a distinction must be drawn between their public functions and the G acts which they perform which are of a private nature.

36 Skilfully drawn though these provisions are, they leave a great deal of open ground. There is room for doubt and for argument. It has been left to the courts to resolve these issues when they arise. It is plain that the Court of Appeal were being invited to enter into largely uncharted territory. As a result of their efforts we are better equipped as we set out on the same journey. We have the benefit of their decision and of the criticisms that have H been made of it. We must now see where all this leads us. First, it is necessary to examine what they did.

37 The Court of Appeal declined, rightly in my opinion, to look to Hansard for assistance: [2002] Ch 51, 61D, para 29. They rejected the argument that there was an ambiguity which brought this case within the scope of the limited exception which was described in Pepper v Hart [1993] AC 593. It is true that various attempts were made by ministers in both Houses to explain their approach to the application of the Bill to what it described as public authorities. That was understandable, as some concern was expressed about the implications of this aspect of the legislation. But it is not the ministers' words, uttered as they were on behalf of the executive, that must be referred to in order to understand what Parliament intended. It is the words used by Parliament that must be examined in order to understand and apply the legislation that it has enacted.

38 The Court of Appeal were invited to hold that the test of what is a public authority for the purposes of section 6 was function-based. They rejected this proposition too. As Sir Andrew Morritt V-C delivering the judgment of the court pointed out, this may well be determinative as regards the "hybrid" class of public authorities as defined by section 6(3)(b). But it does not follow that it governs the principal category of "core" public authorities: [2002] Ch 51, 62B, para 33. In the following paragraph he said that for this reason the decided cases on the amenability of bodies to judicial review, while plainly relevant, will not necessarily be determinative of a body's membership either of the principal or hybrid class of public authority. He noted that the authorities on judicial review, as they now stand, draw a conceptual line between functions of public governance and functions of mutual governance. He said that there was no surviving element of mutuality or mutual governance as between the impropriator and the Church in the lay rector's modern liability for chancel repairs.

39 Sir Andrew Morritt V-C set out the conclusions of the Court of Appeal on the public authority issue, at p 63, para 35:

> "In our judgment it is inescapable, in these circumstances, that a PCC is a public authority. It is an authority in the sense that it possesses powers which private individuals do not possess to determine how others should act. Thus, in particular, its notice to repair has statutory force. It is public in the sense that it is created and empowered by law; that it forms part of the church by law established; and that its functions include the enforcement through the courts of a common law liability to maintain its chancels resting upon persons who need not be members of the church. If this were to be incorrect, the PCC would nevertheless, and for the same reasons, be a legal person whose functions, chancel repairs among them, are functions of a public nature. It follows on either basis by virtue of section 6 that its acts, to be lawful, must be compatible with the rights set out in Schedule 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998."

40 The Court of Appeal, in reaching the conclusion that the PCC is a "core" public authority, appears to have proceeded in this way: (1) the PCC is an authority because it possesses powers which private individuals do not possess to enforce the lay rector's liability; and (2) it is public because it is created and empowered by law, it forms part of the Church of England as the established church and its functions include the enforcement of the liability on persons who need not be members of the church. By a similar process of reasoning the Court of Appeal concluded that the PCC is in any event a person some of whose functions, including chancel repairs, are functions of a public nature. In their view the fact that the PCC has the power and duty to enforce the obligation on persons with whom it has no other relationship

A showed that it has the character of a public authority, or at least that it is performing a function of a public nature when it is enforcing this liability: see also para 36.

41 This approach has the obvious merit of concentrating on the words of the statute. The words "public" and "authority" in section 6(1), "functions of a public nature" in section 6(3)(b) and "private" in section 6(5) are, of course, important. The word "public" suggests that there some B persons which may be described as authorities that are nevertheless private and not public. The word "authority" suggests that the person has regulatory or coercive powers given to it by statute or by the common law. The combination of these two words in the single unqualified phrase "public authority" suggests that it is the nature of the person itself, not the functions which it may perform, that is determinative. Section 6(1) does not C distinguish between public and private functions. It assumes that everything that a "core" public authority does is a public function. It applies to everything that a person does in that capacity. This suggests that some care needs to be taken to limit this category to cases where it is clear that this over-arching treatment is appropriate. The phrase "functions of a public nature" in section 6(3), on the other hand, does not make that assumption. It requires a distinction to be drawn between functions which are public and D those which are private. It has a much wider reach, and it is sensitive to the facts of each case. It is the function that the person is performing that is determinative of the question whether it is, for the purposes of that case, a "hybrid" public authority. The question whether section 6(5) applies to a particular act depends on the nature of the act which is in question in each case.

E 42 The absence of a more precise definition of the expression "public authority" for the purposes of section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 may be contrasted with the way that expression is used in the devolution legislation for Scotland and Northern Ireland. Sections 88–90 of the Scotland Act 1998 deal with what that Act calls "cross-border public authorities". "Scottish public authorities" are dealt with in Part III of Schedule 5. Definitions of these expressions are provided in section 88(5), F which requires "cross-border authorities" to be specified by Order in Council and in section 126(1) which states that "Scottish public authority" means any public body, public office or holder of such an office whose functions are exercisable only in or as regards Scotland. A list of public bodies was appended to the White Paper, Scotland's Parliament (1997) (Cm 3658): see also the note to section 88 of the 1998 Act in Current Law G Statutes. It included three nationalised industries, a group of tribunals, three statutory water authorities, health bodies and a large number of miscellaneous executive and advisory bodies. Sections 75 and 76 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 impose a duty on public authorities to promote equality of opportunity and prohibit discrimination in the carrying out of their functions. The expression "public authority" for the purposes of each of these sections is defined in a way that appears to leave no room for doubt H as to which departments, corporations or other bodies are included: see sections 75(3), 76(7).

43 The Court of Appeal did not explore the significance of the distinction which is drawn in section 6 between "core" and "hybrid" public authorities. In their view the PCC, for the same reasons, fell into either category: p 63D–E, para 35. But the width that can be given to the "hybrid" category suggests that the purpose of the legislation would not be impeded if the scope to be given to the concept of a "core" public authority were to be narrowed considerably from that indicated by the Court of Appeal.

44 There is one vital step that is missing from the Court of Appeal's analysis. It is not mentioned expressly in the Human Rights Act 1998, but it is crucial to a proper understanding of the balance which sections 6 to 9 of the Act seek to strike between the position of public authorities on the one hand and private persons on the other. The purpose of these sections is to provide a remedial structure in domestic law for the rights guaranteed by the Convention. It is the obligation of states which have ratified the Convention to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms which it protects: Young, James and Webster v United Kingdom (1981) 4 EHRR 38, para 49. The source of this obligation is article 13. It was omitted from the articles mentioned in section 1(1) which defines the meaning of the expression "the Convention rights", as the purpose of sections 6 to 9 was to fulfil the obligation which it sets out. But it provides the background against which one must examine the scheme which these sections provide.

45 The principle upon which the scheme proceeds is that actions by public authorities are unlawful if they are in breach of Convention rights: section 6(1). Effect is given to that principle in section 7. It enables anyone who is a victim of an act made unlawful by section 6(1) to obtain a remedy. The extent to which the scheme derives its inspiration from the Convention is revealed by the definition of the word "victim" which is set out in section 7(7). It provides:

> "For the purposes of this section, a person is a victim of an unlawful act only if he would be a victim for the purposes of article 34 of the Convention if proceedings were brought in the European Court of Human Rights in respect of that act."

Article 34 of the Convention is in these terms:

> "The court may receive applications from any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals claiming to be the victim of a violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in the Convention or the protocols thereto. The High Contracting Parties undertake not to hinder in any way the effective exercise of this right."

46 The reference to non-governmental organisations in article 34 provides an important guide as to the nature of those persons who, for the purposes of section 6(1) of the Act and the remedial scheme which flows from it, are to be taken to be public authorities. Non-governmental organisations have the right of individual application to the European Court of Human Rights as victims if their Convention rights have been violated. If the scheme to give effect to article 13 is to be followed through, they must be entitled to obtain a remedy for a violation of their Convention rights under section 7 in respect of acts made unlawful by section 6.

47 The test as to whether a person or body is or is not a "core" public authority for the purposes of section 6(1) is not capable of being defined precisely. But it can at least be said that a distinction should be drawn between those persons who, in Convention terms, are governmental

A organisations on the one hand and those who are non-governmental organisations on the other. A person who would be regarded as a non-governmental organisation within the meaning of article 34 ought not to be regarded as a "core" public authority for the purposes of section 6. That would deprive it of the rights enjoyed by the victims of acts which are incompatible with Convention rights that are made unlawful by section 6(1). B Dawn Oliver, "The Frontiers of the State: Public Authorities and Public Functions under the Human Rights Act" [2000] PL 476, 491–493 has observed that this would have serious implications. It would undermine the protections against state control which are the hallmarks of a liberal democracy.

48 In Rothenthurm Commune v Switzerland (1988) 59 DR 251 the Commission held that local government organisations such as the applicant C commune which exercise public functions are clearly "governmental organisations" as opposed to "non-governmental organisations" within the meaning of article 25 (now article 34) of the Convention, with the result that the commune which was complaining that proceedings for the expropriation of land for a military training area were in breach of their rights under article 6(1) could not bring an application under that article. In D Ayuntamiento de Mula v Spain, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 2000-I, p 53 the European Court held that under the settled case law of the Convention institutions local government organisations are public law bodies which perform official duties assigned to them by the Constitution and by substantive law and are therefore quite clearly governmental organisations. It added this comment:

E "In that connection, the court reiterates that in international law the expression 'governmental organisations' cannot be held to refer only to the Government or the central organs of the State. When powers are distributed along decentralised lines, it refers to any national authority which exercises public functions."

49 The phrase "public functions" in this context is thus clearly linked to F the functions and powers, whether centralised or distributed, of government. This point was developed more fully in Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1. The Government of Greece argued that the applicant monasteries, which were challenging legislation which provided for the transfer of a large part of the monastic property to the Greek state, were not non-governmental organisations within the meaning of article 25 (now 34) of the Convention. It was pointed out that the G monasteries were hierarchically integrated into the organic structure of the Greek Orthodox Church, that legal personality was attributed to the Church and its constituent parts in public law and that the Church and its institutions, which played a direct and active part in public administration, took administrative decisions whose lawfulness was subject to judicial review by the Supreme Administrative court like those of any other public H authority. Rejecting this argument, the court said in para 49:

"Like the Commission in its admissibility decision, the court notes at the outset that the applicant monasteries do not exercise governmental powers. Section 39(1) of the Charter of the Greek Church describes the monasteries as ascetic religious institutions. Their objectives—essentially ecclesiastical and spiritual ones, but also cultural and social ones in some cases—are not such as to enable them to be classed with governmental organisations established for public administration purposes. From the classification as public law entities it may be inferred only that the legislature—on account of the special links between the monasteries and the State—wished to afford them the same legal protection vis-à-vis third parties as was accorded to other public law entities. Furthermore, the monastery councils' only power consists in making rules concerning the organisation and furtherance of spiritual life and the internal administration of each monastery."

50 The phrase "governmental organisations established for public administration purposes" in the third sentence of the passage which I have quoted from the Holy Monasteries case is significant. It indicates that test of whether a person or body is a "non-governmental organisations" within the meaning of article 34 of the Convention is whether it was established with a view to public administration as part of the process of government. That too was the approach which was taken by the Commission in Hautanemi v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR CD 156. At the relevant time the Church of Sweden and its member parishes were to be regarded as corporations of public law in the domestic legal order. It was held nevertheless that the applicant parish was a victim within the meaning of what was then article 25, on the ground that the Church and its member parishes could not be considered to have been exercising governmental powers and the parish was a non-governmental organisation.

51 It can be seen from what was said in these cases that the Convention institutions have developed their own jurisprudence as to the meaning which is to be given to the expression "non-governmental organisation" in article 34. We must take that jurisprudence into account in determining any question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right: Human Rights Act 1998, section 2(1).

52 The Court of Appeal left this jurisprudence out of account. They looked instead for guidance to cases about the amenability of bodies to judicial review, although they recognised that they were not necessarily determinative: p 62D–E, para 34. But, as Professor Oliver has pointed out in her commentary on the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case, "Chancel repairs and the Human Rights Act" [2001] PL 651, the decided cases on the amenability of bodies to judicial review have been made for purposes which have nothing to do with the liability of the state in international law. They cannot be regarded as determinative of a body's membership of the class of "core" public authorities: see also Grosz, Beatson & Duffy, Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000), p 61, para 4-04. Nor can they be regarded as determinative of the question whether a body falls within the "hybrid" class. That is not to say that the case law on judicial review may not provide some assistance as to what does, and what does not, constitute a "function of a public nature" within the meaning of section 6(3)(b). It may well be helpful. But the domestic case law must be examined in the light of the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court as to those bodies which engage the responsibility of the State for the purposes of the Convention.

A 53 At first sight there is a close link between the question whether a person is a non-governmental organisation for the purposes of article 34 and the question whether a person is a public authority against which the doctrine of the direct effect of directives operates under Community law: see article 249 EC. Both concepts lie at the heart of the obligations of the State under international law. Individual applications for a violation of Convention rights may be received under article 34 from "any person, B non-governmental organisation or group of individuals". Direct effect exists only against the member state concerned "and other public authorities": European Coal and Steel Community v Acciaierie e ferriere Busseni SpA (Case C-221/88) [1990] ECR I-495, para 23; Brent, Directives: Rights and Remedies in English and Community Law (2001), para 15.11.

C 54 The types of organisations and bodies against whom the provisions of a directive could be relied on were discussed in Foster v British Gas plc (Case C-188/89) [1991] 1 QB 405. The court noted in para 18 that it had been held in a series of cases that provisions of a directive could be relied on against organisations and bodies which were subject to the authority or control of the state or had special powers beyond those which result from the normal rules applicable to relations between individuals. Reference was D made to a number of its decisions to illustrate this point. Its conclusions were set out in para 20:

> "It follows from the foregoing that a body, whatever its legal form, which has been made responsible, pursuant to a measure adopted by the state, for providing a public service under the control of the state and has for that purpose special powers beyond those which result from the E normal rules applicable in relations between individuals is included in any event among the bodies against which the provisions of a directive capable of having direct effect may be relied upon."

55 This is a broad definition of the concept by which such bodies have come to be referred to as "emanations of the State": e g Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (Case 222/84) [1987] QB 129, F 154, para 56. It has been described as a starting point: Doughty v Rolls-Royce plc [1992] 1 CMLR 1045, 1058, per Mustill LJ. As Brent, para 15.11, note 101, points out, the phrase "emanation of the State" is an English legal concept derived from Gilbert v Corpn of Trinity House (1886) 17 QBD 795 which was later criticised by the courts as inappropriate and undefined. Whatever its value may be in the context of Community law, however, it G would be neither safe nor helpful to use this concept as a shorthand way of describing the test that must be applied to determine whether a person or body is a non-governmental organisation for the purposes of article 34 of the Convention. There is no right of individual application to the European Court of Justice in EC law. The phrase "non-governmental organisation" has an autonomous meaning in Convention law.

H (b) Is the PCC a public authority?

56 The general functions and powers of parochial church councils in the Church of England are set out in the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956. That was a measure passed by the National Assembly of the Church of England under the powers which were conferred on the National Assembly by the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act 1919. The National Assembly was renamed and reconstituted as the General Synod of the Church of England by the Synodical Government Measure 1969. Section 7 of the 1969 Measure provides that the rules contained in Schedule 3, which may be cited as the Church Representation Rules, are to have effect for the purpose of providing for the constitution and proceedings of diocesan and deanery synods and making further provision for the synodical government of the church. Part II of the Church Representation Rules provides for the holding of annual parochial church meetings at which parochial representatives of the laity to the parochial church council and the deanery synod are to take place. Rule 14 sets out the membership of the parochial church council. It includes the clergy, churchwardens, any persons on the roll of the parish who are members of any deanery or diocesan synod or the General Synod, elected representatives of the laity and co-opted members.

57 Section 2(1) of the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956 provides that it shall be the duty of the minister, as defined in rule 44(1) of the Church Representation Rules, and the parochial church council to consult together on matters of general concern and importance to the parish. Section 2(2) states that the functions of parochial church councils shall include, among other things, co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church, pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical and the consideration and discussion of matters concerning the Church of England or any other matters of religious or public interest other than the declaration of the doctrine of the Church on any question. Among the powers, duties and liabilities vested in parochial church councils by section 4 are those relating to the financial affairs of the church and the care, maintenance and preservation of its fabric. Section 2 of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 provides that, where a chancel is in need of repair, proceedings to enforce the liability to repair are to be taken by the responsible authority. Section 4(1) of the Act provides that the expression "responsible authority" in relation to a chancel means the parochial church council of the parish in which the chancel is situate.

58 There is no doubt that parochial church councils are an essential part of the administration, on the authority of the General Synod, of the affairs of the Church of England. The parish itself has been described as the basic building block of the Church and the PCC as the central forum for decision-making and discussion in relation to parish affairs: Hill, Ecclesiastical Law, 2nd ed (2001), pp 48 and 74, paras 3.11 and 3.74. It is constituted by section 3 of the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956 as a body corporate. It has statutory powers which it may exercise under section 2 of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 against any person who appears to it to be liable to repair the chancel, irrespective of whether that person is resident in the parish and is a member of the Church of England. In that context, perhaps, it may be said in a very loose sense to be a public rather than a private body.

59 But none of these characteristics indicate that it is a governmental organisation, as that phrase is understood in the context of article 34 of the Convention. It plainly has nothing whatever to do with the process of either central or local government. It is not accountable to the general public for what it does. It receives no public funding, apart from occasional grants

A from English Heritage for the preservation of its historic buildings. In that respect it is in a position which is no different from that of any private individual. The statutory powers which it has been given by the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 are not exercisable against the public generally or any class or group of persons which forms part of it. The purpose of that Act, as its long title indicates, was to abolish proceedings in ecclesiastical courts for enforcing the liability to repair. The only person against whom the liability B may be enforced is the person who, in that obscure phrase, "would, but for the provisions of this Act, have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court in a cause of office promoted against him in that court on the date when the notice was served": see section 2(3); Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417, 429, per Lord Hanworth MR.

C 60 Then there is the fact that the PCC is part of the Church of England. The Court of Appeal said that it exemplifies the special status of the church of which it forms part: [2002] Ch 51, 61, para 32. The fact that it forms part of the church by law established showed, it was said, that the PCC is a public authority: p 63, para 35. The implication of these observations is that other bodies such as diocesan and deanery synods and the General Synod itself fall into the same category. In my opinion however the legal framework of the D Church of England as a church by law established does not lead to this conclusion.

61 The Church of England as a whole has no legal status or personality. There is no Act of Parliament that purports to establish it as the Church of England: Sir Lewis Dibden, Establishment in England: Essays on Church and State (1932), p 111. What establishment in law means is that the state E has incorporated its law into the law of the realm as a branch of its general law. In Marshall v Graham [1907] 2 KB 112, 126 Phillimore J said:

> "A Church which is established is not thereby made a department of the state. The process of establishment means that the state has accepted the Church as the religious body in its opinion truly teaching the Christian faith, and given to it a certain legal position, and to its decrees, if rendered F under certain legal conditions, certain civil sanctions."

The Church of England is identified with the state in other ways, the monarch being head of each: see Doe, The Legal Framework of the Church of England (1996), p 9. It has regulatory functions within its own sphere, but it cannot be said to be part of government. The state has not surrendered or delegated any of its functions or powers to the Church. None of the G functions that the Church of England performs would have to be performed in its place by the state if the Church were to abdicate its responsibility: see R v Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of Great Britain and the Commonwealth, Ex p Wachmann [1992] 1 WLR 1036, 1042A, per Simon Brown J. The relationship which the state has with the Church of England is one of recognition, not of the devolution to it of any of the H powers or functions of government.

62 The decisions of the Strasbourg Court in Holy Monasteries v Greece 20 EHRR 1 and Hautanemi v Sweden 22 EHRR CD 156 support this approach. It is also worth noting that, while the two main churches in Germany (Roman Catholic and Lutheran) have public legal personality and are public authorities bound by the provisions of article 19(4) of the German

Constitution (Grundgesetz) or Basic Law which guarantees recourse to the court should any person's basic rights be violated by public authority, they are in general considered to be "non-governmental organisations" within the meaning of article 34 of the Convention. As such, they are entitled to avail themselves of, for example, the right to protection of property under article 1 of the First Protocol: Frowein and Peukert, Kommentar zur Europäishen Menschenrechtskonvention, 2nd ed (1996), art 25, para 16. Maunz and Dürig, Kommentar zum Grundgesetz (looseleaf), art 33, para 38 explain the position in this way:

> "Keine hoheitsrechtlichen Befugnisse nehmen die Amtsträger der Kirchen wahr, soweit sie nicht kraft staatlicher Ermächtigung (etwa in Kirchensteurangelegenheiten) tätig werden; die Kirchen sind, auch soweit sie öffentlich-rechtlichen Status haben, nicht Bestandteile der staatlichen Organisation."

[Church officeholders do not exercise sovereign power so long as they are not acting by virtue of state empowerment (for example, in matters concerning church taxes); the churches do not, even though they have public law status, form an integral part of the organisation of the state.] This reflects the view of the German Constitutional Court in its 1965 decision (BVerwGE 18, 385) that measures taken by a church relating to purely internal matters which do not reach out into the sphere of the state do not constitute acts of sovereign power. The churches are not, as we would put it, "core" public authorities although they may be regarded as "hybrid" public authorities for certain purposes.

63 For these reasons I would hold that the PCC is not a "core" public authority. As for the question whether it is a "hybrid" public authority, I would prefer not to deal with it in the abstract. The answer must depend on the facts of each case. The issue with which your Lordships are concerned in this case relates to the functions of the PCC in the enforcement of a liability to effect repairs to the chancel. Section 6(5) of the Human Rights Act 1998 provides that a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3) if the nature of the act which is alleged to be unlawful is private. The Court of Appeal said that the function of chancel repairs is of a public nature: [2002] Ch 51, 63, para 35. But the liability of the lay rector to repair the chancel is a burden which arises as a matter of private law from the ownership of glebe land.

64 It is true, as Wynn-Parry J observed in Chivers & Sons Ltd v Air Ministry [1955] Ch 585, 593, that the burden is imposed for the benefit of the parishioners. It may be said that, as the church is a historic building which is open to the public, it is in the public interest that these repairs should be carried out. It is also true that the liability to repair the chancel rests on persons who need not be members of the church and that there is, as the Court of Appeal observed, at p 63B, para 34, no surviving element of mutuality or mutual governance between the church and the impropriator. But none of these factors leads to the conclusion that the PCC's act in seeking to enforce the lay rector's liability on behalf of the parishioners is a public rather than a private act. The nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce. It is seeking to enforce a civil debt. The function which it is performing has nothing to do with the responsibilities which are owed to the public by the State. I would

A hold that section 6(5) applies, and that in relation to this act the PCC is not for the purposes of section 6(1) a public authority.

The incompatibility issue

65 This issue does not arise if, as I would hold, the PCC is not for present purposes a public authority. But I should like to offer these brief B comments on it, as I do not agree with the Court of Appeal's finding that Mr and Mrs Wallbank's right to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions under article 1 of the First Protocol, read either alone or with article 14 of the Convention, has been violated: [2002] Ch 51, paras 38–46.

66 Article 1 of the First Protocol provides:

> "Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of C his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law. The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions D or penalties."

Article 14 of the Convention prohibits discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms which the Convention sets forth.

67 Article 1 of the First Protocol contains three distinct rules: see Sporrong and Lönnroth v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35, para 61; James v United Kingdom (1986) 8 EHRR 123, para 37. The first rule is set out in the E first sentence, which is of a general nature and enunciates the principle of the peaceful enjoyment of property. It then deals with two forms of interference with a person's possessions by the state: deprivation of possessions which it subjects to certain conditions, and control of the use of property in accordance with the general interest. In each case a balance must be struck between the rights of the individual and the public interest to determine F whether the interference was justified. These rules are not unconnected as, before considering whether the first rule has been complied with, the court must first determine whether the last two rules are applicable. As it was put in James, para 37, the second and third rules are concerned with particular instances of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property. They should be construed in the light of the general principle enunciated in G the first rule.

68 The Court of Appeal appear to have overlooked this guidance. They did not address the question whether Mr and Mrs Wallbank were being deprived of their possessions according to the second rule, and they did not deal with the question whether there was an interference with the first rule. They held that the liability to defray the cost of chancel repairs was levy upon the personal funds of Mr and Mrs Wallbank, that this was a form of H taxation within the third rule in the second paragraph of article 1, and that it was arbitrary and disproportionate. They rejected the PCC's argument the source of the liability was their ownership of Glebe Farm. They held that there was in this case an outside intervention by the general law which made ownership of the land a fiscal liability: para 40.

69 Ferris J said in his judgment that, if the law relating to chancel repairs was as understood it to be (which he described as "the supposed rule"), it did not involve a deprivation of possessions. As he put it, at para 23:

"The argument for Mr and Mrs Wallbank seems to assume that the starting point is that they are to be regarded as the owners of Glebe Farm free from incumbrances or other burdensome incidents attached to the ownership of the land. But this is not in fact correct if the supposed rule represents the law. The liability to repair the chancel is, on that basis, one of the incidents of ownership of that part of Glebe Farm which consists of land allotted under the inclosure award in lieu of tithe or other rectorial property. It is, of course, an unusual incident because it does not amount to a charge on the land, is not limited to the value of the land and imposes a personal liability on the owner of the land. But in principle I do not find it possible to distinguish it from the liability which would attach to the owner of land which is purchased subject to a mortgage, restrictive covenant or other incumbrance created by a predecessor in title."

He said that the case was quite different from that in which there was some kind of outside intervention in the form of taxation, compulsory purchase or control over the way in which the property can be used.

70 I prefer Ferris J's analysis to that of the Court of Appeal. The principle which we must follow was described in James v United Kingdom 8 EHRR 123, para 36. We must confine our attention, as far as possible, to the concrete case which is before us. It must not be directed to the impact of the law relating the enforcement of the chancel repair liability in the abstract, but to its impact as it affects Mr and Mrs Wallbank.

71 How then does the liability arise? It cannot be considered in isolation from the obligation that gives rise to it. That is the obligation which rests on the owner of rectorial land, not as a result any outside intervention with the possession of the land by the state but as a matter of private law. The conveyance of Glebe Farm to Mrs Wallbank's parents in 1970 described the land as subject to the liability for the repair of the chancel mentioned in previous conveyances. Their deeds of gift to Mrs Wallbank in 1974 and 1986 also referred to the chancel repair liability. This is a burden on the land, just like any other burden that runs with the lands. It is, and has been at all times, within the scope of the property right which she acquired and among the various factors to be taken into account in determining its value. She could have divested herself of it at any time by disposing of the land to which it was attached. The enforcement of the liability under the general law is an incident of the property right which is now vested jointly in Mr and Mrs Wallbank. It is not, as the Court of Appeal said (para 40), an outside intervention by way of a form of taxation.

72 I recognise that Mr and Mrs Wallbank may well need to draw on their personal funds to discharge the liability. But they are not being deprived of their possessions or being controlled in the use of their property, as those expressions must be understood in the light of the general principle of peaceful enjoyment set out in the first sentence of article 1 of the First Protocol. The liability is simply an incident of the ownership of the land which gives rise to it. The peaceful enjoyment of land involves the discharge of burdens which are attached to it as well as the enjoyment of its rights and privileges. I do not think that in this case the right which article 1 of the First

A Protocol guarantees, read alone or in conjunction with article 14 of the Convention, is being violated.

Conclusion

73 The law relating to the liability for chancel repairs is open to criticism on various grounds. The liability has been described by the Law B Commission as anachronistic and capricious in its application and as highly anomalous: Liability for Chancel Repairs (1985) (Law Com No 152), para 3.1; Land Registration for the Twenty-first Century (1998) (Law Com No 254; Cm 407), para 5.37. The existence of the liability can be difficult to discover, as most lay rectories have become fragmented over the years as a result of the division and separate disposals of land: Transfer of Land, Liability for Chancel Repairs (1983) (Law Commission Working paper C No 86), para 2.29. The fact that it is a several liability may operate unfairly in cases where there is more than one lay rector and the person who is found liable is unable to recover a contribution from others who ought to have been found liable.

74 On the other hand it was noted in the 1983 Law Commission Working Paper that there were some 5,200 chancels for which there is a D chancel repair liability. Not all of these cases involve individual landowners. About 800 are the liability of the Church Commissioners, 200 the liability of cathedrals and 200 the liability of educational foundations. Charitable donations may provide relief in some cases, while in others grants may be available from English Heritage. But there is no other source of private funding that can be relied upon, and there is no right of access to public E funds. Unsatisfactory though the system may appear to be, there is no obvious alternative. Ferris J recognised, in para 18 of his judgment, that the law relating to chancel repairs is capable of operating arbitrarily, harshly and unfairly. But he did not find any basis for declaring the law to be otherwise than it appeared to be on the authorities.

75 It is not open to us to resolve these problems judicially. All one can say is that the Human Rights Act 1998 does not provide a vehicle for doing F so. I would allow the appeal and restore the order and determination made by Ferris J.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH

76 My Lords, it is admitted by the defendants that, apart from the Human Rights Act 1998, they are, as the joint owners of Glebe Farm, Aston G Cantlow, and have been at all material times personally responsible for the repair of the chancel of the church of St John the Baptist Aston Cantlow and that, they having failed to repair the chancel, the Parochial Church Council ("PCC") is entitled to a judgment against them under section 2(3) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 for such sum as represents the cost of putting the chancel into a proper state of repair. This is because the defendants, Mr and Mrs Wallbank, being liable to repair the chancel, would, but for the H 1932 Act, have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by an ecclesiastical court. The obligation of the defendants is the obligation to repair. Under the 1932 Act the remedy of an order that the obligation be performed is no longer to be available and the monetary remedy is provided in lieu but the character of the obligation was left unchanged.

77 The obligation to repair is one which derives from the ownership of land to which the obligation is attached. The obligation runs with the land. The 15th and 16th century origins of this are helpfully explained in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote. In the present case the obligation arose not from the receipt of tithes but as a result of an enclosure award of 1743 made under the private Act of Parliament of 1742 (15 Geo 2, c 42). It is a personal obligation but only exists so long as the person in question is the owner of the land. Thus he acquires it by a voluntary act—the acquisition of the title to the land of which the obligation is an incident. He can divest himself of the obligation by a further voluntary act—the disposal of the land or, under section 52 of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Measure 1923, by redemption. At all the times material to this case, the obligation was categorised by section 70 of the Land Registration Act 1925 as an overriding interest. The person or persons who are under such an obligation are described, using the historical terminology, as the "lay rectors" or the "lay impropriators".

78 In fact the defendants knew that ownership of the land was believed to carry with it the obligation. It was referred to in all the title deeds and, in at least one conveyance, an express indemnity had been taken by the vendor. In other cases some special consideration might arise from the fact that the relevant landowner had acquired the title to the land without any notice of the existence, or possible existence, of the obligation. But that is not this case and it need not be discussed further.

79 The only defence now raised by the defendants to the claim of the PCC under the 1932 Act is based upon the Human Rights Act 1998 and/or the Convention. The 1998 Act had not come into force at the time when the defendants failed to carry out the relevant repairs, nor when the PCC served the notice required by section 2(1) of the 1932 Act, nor at the time when Ferris J tried the case and gave judgment for the PCC. He was formally trying two preliminary issues ordered by Master Bragge but, when he decided the human rights issue against the defendants, the defendants, having abandoned their case on the other issue, admitted that they had no defence to the claim except as to quantum. He accordingly made a declaration of liability, ordered an inquiry as to quantum and ordered the defendants to pay to the claimants the sum found due on the inquiry. The question of quantum arose under section 2(3) of the 1932 Act: "[the] court . . . shall give judgment . . . for such sum as appears to the court to represent the cost of putting the chancel in proper repair". The points which the defendants were taking on quantum were pleaded in paragraph 1 of the outline defence. The judgment of Ferris J was in English procedural law a final judgment. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal. By the time that the defendants' appeal was heard, the 1998 Act had however come into force.

80 This timetable raises again the question of the extent to which the Act has a retrospective effect, a question on which the Court of Appeal did not express an opinion since no point was taken in that regard by the PCC. Your Lordships were not satisfied that this was necessarily correct; however it was clearly convenient and in the interest of both of the parties that the House should first hear the parties' arguments upon the points which the Court of Appeal did decide. I stress that the House have not heard any argument upon the question of the extent, if at all, to which the Act has

A retrospective effect. It is not appropriate that any view should be expressed on it in the present case. Anything said will not be authoritative. The retrospectivity point will arise for decision in other unrelated appeals and will then fall to be decided after full argument and due consideration. It is in any event not correct to approach that question on the basis that the judgment of Ferris J was undeterminative or merely interlocutory. In English procedural law, it was a final judgment which, unless reversed on appeal, B determined the parties' rights and liabilities, subject only to quantum. I will accordingly proceed on the basis of assuming that the Human Rights Act 1998 applies to this case in accordance with the provisions of sections 22(4), 7(1)(b) and 6.

81 The structure of the defendants' argument under the Human Rights Act 1998 is that they have to establish three propositions. If they fail on any C one of these, their defence fails. They are: (a) that the PCC is a public authority, the sections 6(1), (3) and (5) point, and (b) that there has been a breach of article 1 of the First Protocol, the article 1 and article 14 point, and (c) that the exclusion in section 6(2) does not apply. Before Ferris J only point (b) arose and he decided it in favour of the claimants. In the Court of Appeal all three points were decided in favour of the defendants.

82 These were the questions of law raised on this appeal. They are D questions which are of relevance not only to the present case but to many other cases or potential cases concerning the enforcement under the 1932 Act of the obligation to repair chancels. Other cases may, on their facts, raise special considerations not found in this case and, similarly, legal questions not dependent upon the Human Rights Act 1998 may arise. Your Lordships' decision on this appeal does not touch upon any of them. But E I must expressly disassociate myself from any suggestion that there is a cap upon the monetary liability under section 2(3) of the 1932 Act or that any such point is presently open to the defendants upon the inquiry ordered by Ferris J as discussed in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote, which I have had the privilege of reading in draft after I had prepared this opinion, together with his questioning of the correctness of the decision in Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] F 2 KB 417. The question was neither raised nor argued. There are contentious points which will arise if it ever is. Does the cap apply where the express words of the 1932 Act are applicable? How does it apply to successive or continuing and cumulative breaches of the obligation to repair? Does the cap apply where the liability is not attributable to the ownership of a tithe rentcharge but simply to the ownership of land? If so, G how does one assess what the cap should be? It is by no means clear that any of these questions should be answered in a way that could assist the defendants. But they have not been argued and I will say no more about them.

Is the PCC a public authority?

83 Historically parochial church councils did not exist. They were H introduced by the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1921 as a body at parish level which would better enable the lay members of the congregation to be represented. It was agreed that at the material times the powers and functions of PCCs were defined by the Parochial Church Council (Powers) Measure 1956. Section 2 (as amended) provided:

"General Functions of Council

"(1) It shall be the duty of the minister and the [PCC] to consult together on matters of general concern and importance to the parish.

"(2) The functions of [PCCs] shall include—(a) cooperation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church, pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical; (b) the consideration and discussions of matters concerning the Church of England or any other matters of religious or public interest, but not the declaration of the doctrine of the Church on any question; (c) making known and putting into effect any provision made by the diocesan synod or the deanery synod, but without prejudice to the powers of the council on any particular matter; (d) giving advice to the diocesan synod and deanery synod on any matter referred to the council; (e) raising such matters as the council consider appropriate with the diocesan synod or deanery synod.

"(3) In the exercise of its functions the [PCC] shall take into consideration any expression of opinion by any parochial church meeting."

Section 3 provided that the PCC was to be a body corporate with perpetual succession. Section 4 made provision for the PCC as successor to certain other bodies to have the relevant powers of those bodies:

"(1) . . . the council of every parish shall have . . . (ii) the like powers duties and liabilities as, immediately before [1 July 1921], the churchwardens of such parish had with respect to—(a) The financial affairs of the church including the collection and administration of all moneys raised for church purposes and the keeping of accounts in relation to such affairs and moneys; (b) The care, maintenance, preservation and insurance of the fabric of the church and the goods and ornaments thereof; (c) The care and maintenance of any churchyard (open or closed) and the power of giving a certificate under the provisions of section 18 of the Burial Act 1855 with the like powers as, immediately before [1 July 1921] were possessed by the churchwardens to recover the cost of maintaining a closed churchyard . . ."

Of these powers, the most relevant to the present case are those in section 4(1)(ii)(b) but it is important to note that these are only those powers and duties which the churchwardens had and that the churchwardens did not have a duty to repair the fabric but only a duty to report its disrepair. As stated by Richard Burn Ch in his work Burn on Ecclesiastical Law, 9th ed (1842), edited by Robert Phillimore, vol 1, p 357,

"And although churchwardens are not charged with the repairs of the chancel, yet they are charged with the supervisal thereof, to see that it be not permitted to dilapidate and fall into decay; and when any such dilapidations shall happen, if no care be taken to repair the same, they are to make presentation thereof at the next visitation."

It was no doubt following this logic that the PCC were given the power (and correlative duty) in 1932 to bring the action to obtain a remedy for the failure of a lay rector to repair the chancel. (The changes later introduced by section 39 of the Endowments and Glebe Measure 1976 relating to incumbents of a benefice are not relevant to this case.)

A 84 The PCC is thus the creature of a statutory provision by what was then the National Assembly of the Church of England. It has only those functions, duties and powers which have been conferred on it by that or other legislation. It is part of the structure known as the Church of England but the Church of England is not itself a legal entity. The legal entities are the various office-holders and various distinct bodies set up within that structure.

B 85 The Human Rights Act 1998 and section 6 do not contain any complete or general definition of the term "a public authority". Section 6 does however contain a secondary definition in subsections (3)(b) and (5) as including, in respect of acts which are not of a private nature, persons (or bodies) certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature. This secondary category has been described as "hybrid" public authorities. It C requires a two-fold assessment, first of the body's functions, and secondly of the particular act in question. The body must be one of which at least some, but not all, of its functions are of a public nature. This leaves what by inference from subsection (3)(b) is the primary category, i e, a person or body all of whose functions are of a public nature. This category has conveniently been called by the commentators a "core" public authority. For this D category, there is no second requirement; the section potentially applies to everything that they do regardless of whether it is an act of a private or public nature.

86 Is a PCC a "core" public authority? The answer I would give to this question is that it is clearly not. Its functions, as identified above from the relevant statutory provisions, clearly include matters which are concerned only with the pastoral and organisational concerns of the diocese and the E congregation of believers in the parish. It acts in the sectional not the public interest. The most that can be said is that it is a creature of a church measure having the force of a statute—but that is not suggested to be conclusive—and that some aspects of the Church of England which is the "established church" are of wider general interest and not of importance to the congregation alone. Thus the priest ministering in the parish may have F responsibilities that are certainly not public, such as the supervision of the liturgies used or advising about doctrine, but may have other responsibilities which are of a public nature, such as a responsibility for marriages and burials and the keeping of registers. But the PCC itself does not have such public responsibilities nor are its functions public; it is essentially a domestic religious body. The fact that the Church of England is the established church of England may mean that various bodies within G that Church may as a result perform public functions. But it does not follow that PCCs themselves perform any such functions. Even the monasteries of the established church in Greece, which has strong legal links with the state, such as the presence of representatives of the state on its governing body and direct financial links with the state, has been held not to be an emanation of the state for the purposes of the Convention: Holy Monasteries v Greece 20 EHRR 1.

H 87 The Court of Appeal reached a different conclusion. I do not find their reasoning satisfactory. Neither parliamentary material nor references to the law of judicial review assist on this question. The relevant underlying principles are to be found in human rights law not in Community law nor in the administrative law of England and Wales. The Strasbourg jurisprudence has already been deployed in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Hope of Craighead, and I need not repeat it. The relevant concept is the opposition of the "victim" and a "governmental body". The former can make a complaint; the latter can only be the object of a complaint. The difference between them is that the latter has a governmental character and discharges governmental functions. If there is a need to find additional assistance in construing section 6 of the Act, this is where it is to be found. The structure of the Act also supports the same conclusion. It is through section 7 and its reference to victims in section 7(1) and (7) that one gets from section 22(4) to section 6(1). Section 7 is drafted having regard to the Strasbourg jurisprudence; it would be inconsistent to construe section 6 in a manner opposed to that jurisprudence. The Court of Appeal's approach cannot be supported.

88 In my opinion it has not been established that PCCs in general nor this PCC in particular perform any function of a public or governmental nature. If it is to be said that they do, I am unaware what specifically it can be said is that function. The Court of Appeal (in paragraph 34) said that the recovery of money under section 2 of the 1932 Act was the function which made the PCC a public authority. This is to be contrasted with the statement in paragraph 37 that the "power and, no doubt duty" to do so is a "common law" power. The nature of the person's functions are not to be confused with the nature of the act complained of, as section 6 makes clear. But in neither case are they governmental in nature nor is the body itself inherently governmental. It follows that in my opinion the PCC was neither a "core" nor a "hybrid" public authority. On that basis the defence of Mr and Mrs Wallbank must fail.

89 But, if I am wrong, and the PCC was a "hybrid" public authority, the further question arises under section 6(5): Is the nature of the relevant act private? The act is the enforcement of a civil liability. The liability is one which arises under private law and which is enforceable by the PCC as a civil debt by virtue of the 1932 Act. The 1932 did not alter the preexisting law as to the obligations of lay impropriators. It is simply remedial (as the Court of Appeal recognised in paragraph 37). Its purpose is to enable repairs to be done which the lay rector ought to have, but has not, himself carried out. It is argued that it is akin to a power of taxation. Whether or not it was once true in the 16th century that such a power existed, it was certainly not true in the 20th century. Whatever the former obligations of lay impropriators may once have been, by the 18th century they were or had been converted into civil obligations. In the present case this occurred in 1743 as a result of an enclosure award made under a private Act of Parliament of 1742 entitled An Act for Dividing and Inclosing, Setting out and Allotting, certain Common Fields and Inclosures within the Manor and Parish of Aston Cantlow, in the County of Warwick (15 Geo 2, c 42). In return for financial and proprietorial advantages then conferred upon them, the impropriators accepted the obligation to repair the chancel as and when the need arose. That is the private law obligation which is being enforced in the present action using the remedy provided in the 1932 Act.

90 The 1932 Act is irrelevant unless and until the lay impropriator fails to perform his obligation to repair the chancel, a failure which may have occurred on a single occasion or may, as in the present case, have been a continuing and cumulative failure over a long period of time. The

A responsibility for repairing the chancel was since 1743 an incident of the ownership of certain particular parcels of land. When Mr and Mrs Wallbank acquired the title to that land they assumed that responsibility to repair and the consequent liability in default if they should fail to discharge it. This was not a responsibility and liability which they shared with the public in general; it was something which they had personally assumed voluntarily by a voluntary act of acquisition which at the time they apparently thought was B advantageous to them. From the point of view of both the PCC and the Wallbanks, the transaction and its incident were private law, non-governmental, non-public activities and not of a public nature. Again, this conclusion is adverse to the Wallbanks' defence.

Has there been a breach of article 1 (and article 14)?

C 91 Article 14 (discrimination) is not a freestanding provision but has to be read in conjunction with the recognition of the rights conferred by other articles. Therefore the material article is article 1 of the First Protocol which endorses the entitlement to the peaceful enjoyment of a person's possessions and prohibits depriving a person of his possessions, subject to certain qualifications. The word "possessions" has been considered by the D European Court of Human Rights, in particular in the cases of Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 and Sporrong and Lönnroth v Sweden 5 EHRR 35. It applies to all forms of property and is the equivalent of "assets". But what is clear is that it does not extend to grant relief from liabilities incurred in accordance with the civil law. It may be that there are cases where the liability is merely a pretext or mechanism for depriving someone of their E possessions by expropriation but that is not the case here. The liability is a private law liability which has arisen from the voluntary acts of the persons liable. They have no Convention right to be relieved of that liability. Nor do they have a Convention right to be relieved from the consequences of a bargain made, albeit some 200 years earlier, by their predecessors in title. They do not make any complaint under article 6 or complain about the fairness of these legal proceedings. They cannot complain that they are F being discriminated against. The only reason why they are being sued is because they are the parties liable. This defence also fails. The submission that there should be a declaration of incompatibility likewise fails.

92 For the sake of completeness, it was clear that at all material times both they and their predecessors in title knew of the responsibility to repair or at least that it was asserted that they would be responsible if they acquired G the title to the relevant land, an assertion which they have now admitted to be correct subject only to the Human Rights Act 1998. Further, they originally ran a case of waiver by the PCC which they have now accepted was rightly rejected. If they had had a legal defence it would have been recognised by the court and the action would have been dismissed. Their financial liability under the 1932 Act is not arbitrary. It arises from their failure to perform a civil private law obligation which they had voluntarily assumed.

The section 6(2) point

93 This point would only arise if I was wrong on all the preceding points. One therefore has to assume that the PCC is a public authority and the demand for payment is not of a private nature. In such circumstances, subsection (2) creates an exception to the application of subsection (1). The words of exception relevant to this case are "the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce" provisions of primary legislation. The primary legislation is the 1932 Act. Incontrovertibly the PCC were seeking to give effect to and enforce provisions of that Act. On the above-stated assumption, the PCC's act in suing the Wallbanks comes squarely within the exception. Paragraph (b) of the subsection is to be contrasted with paragraph (a) which is manifestly intended to cover cases where the public authority did not have any alternative but to act as it did (i e it was compelled to do so). Paragraph (b), on the other hand, covers situations where the public authority was empowered by legislation to act as it did and the intention of the legislation, whilst leaving open a measure of discretion, was that it should use the power provided. For some unstated reason, the Court of Appeal treated only paragraph (a) as being relevant and this accounts for their mistaken decision on this point.

Conclusion

94 It follows that, far from making out all three of the necessary constituents in their defence, the defendants have made out none. Their defence accordingly fails and the appeal must be allowed. There is no need to consider the retrospectivity question.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

Introduction

95 My Lords, the respondents, Mr and Mrs Wallbank, are the freehold owners of Glebe Farm, Aston Cantlow in Warwickshire. Glebe Farm, which consists of a farmhouse and about 179 acres of land, includes five fields amounting to just over 52 acres known, or formerly known, as Clanacre. The Clanacre fields, it is contended, were and remain rectorial property thereby constituting its owners for the time being lay rectors and subjecting them to the liability of paying for all and any necessary repairs to the chancel of St John the Baptist church, the parish church of Aston Cantlow.

96 The appellants, the parochial church council of Aston Cantlow are responsible for supervising the care, maintenance, preservation and insurance of the fabric of the church (see section 4(1)(ii)(b) of the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1956) and have served notices on Mr and Mrs Wallbank requiring them to put the chancel in proper repair. The notices were served on 12 September 1994 and 23 January 1996 pursuant to section 2 of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932. The cost of the necessary repairs is put in the notices at £95,260-odd. Mr and Mrs Wallbank dispute their liability. This litigation has resulted.

The law on chancel repairs

97 A description, even a brief one, of the law on chancel repairs must, if it is to be comprehensible, start with mediaeval times when every parish had its parish priest, the "rector". The rector had, by virtue of his office, a number of valuable proprietary rights which, collectively, constituted his "rectory". These rights included the profits of glebe land and tithes, usually one-tenth of the produce of land in the parish. Responsibility for the repair

A of the parish church was, absent some special custom to the contrary (see Bishop of Ely v Gibbons (1833) 4 Hagg Ecc 156), shared between the rector and the parishioners. The parishioners were responsible for repairing the part of the church where they sat, the western end of the church. The rector was responsible for repairing the chancel, the eastern end of the church. The rector's glebe land and tithes, the "rectory", provided both for his maintenance and a fund from which he could pay for chancel repairs.

B 98 The right of appointment to a rectory, the advowson, was an item of property transferable by conveyance and often in the hands of a lay person, typically the landowner who had built and endowed the church or his successors. But the appointee had to be a spiritual rector and, on appointment, would become entitled to the rectorial rights and subject to the chancel repair liability.

C 99 In the 300 years or so prior to the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII a great number of advowsons were acquired by monasteries. A monastery, having acquired an advowson, would almost invariably appoint itself the rector and thereby appropriate to itself the valuable rectorial rights, the rectory. It would, of course, be a spiritual rector. The parish would, however, need a parish priest. So the monastery would appoint a deputy, a vicar, to fulfil that role, usually allocating to the D vicar some part of the rectorial tithes or glebe. It seems, interestingly, never to have been suggested that the vicar, by virtue of the allocation to him of some part of the rectory thereby became liable for chancel repairs. Vicarial tithes or vicarial glebe did not carry that liability which remained with the rector.

100 On the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII the E property of religious houses, including their advowsons and the rectories they had appropriated, were compulsorily sold, impropriated, to lay institutions, such as Oxford and Cambridge colleges, and individuals. The lay institutions and individuals who acquired the rectories became lay rectors, or lay impropriators (the terms are synonymous) and, as such, subject to the chancel repair liability. The lay rector may have, and usually had, also acquired the advowson and thereby become the patron and F entitled to appoint the vicar of the parish. A vicar, thus appointed, was no longer a deputy but held office in his own right. The obligation to repair the chancel lay on the lay rector in that capacity and not as owner of the advowson.

101 The proprietary rights acquired by lay rectors would have included the rectorial glebe and the rectorial tithes. These rights could be alienated G and divided up. Many rectorial tithes were extinguished under Inclosure Awards made pursuant to Inclosure Acts. Under these Awards plots forming part of the common lands to be enclosed were allotted to lay rectors in lieu of their rectorial tithes. It is generally assumed that the allotted lands then took the place of the tithes as the lay rector's rectorial property (see para 2.11 of the Law Commission's Working Paper No 86 Transfer of land. Liability for Chancel Repairs (1983).

H 102 Tithes, other than those extinguished under Inclosure Awards, were converted into tithe rentcharges under the Tithe Act 1836 (6 & 7 Will 4, c 71). Tithe rentcharges, unlike their predecessor tithes, were charged on the land in respect of which the tithe had been payable and attracted the same chancel repair liability as had been attracted by the predecessor tithes—see section 71 of the 1836 Act which subjected the rentcharges to "the same liabilities and incidents as the like estate in the tithes commuted". Over the next 100 years various further statutory changes were made until, finally, the Tithe Act 1936 abolished tithe rentcharges and replaced them with tithe redemption annuities. The annuities were payable to the Government and the owners of the rentcharges received Government stock in compensation for the extinction of their rights.

103 Section 31 of the 1936 Act and Schedule 7 to the Act dealt specifically with chancel repairs. As to liability for chancel repair arising from the ownership of tithe rentcharges (evidently on the footing that the tithe rentcharge had taken the place of the tithes as rectorial property) a part of the Government stock to be issued in respect of that rentcharge was to go to the diocesan authority to provide for the cost of future repairs to the chancel and the cost of insuring against damage by fire (section 31(2)). Subsections (3) and (4) of section 31 merit mention. They provided, in conjunction with section 21 of the 1936 Act and section 1 of the Tithe Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict c 62), that where the tithe rentcharge and the land on which it was charged were in the same ownership, the rentcharge would be treated as abolished by merger but the land would be subject to the chancel repair liability "to the extent of the value of . . . the rentcharge" (section 1 of the 1839 Act). The chancel repair liability of the lay rector became thereby limited to the value of the rectorial property, the rentcharge, from which his office of lay rector was derived.

104 It is clear that a lay rectorship and liability for chancel repair could attach to a person who had become owner of a part only of the rectorial property. That that is so is implicit in the decision of this House in Representative Body of the Church in Wales v Tithe Redemption Commission [1944] AC 228, the "Welsh Commissioners" case. The issue, which arose out of the disestablishment in 1914 of the Welsh Church, was whether tithe rentcharges which, until abolished by the 1936 Act, had become temporally vested in the Commissioner of Church Temporalties in Wales (the Welsh Commissioners) pending their transfer to the University of Wales under provisions in the Welsh Churches Acts 1914 and 1919 had, while so vested, subjected the Welsh Commissioners to chancel repair liability. If the answer was "Yes", Government stock needed to be issued to the appropriate Welsh authority pursuant to the Tithe Act 1936. Their Lordships held that the Welsh Commissioners, so long as they held the tithe rentcharges, were lay impropriators and accordingly under a chancel repair liability. The issue, which applied to a number of parishes in Wales, was examined by reference to a particular parish, Llantwit Major in Glamorgan. Tithe rentcharges valued at £481 7s 11d, representing rectorial property of the parish, were held by the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. Other tithe rentcharges, valued at £64 4s 2d and also representing rectorial property of the parish were held by a limited company, Plymouth Estates Ltd. Viscount Simon LC said, at p 239, that "Plymouth Estates Ltd . . . plainly and admittedly remain liable for chancel repair". He described the obligation of a rector to repair the chancel as "an obligation imposed by common law": p 240 and see also Lord Wright, at p 247. Lord Porter expressed himself to the same effect. He said, at p 249, "Prima facie, therefore, if the tithe rentcharge gets into the hands of a lay impropriator at anytime it is held

A subject to the liability to repair" and at p 250 that "impropriation exists where the property is in lay hands . . ."

105 But although it must now be regarded as settled law that an individual who becomes the owner of rectorial property of a parish becomes liable for chancel repair, there remain subsidiary issues which, in my opinion, are not settled. For example, the extent of the liability is not settled. Is the liability limited to the value of the rectorial profits the B ownership of which has attracted the office of lay rector and the consequent chancel repair liability or is it unlimited in amount? I have already referred to the effect of section 31(3) and (4) of the Tithe Act 1936 whereby, by reference to section 21 of the 1936 Act and section 1 of the Tithe Act 1839, the chancel repair liability of a lay rector attributable to his ownership of a tithe rentcharge which had merged in the land on which it C was charged was limited to the value of the rentcharge. In Walwyn v Awberry (1677) 2 Mod 254 a lay rector brought an action for trespass because the local bishop had sequestered his tithes on account of his failure to obey an admonition to repair the chancel of the parish church. The issue was whether sequestration was an available remedy. It was held that it was not. Atkins J, at p 258 who disagreed on the sequestration point, said that "it was agreed by all, that an impropriator is chargeable with the repairs of D the chancel; but the charge was not personal but in regard of the profits of the impropriation . . ." This suggests that the liability is limited to the amount of the profits. A similar suggestion appears in the Report of the Chancel Repairs Committee presented by the Lord Chancellor to Parliament in May 1930 (Cmd 3571). The chancel repair liability was described in para 4(a) as "an obligation imposed by the Common Law of E England, which annexes to the ownership of the rectory the duty of the rector to maintain the chancel of the church out of the profits of the rectory." (Emphasis added.) As to the position where the rectorial property has passed to several owners, the paragraph said "every several owner is, to the extent of the profits derived by him from his piece of the property, under the duty of maintaining the chancel." (Emphasis added.)

F 106 In Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417, however, the Court of Appeal decided otherwise. The defendants were lay rectors of the parish of Wickhambrook by virtue of ownership of rentcharge of £39 11s 9d per year, a subdivided part of a tithe rentcharge of £120 per year. The cost of the necessary chancel repairs was estimated to be £123 12s 6d. It was this sum that the PCC sought to recover from the defendants. It was proved at trial that the total sum actually received by the G defendants from their ownership of the rentcharge was £50-odd. The trial judge, relying on passages in Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law 2nd ed (1895), held that it was necessary to prove that the impropriator had received tithes or other profits belonging to the rectory sufficient to cover the cost of repair (p 423) and, accordingly, that the PCC's claim failed. He was reversed on appeal. Lord Hanworth MR after examining various reports of Walwyn v Awberry expressed the view that the case was an unsatisfactory authority on H which to found a limitation of a lay rector's chancel repair liability (p 437) and concluded that "the liability of a lay impropriator is personal, and is not limited to the amount of the receipts from the tithe". But he held that the defendants had a right of contribution from other owners of parts of the tithe rentcharge. Romer LJ agreed with Lord Hanworth MR, as too did

Eve J who added that "the result . . . does not appear to me to be reasonable or just". A

107 In the "Welsh Commissioners" case [1944] AC 228, 239, Viscount Simon LC, having referred to the chancel repair liability of Plymouth Estates Ltd, said that "It is not necessary for the purposes of the present appeal to discuss the difficult question of the extent of their possible responsibility, or whether Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford was rightly decided." B

108 Counsel before your Lordships have not argued whether the Wickhambrook case was or was not rightly decided. But if Mr and Mrs Wallbank are liable as lay rectors, the question whether their liability should be limited to the profits they have received from the rectorial property may be open to them. The point is certainly still open in this House. C

109 A further point of law that cannot, in my opinion, yet be regarded as settled is whether each and every alienation by a lay rector of impropriatorial assets of the rectory necessarily makes the alienee a co lay rector and liable for chancel repairs. The point arose in Chivers & Sons Ltd v Air Ministry [1955] Ch 585, 594 where Wynn-Parry J held that the liability to repair the chancel "is not a charge on the rectorial property, but a personal liability imposed on the owner or owners for the time being of the rectorial property". and that "If there is more than one owner, each is severally liable". For reasons which will appear, this is not a point which can have any bearing on the present case but, none the less, the conclusion to which the judge came may be open to question. Is it really the case that on every disposition of any part of former rectorial property, no matter how small and no matter what may be the intentions of the parties, express or implied, regarding the assumption by the transferee of chancel repair liabilities, the transferee becomes willy-nilly by dint of inflexible legal principle a lay impropriator liable to chancel repairs? I doubt it. D E

The conveyancing history of Clanacre

110 At the time of the Inclosure Act 1742 and the Award of 1743, under which the common lands of Aston Cantlow were enclosed, Lord Brooke was the lay impropriator of the rectory of the parish church of Aston Cantlow. A recital to the Act so states. It appears from another recital to the Act that Lord Brooke was the owner of tithes and it appears from the terms of the Award that the impropriated property included glebe land. F

111 Under the Award Lord Brooke was allotted Clanacre. It was described as "one plot lying in Aston Cantlow . . . called Clanacre combining (containing) . . . 52 acres two roods and 21 perches". Details of its boundaries were given so that there could be no doubt as to the identity of what had been allotted. G

112 It is unclear from the extract of the Award contained in the papers before your Lordships on account of what rectorial rights Clanacre was allotted. It may have been allotted on account of Lord Brooke's tithes or it may have been allotted on account of glebe comprised in the common lands that were being enclosed. But it is not in dispute that one way or another Clanacre became, by substitution, rectorial property. Certainly all Lord Brooke's tithes over the common lands were extinguished by the Act and the Award. H

113 At some time between 1743 and 1875 Lord Brooke, or his successors, sold Clanacre together with the rest of what later became Glebe Farm. Whether the sale was of all Lord Brooke's impropriated property or of only part of it is not apparent from the papers in evidence in the case.

114 The first readable conveyance dealing with Clanacre is a conveyance of 21 October 1918 under which the vendor, Thomas Wood, conveyed to two purchasers, both with the surname Terry, Glebe Farm and its 179 odd acres including the 52-odd Clanacre acres. The habendum to the Conveyance says that the purchasers were to hold the land "in fee simple in equal shares as tenants in common subject primarily and in priority to the other hereditaments charged therewith to the repairs of the Chancel of Aston Church". The "subject to" provision indicates the strong likelihood that the vendor, Thomas Wood, who must have been a lay impropriator, was selling part of the rectorial property but retaining other parts. It seems to me unlikely, given the content of this provision, that Mr and Mrs Wallbank could succeed in claiming from Thomas Wood or his successors a contribution towards any chancel repairing liability that rests on them by virtue of their ownership of Clanacre.

115 In 1970 Mr and Mrs Coulton, Mrs Wallbank's parents, purchased Glebe Farm and the 179 acres from Herbert Terry & Sons Ltd, no doubt the successors of the 1918 Terry purchasers. Clause 2 of the Conveyance to the Coultons said that the property was conveyed "subject to the liability for the repair of the Chancel of Aston Church . . . so far as the same affects the property hereby conveyed and is still subsisting and capable of being enforced". And under two deeds of gift dated respectively 21 March 1974 and 1 May 1986 Glebe Farm and the bulk of the 179 acres, including all the Clanacre fields, were conveyed to Mrs Wallbank by her parents. Mrs Wallbank later placed the property in the joint names of herself and her husband.

116 It is plain from this conveyancing history that Mr and Mrs Wallbank acquired Glebe Farm, including Clanacre, with the knowledge that ownership might carry with it a liability to pay for repairs to the chancel of the parish church.

The Chancel Repairs Act 1932

117 The Chancel Repairs Act 1932 was passed in consequence of the inadequacies of enforcement procedure revealed by litigation between Hauxton PCC and a Mr Stevens. Pre 1932 the enforcement of chancel repair liability was primarily a matter for ecclesiastical courts. Proceedings for the issue of an admonition requiring the alleged lay rector to carry out the repairs had to be issued in the consistory court. It had been established by dicta in, if not by the ratio of, Walwyn v Awberry 2 Mod 254 that ordinary civil law enforcement procedures were not available. If the consistory court issued the admonition and it was not obeyed, the next step would be either a decree of excommunication or a transfer of the proceedings to the High Court in order for proceedings for committal for contempt of court to be brought, or both. The unfortunate Mr Stevens, having unsuccessfully disputed his liability, ignored the admonition issued by the consistory court. He ended up in prison for contempt under a committal order made in the King's Bench Division. He obtained his release only on undertaking to carry out the requisite repairs.

118 Such a disproportionate remedy was obviously unsatisfactory and section 2 of the 1932 Act authorised PCCs to serve notices to repair on individuals alleged to be liable for chancel repairs. If such a notice is not complied with, the PCC can commence proceedings in the ordinary courts to recover the sum required to put the chancel in proper repair. The court, if satisfied that the defendant would, but for the 1932 Act, "have been liable to be admonished to repair the chancel by the appropriate ecclesiastical court", can give judgment against the defendant for the sum representing the cost of the necessary repairs. The judgment would be enforceable like any other money judgment. Hence the notices served by the PCC on Mr and Mrs Wallbank and the litigation that followed Mr and Mrs Wallbank's denial of liability.

The litigation

119 The pleadings in the case confirmed that there was a dispute as to Mr and Mrs Wallbank's liability to bear the cost of the chancel repairs. On 29 September 1999 the case came before Master Bragge on what I take to have been a summons for directions. On this summons Master Bragge directed that two preliminary issues be tried. Each related to contentions by Mr and Mrs Wallbank as to why they were not liable. One of these contentions was abandoned at trial. The other is the issue that has found its way to your Lordships' House. But before reciting its terms it is important to notice an important concession made by Mr Wallbank, who appeared in person, and on the basis of which the master directed the trial of the preliminary issues. The concession is recorded in the order in the following terms:

> "And upon the second defendant on his own behalf and on that of the first defendant stating that he agreed and accepted that the defendants (and each of them) as the joint freeholders of Glebe Farm Aston Cantlow Warwickshire are and at all material times have been the lay rector and are personally liable for the repair of the chancel of the church of St John the Baptist Aston Cantlow Warwickshire ('the church') if and to the extent that the liability is enforceable and/or exists by reason of the preliminary issues particularised below."

This concession very greatly reduced the number of issues relating to chancel repair liability that Mr and Mrs Wallbank could raise.

120 The preliminary issue that was, and is, persisted in was subsequently amended and in its amended form is as follows:

> "Whether having regard to the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights, a co-rector is liable to repair the chancel of the church or otherwise to meet the costs of the said repairs by reason of the provisions of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932 and the common law."

121 The preliminary issue was tried before Ferris J. It was tried after the Human Rights Act 1998 had been passed but before 2 October 2000, the date on which the Act was to come into effect. In paragraph 9 of his judgment Ferris J described the argument addressed to him by counsel for Mr and Mrs Wallbank as having two main elements, namely,

A "(i) that English law is not yet settled in deciding that a lay rector is liable for chancel repairs, at any rate where the rectorial property owned by that lay rector consists of part only of a larger parcel of land allotted under an inclosure award in lieu of tithes or other rectorial property; and (ii) that it should be decided that such a lay rector is not liable because to hold to the contrary would involve a contravention of one or more of the rights declared by the Convention."

B 122 I find some difficulty in reconciling the first argument with Mr Wallbank's concession as recited in Master Bragge's order. That, perhaps, does not matter because Ferris J, following Wickhambrook Parochial Church Council v Croxford [1935] 2 KB 417 and Chivers & Sons Ltd v Air Ministry [1955] Ch 585 held that it was settled law that an C individual who had come into ownership of part only of the rectorial property became liable to the full burden of the chancel repair liability. In the Court of Appeal [2002] Ch 51, 58, para 15, Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, relying on the same authorities, agreed and held, in addition, that the liability "is not limited or proportioned to the value or fruits of the benefice: its sole measure is the cost of necessary repairs". This was what had been held in the Wickhambrook case, a case by which the Court of Appeal in the D present case was bound. This is not a point which has been argued before your Lordships in the present appeal nor, in my opinion, is it a point which arises under the preliminary issue. It is a point that may re-emerge if the quantum of the cost of repairs for which the Wallbanks are liable has to be litigated. For the present I want to say no more about it than Viscount Simon LC said in the "Welsh Commissioners" case, namely, that it is a E difficult question and that whether the Wickhambrook case was rightly decided is open to debate at least in this House.

123 As to the Chivers & Sons Ltd v Air Ministry point (see paragraph 16 of Sir Andrew Morritt V-C's judgment) it cannot avail the Wallbanks. The 1918 Conveyance plainly intended to make the Terrys, the transferees, co-rectors. Otherwise there would have been no mention of the chancel repair liability.

F 124 As to the second argument for the Wallbanks to which Ferris J referred, the argument based on the 1998 Act, the judge held that there was no breach of article 1 of the First Protocol. The Wallbanks' liability to repair the chancel was an incident of their ownership of the Clanacre fields and the enforcement of that liability by those entitled to enforce it could not be regarded as a deprivation of their possessions. Their G possessions, he pointed out, were always liable to such enforcement. Ferris J, therefore, answered in the negative the question posed in the preliminary issue.

125 The Court of Appeal disagreed with Ferris J on the 1998 Act point. They held, first, that the PCC was a core "public authority" within the meaning of that expression in section 6 of the Act. Section 6(1) provides that "It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible H with a Convention right." They held, alternatively, that the PCC's function in enforcing against the Wallbanks their chancel repair liability was a function "of a public nature". Section 6(3)(b) provides that the expression "public authority" includes "any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature" and section 6(5) says that "In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private".

126 Having reached conclusions under which the PCC's attempts to enforce the chancel repair liability against the Wallbanks were acts of a public authority for section 6 purposes, the question was whether the enforcement was incompatible with a Convention right. The Court of Appeal first addressed itself to article 1 of the First Protocol and held that the liability to defray the cost of chancel repairs was "inescapably" a form of taxation. The reasoning was that "a private individual who has no necessary connection with the church [was being] required by law to pay money to a public authority for its upkeep": para 40. The Court of Appeal identified in Strasbourg jurisprudence a requirement that "the legitimate aim of taxation in the public interest must be pursued by means which are not completely arbitrary or out of all proportion to their purpose" (paragraph 44), held that the liability for chancel repair was a tax which operated entirely arbitrarily "first because the land to which it attaches, now shorn of any connection with the rectory, does not differ relevantly from any other freehold land, and secondly because the liability may arise at any time and be . . . in almost any amount" (para 45), and held that the "tax" accordingly violated article 1 of the First Protocol.

127 The Court of Appeal held, also, that the way in which the chancel repair liability operated discriminated, impermissibly and in breach of article 14, between the Wallbanks, who were subject to the liability, and other landowners in the parish who were not.

128 The following issues therefore arise for decision on this appeal. (1) Is the PCC a "core" public authority for the purposes of section 6 of the 1998 Act? (2) If the PCC is not a core public authority, is its function in enforcing chancel repair liability a function "of a public nature"? (3) If the PCC's enforcement of chancel repair liability is a function of a public nature, does the enforcement infringe article 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention? (4) Or does it infringe article 14 of the Convention?

Is the PCC a core public authority?

129 I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry. Each has concluded that a PCC is not a core public authority. I am in complete agreement with their reasons for coming to that conclusion and cannot usefully add to them. I, too, would hold that a PCC is not a core public authority.

Is the enforcement of chancel repair liability a function of a public nature?

130 On this issue my noble and learned friends have come to the conclusion that the nature of enforcement of chancel repair liability is private. I have found this a difficult question but at the end have come to the opposite conclusion. I agree with Lord Hope that the answer to the question, whether an authority, not being a "core" public authority, is, when exercising a particular function, exercising a function of a public nature, must depend upon the facts of the particular case (paragraph 63 of his opinion). The important facts and matters relevant to the question in the present case seem to me, in no particular order of importance, to be the

A following. (1) The parish church is a church of the Church of England, a church by law established. (2) It is a church to which the Anglican public are entitled to have recourse, regardless of whether they are practising members of the church, for marriage, for baptism of their children, for weddings, for funerals and burial, and perhaps for other purposes as well. (3) Members of other denominations, or even other religions, are, if parishioners, entitled to burial in the parish churchyard. (4) The church is, therefore, a public B building. It is not a private building from which the public can lawfully be excluded at the whim of the owner. (5) The PCC is corporate and its functions are charitable. Its members have the status of charity trustees. Charitable trusts are public trusts, not private ones. (6) A decision by a PCC to enforce a chancel repairing liability is a decision taken in the interests of the parishioners as a whole. It is not taken in pursuit of any private C interests. If it were so taken, it would I think be impeachable by judicial review.

131 Lord Hope has said that the liability of the lay rector to repair the chancel arises as a matter of private law from the ownership of glebe land: paragraph 71 of his opinion. I would respectfully question whether the adjective "private" is apt. In the Welsh Commissioners case [1944] AC 228 Sir Walter Monckton KC for the appellants in his submissions to their D Lordships commented on the fact that the Welsh Churches Act 1914 had made no express provision for a tribunal to take the place of the consistory court in enforcing chancel repair and put to their Lordships that "Perhaps the Attorney General might have dealt with the matter as a public right": p 234. There was no recorded dissent and I respectfully suggest that Sir Walter's comment was soundly based. The liability of a lay rector is a E personal liability arising from his ownership of impropriated property and is imposed by common law (see Viscount Simon LC, at p 240). But obligations imposed by common law are not necessarily private law obligations. Whether they are so or not must depend on those to whom they are owed. The chancel repair obligations are not owed to private individuals. Private individuals cannot release them. Section 52 of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Measure 1923 provided a procedure whereby lay rectors F liable for chancel repairs could compound their liability and thereby obtain a release from it. The procedure required there to be consultation with the PCC of the parish, the obtaining of approval from the Diocesan Dilapidations Board and payment of the requisite sum to the Diocesan Authority. The sum paid becomes trust money (see subsection (5)). These provisions have an unmistakable public law flavour to them. The chancel G repair obligations resting on a lay rector are not, in my opinion, private law obligations.

132 In my opinion, therefore, the question posed under this issue should be answered in the affirmative. It follows, if that is right, that in enforcing chancel repair liability, a PCC must not act in a manner incompatible with a Convention right. Is enforcement of chancel repair liability against Mr and Mrs Wallbank an infringement of their rights under article 1 of the H First Protocol?

133 The terms of article 1 have been set out by Lord Hope in paragraph 66 of his opinion. I need not repeat that exercise. The question is whether the enforcement of the chancel repair liability constitutes a deprivation of the lay rector's possessions. The Court of Appeal prayed in aid the analogy of taxation in order to justify the proposition that the relevant deprivation was of the Wallbanks' funds. It was their personal funds of which they were to be deprived, not Glebe Farm. For my part, although I disagree with the categorisation of the liability as a form of taxation (see paragraph 40 of the Court of Appeal's judgment) I would accept the analysis. The enforcement of the liability is indeed an attack on the Wallbanks' personal funds but it does not on that account infringe article 1 any more than a claim to enforce any other pecuniary liability does so. It is here, perhaps, that the taxation analogy does become relevant. Taxation is a levy imposed by a state, or perhaps by some core public authority authorized by the state to impose the levy, either on the public generally or on some identified section of the public. In Black's Law Dictionary, 6th ed (1990), "tax" is described as "a charge by the government", as a pecuniary burden laid upon individuals or property to support the government, and [being] a payment exacted by legislative authority" and whose "essential characteristics . . . are that it is not a voluntary payment or donation but an enforced contribution, exacted pursuant to legislative authority". It may be that the obligation imposed on parishioners by the common law to pay tithes to the rector of the parish could, although not imposed by government or by the legislature, reasonably be regarded as an obligation to pay a tax. But the obligation of the recipient of the tithes to repair the chancel of the parish church could not, in my opinion, be so described. When tithe rentcharge took the place of tithes, the obligation to pay the tithe rentcharge might similarly have been regarded as an obligation of a taxation character. But the obligation to repair the chancel of the church resting on the recipient of the tithe rentcharge could not be so described. It remained a quid pro quo for the receipt of the tithe rentcharge. The substitution under an Inclosure Award of land for tithes could no more have changed the nature of the obligation to repair the church chancel than the substitution of tithe rentcharge for tithes could have done. The taxation analogy drawn by the Court of Appeal is, in my respectful opinion, misplaced.

134 The chancel repair liability satisfies, in my opinion, the requirements of the article 1 exception: it is a liability created by the common law, it operates in the narrow public interest of the parishioners in the parish concerned and in the general public interest in the maintenance of churches. It is created by common law and is subject to the incidents attached to it by common law. And in the case of Mr and Mrs Wallbank they acquired the rectorial property and became lay rectors with full knowledge of the potential liability for chancel repair that that acquisition would carry with it. I can see no infringement of (or incompatibility with) article 1 produced by the actions of the PCC in enforcing that liability.

135 Nor, in my opinion, do Mr and Mrs Wallbank have any case of infringement of article 14. The comparators for article 14 purposes cannot possibly be persons who are not lay rectors. A person who is sued for £1,000 that he owes is not discriminated against for article 14 purposes because people who do not owe £1,000 are not similarly sued. A person who builds in breach of planning permission and has proceedings taken against him by the local planning authority is not discriminated against for article 14 purposes because a person who builds and has obtained planning permission is not sued. The comparators are not apt. The apt comparator in

A the present case would be a co-lay rector who was liable for chancel repairs to the Aston Cantlow church but on whom no 1932 Act notice had been served. There is no case here of article 14 discrimination.

136 For these reasons I would allow the appeal and restore the declaration and order made by Ferris J.

137 A final point before your Lordships was whether, if the PCC's enforcement of the chancel repair liability had constituted an infringement B of Mr and Mrs Wallbank's Convention rights, the PCC could have relied on section 6(2)(a) or (b) of the 1998 Act. As to (a), it was contended that, as a result of section 2 of the 1932 Act, the PCC could not have done otherwise than enforce the chancel repair liability. In my opinion, this contention could not be sustained. Section 2 confers a power. It does not impose a mandatory duty. The PCC could have decided not to enforce the repairing C obligation. They could have so decided for a number of different reasons which, in particular factual situations, might have had weight. They might, for example, have recommended the deconsecration of the church and its sale for conversion into a dwelling. They might have taken into account excessive hardship to Mr and Mrs Wallbank in having to find £95,000. Trustees are not always obliged to be Scrooge. Section 2 is not, in my D opinion, a provision of primary legislation capable of engaging section 6(2)(a) of the 1998 Act. As to (b), it is not section 2 of the 1932 Act that produces the alleged incompatibility with Convention rights. Section 2 merely provides enforcement machinery for the obligation created by the common law. If section 2 had never been enacted the allegedly Convention infringing obligation to pay for chancel repairs would still have been present. None the less, if the imposition by the common law of the E obligation constitutes an infringement of Convention rights so, too, the use of section 2 for the purpose of enforcement would constitute an infringement. So I respectfully agree with my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough, that the PCC would be entitled to rely on section 6(2)(b).

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY

F 138 My Lords, in 1986 Mrs Gail Wallbank became the owner of the freehold of Glebe Farm near the village of Aston Cantlow in Warwickshire. Four years later she conveyed the property into the joint names of herself and her husband. As owners of Glebe Farm Mr and Mrs Wallbank are the lay rectors or impropriators of the parish church and, as such, potentially liable to pay the cost of repairs to the chancel. By 1990 the chancel was in G disrepair. At that time the Parochial Church Council ("the PCC") did not know about the conveyance into joint names and accordingly it simply asked Mrs Wallbank to pay for the repairs. She disputed the liability. In 1994 the PCC, as the responsible authority, served notice on Mrs Wallbank under section 2(1) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1936, calling on her to repair the chancel. When she still refused to do so, the PCC began these proceedings under section 2(2) of the 1936 Act to recover over £95,000, the estimated H cost of the repairs. Subsequently, the PCC joined Mr Wallbank as a defendant.

139 My noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote, has described the origins and development of the liability for chancel repairs as well as the way in which that liability attaches to the owners of Glebe Farm. The law as it applies today can scarcely be regarded as satisfactory and may well cause real hardship to lay rectors who are called on to pay the cost of repairs to the chancel. Not surprisingly, the Law Commission have made proposals for the abolition of the liability over a period of time: Liability for Chancel Repairs (Law Com No 152, (1985)). Not altogether surprisingly either, Parliament has not yet acted on those proposals since abolition without compensation would cause significant financial harm to many ancient parish churches throughout England. This case highlights both aspects of the problem.

140 Mr and Mrs Wallbank do not now dispute that, absent the Human Rights Act 1998, they would be liable to pay the reasonable cost of the necessary repairs to the chancel. They defend the proceedings, however, on the basis that the PCC is a "public authority" which has acted unlawfully in terms of section 6(1) of the 1998 Act by requiring them to pay the sum in question and so interfering with their peaceful enjoyment of their possessions in contravention of article 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

141 The demand for payment was made and the action begun long before the 1998 Act was even thought of. And indeed Ferris J heard argument and delivered judgment at first instance some months before the Act came into force. By the time of the hearing in the Court of Appeal the 1998 Act was in force and the PCC conceded that, by virtue of sections 7(1)(b) and 22(4), Mr and Mrs Wallbank were entitled to rely on their Convention right. In their judgment delivered by Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, the Court of Appeal accepted the concession: [2002] Ch 51, 56, para 7. In its written case in this House the PCC indicated an intention to withdraw the concession. When the appeal opened, however, Mr George indicated that he did not intend to argue the point. This may have been, in part at least, because the Church authorities are anxious to have the substantial issue resolved. In these circumstances the House heard no argument on what the cases show to be a difficult area of the law. I therefore prefer to express no view on the point.

142 Differing from the decision of Ferris J, the Court of Appeal disposed of the case by holding that the liability of Mr and Mrs Wallbank, as lay rectors, to meet the cost of the chancel repairs was unenforceable by reason of the 1998 Act. In that way the Court of Appeal lifted the burden from lay rectors like Mr and Mrs Wallbank, albeit at the expense of PCCs like the one at Aston Cantlow. The question for the House is whether the Court of Appeal were right to take this momentous step on the basis of the 1998 Act.

143 In reaching their conclusion the Court of Appeal held that the PCC was indeed a "public authority" in terms of section 6 of the 1998 Act. While a number of other issues were argued in the hearing of the appeal to your Lordships' House, none of them arises unless the PCC is indeed to be regarded as a public authority for this purpose.

144 Section 6 provides, inter alia:

> "(1) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right."
> "(3) In this section 'public authority' includes . . . (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature . . ."
> "(5) In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection 3(b) if the nature of the act is private."

A The use of the word "includes" in subsection (3) shows that there are public authorities other than persons only certain of whose functions are of a public nature. So there must be persons who are public authorities because all their functions are of a public nature. These are sometimes referred to as "core" public authorities, as opposed to "hybrid" authorities, only certain of whose functions are public and some of whose acts may be private in nature. In view of my overall conclusion on the appeal I have not found it necessary on B this occasion to explore the significance of the distinction between the two kinds of public authorities.

145 In deciding that the PCC was to be regarded as a public authority, the Court of Appeal first noted that in the area of judicial review the cases at present draw a conceptual line between functions of public governance and functions of mutual governance. But the Court of Appeal could detect no C surviving element of mutuality or mutual governance as between the impropriator and the church in the modern liability for chancel repairs: the relationship in which the function arose was created by a rule of law and a state of fact which were independent of the volition of either of them: [2002] Ch 51, 62–63, para 34. In the hearing before the House Mr George did not argue the contrary. The Court of Appeal continued, at p 63, para 35:

D "In our judgment it is inescapable, in these circumstances, that a PCC is a public authority. It is an authority in the sense that it possesses powers which private individuals do not possess to determine how others should act. Thus, in particular, its notice to repair has statutory force. It is public in the sense that it is created and empowered by law; that it forms part of the church by law established; and that its functions include the E enforcement through the courts of a common law liability to maintain its chancels resting upon persons who need not be members of the church. If this were to be incorrect, the PCC would nevertheless, and for the same reasons, be a legal person certain of whose functions, chancel repairs among them, are functions of a public nature. It follows on either basis by virtue of section 6 that its acts, to be lawful, must be compatible with the rights set out in Schedule 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998."

F The Court of Appeal's main conclusion therefore was that the PCC was a core public authority. Alternatively, it was a hybrid authority, some of whose functions were public—among them enforcing the impropriators' obligation to pay for chancel repairs.

146 There is no doubt that, in terms of section 2(1) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932, the PCC is an authority—more precisely, "the responsible G authority". For present purposes, however, the question is whether the PCC should be regarded as a public authority in terms of section 6. Parliament has chosen to use a composite phrase "public authority". There are therefore distinct dangers in interpreting it by breaking it down and examining the two components separately. Be that as it may, the Court of Appeal considered each of the two elements in turn.

H 147 They first held that the PCC was an "authority" for purposes of section 6 because it had powers which private individuals do not possess to determine how others should act—the relevant example being its power to serve a notice to repair which has statutory force. That is a somewhat imprecise criterion for identifying an authority, however. When a police officer arrests an offender, his act is that of a public "authority" irrespective of whether or not the arrest is one that a private citizen could have effected. Moreover Parliament can, if it wishes, invest private individuals with quite remarkable powers over their fellow citizens. For instance, section 391 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict c 55), now repealed, provided:

> "It shall be lawful for any householder, personally or by his servant, or by a constable of police, to require any street musician or singer to depart from the neighbourhood of the house of such householder; and every person who shall continue to sound or play any instrument, or sing in any street, at any time after being so required to depart, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings."

A paterfamilias standing in evening dress at the entrance to his New Town residence could address an order to an organ-grinder to depart from the vicinity, or his butler could issue it from the top of the area steps. In either event, the organ-grinder would commit an offence under the section if he continued to play in the street. But if, instead, they had summoned a constable who had issued the same instruction with exactly the same effect, he would unquestionably have been an "authority"—and indeed a "public authority". The existence or non-existence of the equivalent statutory power in the householder and his servant would not be germane to the constable's status. So the fact that no individual possesses the power to issue a statutory repair notice with specific effects on the lay rector cannot in itself be sufficient to show that the PCC is to be regarded as an authority for the purposes of section 6.

148 The Court of Appeal drew attention to three features which they thought pointed to the PCC being a "public" authority for purposes of section 6: the PCC is created and empowered by law; it forms part of the church by law established and its functions include the enforcement through the courts of a common law liability to maintain the chancel resting upon persons who need not be members of the Church.

149 It is necessary to look a little more closely at the Court of Appeal's observation that the PCC "is created and empowered by law". The origins of PCCs can be traced back to the movement that began in the 19th century for greater self-government and better representation of the laity in the Church of England. Part of the problem was that, while the Convocations of Canterbury and York could pass canons which were binding on the clergy, any wider legislation had to be by Act of Parliament and Parliament passed only relatively few of the Acts for which the Church asked. In 1916 a special committee set up to look into the question recommended the formation of a Church Council with power to legislate on ecclesiastical matters. Eventually, after further work by another committee, the necessary scheme was approved by the Convocations of Canterbury and York. Both Convocations adopted identical addresses which were presented to King George V on 10 May 1919. The text is to be found in the Acts of the Upper and Lower Houses, Convocation of Canterbury, 6 May 1919, Upper House, Official Year Book of the Church of England 1920, p 193. Attached to the addresses was an appendix (Official Year Book of the Church of England 1921, p 16) setting out the constitution of what was now called the National Assembly of the Church of England. Paragraph 17 of the constitution provided that, before entering on any

A other legislative business, the Assembly should make further provision for the self-government of the Church by passing through the Assembly two measures, the second being to confer "upon the Parochial Church Councils constituted under the Schedule to this Constitution such powers as the Assembly may determine."

150 The necessary machinery for giving Assembly measures legal effect was created later that year when Parliament passed the Church of England B Assembly (Powers) Act 1919. Under section 4, measures passed by the Assembly and submitted to the Ecclesiastical Committee of Parliament would, on being approved and receiving the Royal Assent, have the force and effect of an Act of Parliament. In accordance with that procedure, the National Assembly proceeded to pass the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure 1921. The Preamble duly records that the measure was C passed to fulfil a requirement of the constitution of the National Assembly to

> "make further provision for the self-government of the Church by passing through the Assembly Measures inter alia for conferring on the Parochial Church Councils constituted under the Schedule to such Constitution such powers as the Assembly may determine."

151 As the Preamble shows, just like the National Assembly itself, the PCCs were actually constituted when the scheme, comprising the constitution of the National Assembly and the schedule of rules for the representation of the laity, was approved by the Convocations of Canterbury and York. The function of the 1921 Measure was, accordingly, E not to constitute or "create" the PCCs but to confer powers on them. The same division survives today. The rules for the representation of the laity, including those relating to PCCs, are to be found in Schedule 3 to the Synodical Government Measure 1969, while the powers of PCCs are now in the Parochial Church Council (Powers) Measure 1956. Like section 3 of the 1921 Measure, section 3 of the 1956 Measure provides for the PCC to be a body corporate. Section 2 of the 1921 Measure made it "the primary duty of F the council in every parish to co-operate with the incumbent in the initiation and development of Church work both within the parish and outside", while section 2 of the 1956 Measure, which was inserted by section 6 of the 1969 Measure, confers rather more elaborate general functions on the council. I come back to that section shortly.

152 On closer examination, therefore, the process by which the PCCs G were constituted and received their powers is really very different from the way in which a public body such as the Equal Opportunities Commission is created and given its powers by statute. In a case of that kind, the fact that the body owes both its existence and its powers to statute may well indicate that it has been called into existence to carry out some function that relates to the government of the country in a broad sense. By contrast, the PCCs were not constituted by statute but by the Church. They then became bodies H corporate and received their powers not by virtue of an Act of Parliament but by virtue of an Assembly Measure, having the force and effect of an Act of Parliament. These factors suggest that, in reality, PCCs were constituted by the Church to carry out functions to be determined by the National Assembly, later the General Synod, of the Church.

153 The Court of Appeal pointed next to the PCC being part of the Church by law established. In his submissions on behalf of Mr and Mrs Wallbank Mr Beloff embellished this argument. The Church of England—with Her Majesty the Queen at its head, with bishops appointed by the Queen on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, with the legislation of General Synod receiving the Royal Assent and having the force and effect of an Act of Parliament and with the civil power being available to enforce the judgments of its courts—was so woven into the fabric of the state that it should be regarded as a core public authority for purposes of section 6. Then, since "the parish is the basic building block of the church" (Hill, Ecclesiastical Law, 2nd ed, p 74), the PCC too should be regarded as a core public authority—whatever might be its precise functions in terms of section 2 of the 1956 Measure.

154 I would reject that argument. In this case the House is not concerned with any theological doctrine of establishment such as gave rise to one of the issues in General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland v Lord Overtoun [1904] AC 515. Mr Beloff's argument centred, rather, on the general position of the Church of England in English law. The juridical nature of the Church is, notoriously, somewhat amorphous. The Church has been described as "an organised operative institution" or as "the quasi corporate institution which carries on the religious work" of the Church of England: In re Barnes; Simpson v Barnes (Note) [1930] 2 Ch 80, 81. Whether or not such an institution itself could ever count as a public authority in terms of section 6, I see no basis upon which a body within the Church, which would not otherwise be regarded as a public authority, could be impliedly invested with that character simply by reason of being part of the wider institution.

155 On the other hand, the 1956 Measure passed by the National Assembly of the Church casts light on the nature of the functions of a PCC. Under section 2(1) its duty is to consult with the minister on matters of general concern and importance to the parish. By section 2(2) the PCC's general functions include:

> "(a) co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church, pastoral, evangelistic, social and ecumenical; (b) the consideration and discussions of matters concerning the Church of England or any other matters of religious or public interest, but not the declaration of the doctrine of the Church on any question; (c) making known and putting into effect any provision made by the diocesan synod or the deanery synod, but without prejudice to the powers of the council on any particular matter; (d) giving advice to the diocesan synod and the deanery synod on any matter referred to the council; (e) raising such matters as the council consider appropriate with the diocesan synod or deanery synod."

In addition to these general functions, by virtue of section 4 the PCC is given powers, duties and liabilities which formerly vested in the churchwardens. These focus very much on the parish church and its affairs. In particular, under section 4(1)(b) the PCC has powers, duties and liabilities with respect to the care, maintenance, preservation and insurance of the fabric of the church and of its goods and ornaments. By section 7(ii) the PCC has power

A to levy and collect a voluntary church rate for any purpose connected with the affairs of the parish church.

156 The key to the role of the PCC lies in the first of its general functions: co-operation with the minister in promoting in the parish the whole mission of the Church. Its other more particular functions are to be seen as ways of carrying out this general function. The mission of the Church is a religious mission, distinct from the secular mission of B government, whether central or local. Founding on scriptural and other recognised authority, the Church seeks to serve the purposes of God, not those of the government carried on by the modern equivalents of Caesar and his proconsuls. This is true even though the Church of England has certain important links with the state. Those links, which do not include any funding of the Church by the government, give the Church a unique position C but they do not mean that it is a department of state: Marshall v Graham [1907] 2 KB 112, 126, per Phillimore LJ. In so far as the ties are intended to assist the Church, it is to accomplish the Church's own mission, not the aims and objectives of the Government of the United Kingdom. The PCC exists to carry forward the Church's mission at the local level.

157 Against that background the adjective "private" is not perhaps the one that springs most readily to mind to describe the functions of a PCC in D the Church of England either generally or as compared, for instance, with those of a church council in the Methodist Church. It might therefore be tempting to conclude that the PCC's functions must be "public" and that the PCC must itself be a "public" authority for the purposes of the 1998 Act. At this point it becomes necessary to look more closely at the meaning of the composite expression "public authority" in section 6. This in turn takes one E back behind the Act to the Convention itself.

158 The "High Contracting Parties" to the Convention were "the governments signatory" to the Convention, more particularly "the governments of European countries" having certain common characteristics. In the fourth recital to the Convention they reaffirmed their profound belief in those rights and freedoms which are the foundation of justice and peace in the world and which are best maintained by a common F understanding and observance of the human rights upon which they depend. The governments gave concrete expression to the beliefs and aspirations recorded in the recitals by undertaking in article 1 to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms set out in section 1 of the Convention. It can reasonably be inferred from the terms of the recitals and article 1 that the freedoms, and the rights on which they depend, relate to the G powers and responsibilities of the governments which are parties to the Convention.

159 That inference is confirmed by article 34 which provides that the European Court of Human Rights ("the European Court")

> "may receive applications from any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals claiming to be the victim of a H violation by one of the High Contracting Parties of the rights set forth in the Convention or the protocols thereto. The High Contracting Parties undertake not to hinder in any way the effective exercise of this right."

I respectfully agree with the Court of Appeal [2002] Ch 51, 62, para 33, that, taken together, articles 1 and 34 assume the existence of a state which stands distinct from persons, groups and non-governmental organisations. I would go further: the reference in article 1 to the rights and freedoms defined in section 1 of the Convention only makes sense if the state in question is exercising a range of functions which are, in a broad sense, governmental—and to which the rights and freedoms in section 1 can therefore relate. Long ago, the functions of government were usually confined to defending the realm and keeping the peace. Nowadays, in addition, they commonly cover such matters as education, health and the environment. The exact range of governmental power will vary, of course, from state to state, depending on the history of the particular state and the political philosophy of its government. Similarly, the distribution of governmental power will depend on the constitutional arrangements of the individual states. In some, the central government will retain most functions, in others power will be shared on some kind of federal system, while, in most at least, some functions will be allotted to local or community bodies. Irrespective of these and other possible permutations, under article 1 of the Convention the states parties are responsible for securing that all bodies exercising governmental power within their jurisdiction respect the relevant rights and freedoms. This approach underlies the admissibility decision of the Fourth Chamber of the European Court in Ayuntamiento de Mula v Spain Reports of Judgments and Decisions 2001-I, p 531.

160 The obligation under article 1 has bound the United Kingdom ever since the Convention came into force. Since 1966 individuals have been able to bring proceedings in Strasbourg to ensure that the United Kingdom complies with that obligation. Prima facie, therefore, when Parliament enacted the 1998 Act "to give further effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights", the intention was to make provision in our domestic law to ensure that the bodies carrying out the functions of government in the United Kingdom observed the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention. Parliament chose to bring this about by enacting inter alia section 6(1), which makes it unlawful for "a public authority" to act in a way that is incompatible with a Convention right. A purposive construction of that section accordingly indicates that the essential characteristic of a public authority is that it carries out a function of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg organs.

161 Mr Beloff accepted, of course, that, in order to achieve the government's declared aim of bringing rights home, in the legislation which it placed before Parliament the term "public authority" must have been intended to include all bodies that carry out a function of government that would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom in Strasbourg. But, he said, that was simply a minimum. The government and, more particularly, Parliament could well have intended to go further and to include other public bodies, even though their acts would not engage the international responsibility of the United Kingdom. It would therefore be wrong to limit the scope of "public authority" in section 6 to bodies exercising a governmental function of the state, however loosely defined. Mr Beloff could not point to any authoritative statement showing that Parliament had intended the 1998 Act to have this wider effect. But he argued that, if Parliament had meant to limit the legislation to bodies carrying out a function of government, the natural thing would have been

A to use some such term as "a governmental authority" or "a governmental organisation"—which would mirror the term "non-governmental organisation" to be found in article 34 of the Convention. That was how the draftsman of the Act had proceeded in section 7(7) when he provided that a person was to be a "victim" of an unlawful act for the purposes of the section only if he would have been a victim for the purposes of article 34 in proceedings before the European Court in respect of that act. B Not only had the draftsman not adopted a similar approach in section 6(1): when an attempt had been made to amend the Bill so as to align the domestic test with the test adopted by the European Court in interpreting the Convention, the government had opposed it and the amendment had failed.

162 I see no proper basis for referring to Hansard as an aid to C construing the term "public authority" in section 6. But it appears that, in advancing this particular argument, Mr Beloff had in mind the amendments moved by Mr Edward Leigh MP and discussed by the Home Secretary during the Commons committee stage of the Bill: Hansard (HC Debates), 7 June 1998, cols 400, 418–425 and 432–433. Since the Convention is concerned with the obligations of the governments of the states parties, it D does not define the domestic bodies whose acts engage the liability of those governments. Moreover, the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court on the point is not extensive. A definition of the relevant public bodies in the 1998 Act by reference to the approach of the Strasbourg court would therefore not have been particularly workable. Keith J made much the same point in relation to the Hong Kong Bill of Rights in Hong Kong Polytechnic University v Next Magazine Publishing Ltd [1996] 2 HKLR 260, 264B–F. E According to the Home Secretary, because of these problems and in an attempt to replicate the situation under the Convention, the government chose the term "public authority" to indicate that the body concerned was to be sufficiently public to engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom. If—contrary to my view—the House could properly derive assistance from the fate of these amendments, it would lie in the confirmation that, in F promoting the Bill, the government intended to give people rights in domestic law against the same bodies as would engage the liability of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg court.

163 In the present case the question therefore comes to be whether a PCC is a public authority in the sense that it carries out, either generally or on the relevant occasion, the kind of public function of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the G Strasbourg organs. It so happens that there are two cases from Strasbourg dealing with the position of churches in this regard. They suggest that, in general, church authorities should not be treated as public authorities in this sense.

164 The first case is Holy Monasteries v Greece 20 EHRR 1. On the basis of various provisions of the Convention, including article 1 of the First Protocol, the applicant monasteries challenged a Greek statute which H changed the rules of administration of their patrimony and provided for the transfer of a large part of their estate to the Greek state. The links between the Greek Orthodox Church and the Greek state were particularly close. In Greek law the Holy Monasteries were public law entities that could be founded, merged or dissolved by means of a decree of the President of Greece. Another public law entity, under the supervision of the ministry of education and religious affairs, was responsible for managing the property belonging to the monasteries. In these circumstances the Greek Government stated, as a preliminary objection to the Holy Monasteries' application, that they were not a non-governmental organisation which could make an application as a victim in terms of article 25(1) (now article 34) of the Convention. Repelling that objection, the European Court held, at p 41, para 49:

> "Like the Commission in its admissibility decision, the court notes at the outset that the applicant monasteries do not exercise governmental powers. Section 39(1) of the Charter of the Greek Church describes the monasteries as ascetic religious institutions. Their objectives—essentially ecclesiastical and spiritual ones, but also cultural and social ones in some cases—are not such as to enable them to be classed with governmental organisations established for public administration purposes. From the classification as public law entities it may be inferred only that the legislature—on account of the special links between the monasteries and the state—wished to afford them the same legal protection vis-à-vis third parties as was accorded to other public law entities. Furthermore, the monastery councils' only power consists in making rules concerning the organisation and furtherance of spiritual life and the internal administration and furtherance of spiritual life and the internal administration of each monastery. The monasteries come under the spiritual supervision of the local archbishop, not under the supervision of the state, and they are accordingly entities distinct from the state, of which they are completely independent. The applicant monasteries are therefore to be regarded as non-governmental organisations within the meaning of article 25 of the Convention."

While the positions of the Holy Monasteries and of a PCC are scarcely comparable, the judgment of the European Court is important for its reasoning that the nature of the objectives of the monasteries was not such that they could be classed with "governmental organisations established for public administration purposes". The court also attached importance to the fact that the monasteries came under the spiritual supervision of the local archbishop rather than under the supervision of the state, as an indication that they were entities distinct from the state.

165 In Hautanemi v Sweden 22 EHRR CD 156 the applicants were members of a parish of the Church of Sweden who complained of a violation of article 9 of the Convention because the Assembly of the Church of Sweden had prohibited the use of the liturgy of the Finnish Evangelical-Lutheran Church in their parish. Under reference to the judgment in the Holy Monasteries case, the Commission recalled article 25(1) (now article 34) of the Convention and observed, at p 155, that > "at the relevant time the Church of Sweden and its member parishes were to be regarded as corporations of public law. Since these religious bodies cannot be considered to have been exercising governmental powers, the Church of Sweden and notably the applicant parish can nevertheless be regarded as 'non-governmental organisations' within the meaning of article 25(1)."

A Having held that, as members of the parish, the applicants could be regarded as victims in terms of article 25(1), the Commission added, at p 156:

> "The Commission has just found that, for the purposes of article 25 of the Convention, the Church of Sweden and its member parishes are to be regarded as 'non-governmental organisations'. It follows that the respondent state cannot be held responsible for the alleged violation of B the applicants' freedom of religion resulting from the decision of the Church Assembly . . . There has thus been no State interference with that freedom."

166 In the light of these decisions what matters is that the PCC's general function is to carry out the religious mission of the Church in the parish, rather than to exercise any governmental power. Moreover, the PCC is not C in any sense under the supervision of the state: under section 9 of the 1956 Measure it is the bishop who has certain powers in relation to the PCC's activities. In these circumstances the fact that the PCC is constituted as a body corporate under the 1956 Measure is irrelevant. For these reasons, in respectful disagreement with the Court of Appeal, I consider that the PCC is not a core public authority for purposes of section 6 of the Act.

167 This conclusion finds further support in the treatment of certain D churches in relation to article 19(4) of the German Constitution or Grundgesetz. That article provides that, if any person's rights are infringed by "public power" ("öffentliche Gewalt"), recourse to the courts is open to him. The history of relations between Church and State in Germany is, of course, very different from the history of that relationship in any part of the United Kingdom. In Germany it has culminated in a E declaration that there is to be no State Church (article 137(1) of the Weimar Constitution incorporated by article 140 of the Constitution). This important difference must not be overlooked. Nevertheless, as permitted by article 137, certain churches are constituted as public law corporations. In general, domestic public law entities are regarded as exercising public power in terms of article 19(4), whereas natural persons and private law associations are not. Despite this, because of their F particular (religious) mission which does not derive from the state, the churches that are public law corporations are treated differently from other public law corporations that are organically integrated into the state. "Church power is indeed public, but not state power" ("ist kirchliche Gewalt zwar öffentliche, aber nicht staatliche Gewalt"): BVerwGE 18, 385, 386–387; BVerwGE 25, 226, 228–229. So, in relation to these G churches, the Administrative Court interprets the phrase "public power" in article 19(4) as being equivalent to "state power". Since within their own sphere the churches do not exercise state power, even if they exercise public power, the article 19(4) guarantee does not apply. Despite the rather different context, this interpretation of "public power" tends to confirm the interpretation of "public authority" in section 6 which I prefer. Moreover, due allowance having been made for the particular position of H the Church of England, the reasoning of the Administrative Court also tends to confirm that the mere fact that section 3 of the 1956 Measure makes every PCC a body corporate does not carry with it any necessary implication that the PCC should, on that account alone, be regarded as a public authority for the purposes of section 6.

168 Of course, if the churches in Germany go outside their own unique sphere and undertake state functions, for example, in running schools, the constitutional guarantee in article 19(4) applies to them: BVerwGE 18, 385, 387–388; BVerwGE 25, 226, 229. In much the same way, for example, a Church of England body which was entrusted, as part of its responsibilities, with running a school or other educational establishment might find that it had stepped over into the sphere of governmental functions and was, in that respect, to be regarded as a public authority for purposes of section 6(1).

169 The Court of Appeal did indeed consider that, even if they were wrong in holding that PCCs are core public authorities, a PCC should be regarded as a public authority when enforcing the common law obligation of lay rectors, who need not be members of the Church, to maintain the chancel of the parish church. Mr Beloff reinforced this argument by pointing both to the duty of the minister under the relevant canons to hold certain services in the parish church and to the widespread belief, whether particularly well-founded or not, that any resident of a parish was entitled to be married in the church. These were indications of the public role of the parish church and, accordingly, of the public nature of the PCC's function in relation to the maintenance of the fabric of the church so that the minister could perform those public duties there. Enforcing the lay rectors' obligation was part of that public function.

170 For the most part, in performing his duties and conducting the prescribed services, the minister is simply carrying out part of the mission of the Church, not any governmental function of the state. On the other hand, when in the course of his pastoral duties the minister marries a couple in the parish church, he may be carrying out a governmental function in a broad sense and so may be regarded as a public authority for purposes of the 1998 Act. In performing its duties in relation to the maintenance of the fabric of the church so that services may take place there, the PCC is doing its part to help the minister discharge his pastoral and evangelistic duties. The PCC may be acting in the public interest, in a general sense, but it is still carrying out a church rather than a governmental function. That remains the case even although, from time to time, when performing one of his pastoral duties—conducting a marriage service in the church—the minister himself may act as a public authority.

171 Moreover, the fact that, as part of its responsibilities in relation to the maintenance of the church fabric, the PCC may have to enforce a common law obligation against a lay rector who happens not to be a member of the Church can hardly transform the PCC into a public authority. Indeed, the very term "lay rector" is a reminder that the common law obligation which the PCC is enforcing is the last remnant of a set of more complex rights and liabilities that were ecclesiastical in origin. As Ferris J held, at para 23 of his judgment, today the liability to repair the chancel can be regarded as one of the incidents of ownership of rectorial property:

> "It is, of course, an unusual incident because it does not amount to a charge on the land, is not limited to the value of the land and imposes a personal liability on the owner of the land. But in principle I do not find it possible to distinguish it from the liability which would attach to the

A owner of land which is purchased subject to a mortgage, restrictive covenant or other incumbrance created by a predecessor in title."

I respectfully agree. There is nothing in the nature of the obligation itself, or in the means or purpose of its enforcement, that would lead to the conclusion that the PCC of Aston Cantlow is exercising a governmental function, however broadly defined, when it enforces the lay rectors' B obligation to pay for chancel repairs. Therefore, even when it is enforcing that obligation, the PCC is not to be regarded as a public authority for the purposes of section 6 of the 1998 Act.

172 I should add that I agree with the observations of my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, in the final paragraph of his speech.

C 173 For these reasons I would allow the appeal and make the order proposed by Lord Scott of Foscote.

Appeal allowed.

[2003] EWCA Civ 1056

2003 June 19
July 21

Dyson, Longmore LJJ and Sir Martin Nourse

Market — Right to trade — Termination of licence — Local authority setting up company limited by guarantee to operate farmers' markets on non-profit basis — Company refusing to renew trader's licence — Whether decision amenable to judicial review — Whether company "public authority" — Human Rights Act 1998 (c 42), s 6(3)

C

The county council established farmers' markets in 1999 acting under powers pursuant to the Local Government and Housing Act 1989[1]. Those who wished to apply to participate in the programme were invited to apply to the farmers' market manager who was employed by the council. The claimant was accepted as a stallholder from the outset. In 2001 the council decided to hand over the running of the markets to the stallholders, and it set up a company limited by guarantee to take over the markets. The company's registered address was initially at the council's offices, and in January 2002 it started operating the markets. The council continued to provide some finance and facilities such as the use of a computer at its offices. The company secretary was an employee of the council who became the company's business development manager and one of its directors, the other directors being stallholders. The claimant applied to participate in the 2002 market programme, but the company rejected his application and refused to grant him a licence. On the claimant's claim for judicial review in which the council appeared as an interested party, the judge quashed the company's refusal to grant a licence holding that the company was acting as a "public authority" within the meaning of section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998[2] and its decision was susceptible to judicial review. On appeal by the council, with leave, it was common ground that the tests for identifying a functional public authority within the meaning of the 1998 Act and for amenability to judicial review were for practical purposes the same.

On the council's appeal—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that, unless the source of the power of a decision-maker originating from statute or prerogative clearly provided the answer, the question whether a decision was amenable to judicial review required careful consideration of the nature of the power and function to be exercised to see whether the decision had a sufficient public element, flavour or character to bring it within the purview of public law; that, although the farmers' markets were neither statutory nor charter markets, their essential feature was that they were held on publicly owned land to which the public had a right of access; that the company was set up by the council using its statutory powers and it stepped into the council's shoes, performing the same functions as the council had previously performed; that, from the date of the company's incorporation until the time when it started operating the markets, and to some extent thereafter, the council assisted the company by providing facilities and finance; that the company was not simply a private company established to run markets for profit, but was established to take over on a non-profit basis the running of markets previously operated by the council in the exercise of its statutory powers

A APPEAL from Field J

By a judicial review claim form the claimant, Graham John Beer trading as Hammer Trout Farm, sought an order quashing the decision of Hampshire Farmers' Markets Ltd ("HFML") on 14 November 2001 rejecting his application to attend the 2002 programme of farmers' markets and claiming damages. Hampshire County Council was joined as an interested party. On 25 November 2002 Field J quashed HFML's decision, B declaring that in excluding the applicant from its markets HFML was acting as a public authority within section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998, and directing that the applicant's claim for damages be separately determined. The judge granted the council leave to appeal.

By a notice of appeal dated 19 December 2002 the council appealed on the grounds (1) that, in deciding that the company's decision not to grant the C applicant a licence to hold a stall at markets operated by the company was amenable to judicial review, the judge took into account the following irrelevant matters (a) the historical involvement of the council in establishing and running the markets, (b) the fact that the council might itself have been susceptible to judicial review; (c) the fact that the public had certain limited rights to attend markets to buy and sell goods; alternatively, in so far as those matters were taken into account by the judge, he failed to accord them D sufficient or any weight; and (2) the judge left out of account the following relevant matters (a) the status of the company as a private limited company, (b) the absence of any identifiable function being carried out by the council, (c) the absence of any statutory underpinning for the company or enmeshing into any system of governmental control.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Dyson LJ.

Cur adv vult

F 21 July. The following judgments were handed down.

DYSON LJ

1 This appeal raises the question of whether the decision of a private company limited by guarantee, Hampshire Farmers' Markets Ltd ("HFML"), is susceptible to judicial review, and whether this company is a "public authority" within the meaning of section 6 of the Human Rights Act G 1998. The decision was made on 14 November 2001 to reject an application by Mr Beer to be allowed to participate in the 2002 farmers' markets programme organised by HFML. In addition to seeking to have this decision quashed Mr Beer claims damages under the 1998 Act. By a decision dated 25 November 2002 Field J held that the decision was susceptible to judicial review and quashed it. He also held that HFML was acting as a public authority within the meaning of section 6 of the 1998 Act when it H excluded Mr Beer from its markets. He adjourned Mr Beer's claim for damages. He gave permission to appeal to this court on the grounds that the questions raise issues of general importance to local authorities who transfer functions to companies. Hampshire County Council have been joined in these proceedings as an interested party. The appeal has been brought by the council. HFML decided not to appeal since it is a company of limited resources, and was unwilling to expose itself to the uncertainties of litigation.

2 Mr Beer is a producer of trout at Liphook in Hampshire and trades under the name "Hammer Trout Farm". In 1999 the council began to organise farmers' markets using the name Hampshire Farmers' Markets. This was at a time when the farming economy was suffering a severe downturn. The council ran three pilot markets in Winchester. These were established pursuant to section 33 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (subsequently repealed). Section 33(1) empowered a local authority to take such steps "as they may from time to time consider appropriate for promoting the economic development of their area". Section 33(2) provided that the steps taken could include—

> "participation in and the encouragement of, and provision of financial and other assistance for—(a) the setting up or expansion of any commercial, industrial or public undertaking—(i) which is to be or is situated in the authority's area; or (ii) the setting up or expansion of which appears likely to increase the opportunities for employment of persons living in that area . . ."

Corresponding provisions are now to be found in section 2 of the Local Government Act 2000.

3 Following the success of these pilot schemes, in 2000 the council organised a programme of 32 farmers' markets. These were run for part of the year only and were held at weekends and on bank holidays. In September 2000 the council announced a programme of 60 farmers' markets for 2001, again to be held at weekends and on bank holidays. Those who wished to participate in the programme were invited to apply to the farmers' market manager, Ms Tessa Driscoll, who was an employee of the council. Participants had to satisfy three criteria: (a) all produce to be sold had to be grown, raised, baked or caught in Hampshire or within ten miles of the border; (b) the stallholders had to grow and produce the produce themselves; and (c) no brought-in produce was allowed to be sold.

4 Mr Beer was accepted by the council into the farmers' market programme from the outset. About 60 stallholders (including Mr Beer) wanted to have farmers' markets not only at weekends and on bank holidays as organised by the council, but also on weekdays. In September 2000 these stallholders set up the Southern Farmers' Market Association ("SFMA") to organise weekday markets to run alongside the council's markets. Mr Beer was elected chairman of SFMA.

5 Having established Hampshire Farmers' Markets, the council decided to hand over the running of the markets to the stallholders themselves. The farmers and producers were told that the council would cease to run the markets in December 2001, but that the council would help them to set up a limited company to take over the markets. HFML was incorporated on 29 December 2000. Its registered office was at the council's offices at the Castle in Winchester. HFML was set up with the assistance of the council which included the provision of advice and help with the documentation by its legal department. In October 2001 HFML's registered address was changed to that of its accountants. HFML started operating in January 2002. The company secretary at the time of incorporation was Mrs Frances

A Stokes, a council employee, who became HFML's business development manager and one of its seven directors. The remaining directors were stallholders. Ms Tessa Driscoll was seconded from the council to HFML until April 2002. Since then she has been employed directly by HFML. The council provided further support to HFML by allowing it to use a desk and computer in one of the rooms in the council's main building in B Winchester.

6 In 2001 the council issued application forms to be completed by stallholders who wanted to participate in the 2002 programme of farmers' markets. The criteria and market regulations were in identical terms to those that had previously been issued by the council. Mr Beer applied for a licence to participate in the markets. By its letter dated 14 November 2001 the company refused his application. The judge held that this decision was C taken in breach of the rules of natural justice. Since there is no appeal from that part of his decision, I do not propose to explore the reasons for the rejection of Mr Beer's application.

Amenability of HFML to judicial review

7 The judge reviewed a number of the leading authorities at paragraphs D 14 to 26 of his judgment. The reasons he gave for concluding that the decision by HFML to exclude Mr Beer from its markets was amenable to judicial review were as follows:

> "27. In my judgment, the decision to exclude Mr Beer from the 2002 farmers' markets programme by HFML involved a public element which renders the decision amenable to judicial review. The facts before me are E quite different from those in R v Servite Houses, Ex p Goldsmith [2001] LGR 55 and R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936. It is true that HFML is a private body, and that there is no statutory underpinning to its role and functions; nor are its functions woven into a system of governmental control. However, it is a not-for-profit organisation engaged in promoting the public interest by F facilitating access to trading outlets much needed by Hampshire's farmers and producers. In substance it acquired from the council the assets and goodwill of the Hampshire farmers' markets business, and it did so free of charge. It did not and does not own the sites on which the markets are conducted. These are public sites owned by local councils whose permission for the use of the sites for the markets had been granted free of G charge to the council, a situation which in November 2001 was highly likely to continue as, in fact, it has done in 2002. The goodwill acquired by HFML included both the reputation established by Hampshire Farmers' Markets with the public who attended the various markets, and a ready-made body of stallholders. The company plainly had in November 2001, and has today, a privileged position over potential rival organisers of weekend and bank holiday farmers' markets held at the sites H operated by the council. It follows that to this extent Hampshire farmers and producers were and are dependent on HFML for access to the markets it organises. Thus, the exclusion of a producer from those markets was bound potentially to be damaging, particularly if, like Mr Beer, he had been a stallholder when the council ran the markets and had thereby come to depend on those markets for a significant part of his livelihood.

"28. In my opinion HFML were and are engaged in running what in substance are public markets to which the public, both buyers and sellers (especially sellers who have been stallholders from the outset) have a common law right of access. This right to access is not unqualified. It is subject to a power in HFML to regulate and organise, but the exercise of that power is a public function, and it is reviewable by the courts.

"29. I asked Ms Carrington whether she accepted that decisions by the council when it ran the markets to grant or terminate licences had been amenable to judicial review. With respect to her, she had difficulty in avoiding an affirmative answer to this question. In my view, on the basis of the market cases to which I have referred, such decisions by the council were plainly reviewable, and not only because the council was a public authority exercising a statutory power. Does the fact that the organisation of the markets has been transferred to HFML in the manner I have described change the situation? In my opinion not. The company has stepped straight into the shoes of the council. The rights of the public to attend the markets, including in particular the right of an applicant stallholder who has been a stallholder from the outset, and who satisfies the prescribed criteria and is willing to pay the prescribed fees, were not extinguished when the undertaking was transferred to HFML. Accordingly, I hold that the decision of the HFML board of 14 November 2001 to exclude Mr Beer from its markets is amenable to judicial review."

Summary of the parties' submissions

8 On behalf of the council Ms Carrington submitted that there are two principal factors which militate against the decision being amenable to judicial review. The first is the absence of any public function being performed by HFML: its function is no more public than that performed by the owner of a shopping mall, or the organiser of a car boot sale or a supermarket. It is true that a sector of the public, namely market traders, will be affected by the decisions of the company. But impact on a section of the public is not sufficient to render those decisions amenable to judicial review. The relationship between Mr Beer and HFML was entirely consensual in character.

9 The second is the judge's finding that HFML is a private body with no statutory underpinning of its role and functions, and that its functions are not woven into a system of governmental control. It is true that the council was exercising statutory functions when it established HFML. But the function of promoting economic development in an area is not delegable and was not delegated to HFML. There was no statutory underpinning of the role and functions of HFML, which simply operates markets as does any other market operator. No control is exercised by the council over the company. At the material time Mrs Stokes was but one of seven directors (there are now nine), and she has never had a controlling vote on the board. The low level assistance given by the council to the company is not enough to lead to the conclusion that the functions of the company are woven into a system of governmental control.

10 On behalf of Mr Beer Mr Maurici advanced two main arguments. First, he submitted that the fact that HFML were operating a market to

A which the public had access on public land was, of itself, sufficient to render the decision amenable to judicial review. He relied on a number of cases in support of the proposition that bodies which take decisions in relation to market licences are exercising a public function. I shall refer to these as "the market cases". They are: R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex p Hook [1976] 1 WLR 1052, R v Basildon District Council, Ex p Brown (1981) 79 LGR 655, R v Wear Valley District Council, Ex p Binks [1985] B 2 All ER 699, R v Durham City Council, Ex p Robinson The Times, 31 January 1992 and R v Birmingham City Council, Ex p Dredger (1993) 91 LGR 532. Mr Maurici submitted that these authorities show that disputes that arise on the termination or non-renewal of a licence to trade at a market to which the public has access are not purely private or contractual matters: they have a public element.

C 11 His second principal argument was that there were in any event a number of features of the relationship between HFML and the council which demonstrate that, in making the impugned decision, HFML was exercising a public function. I shall refer to some of these features later.

The authorities

D 12 I shall deal with the market cases separately. It is clear from the authorities that there is no simple litmus test of amenability to judicial review. The relevant principles tend to be stated in rather elusive terms. There was a time when courts placed much emphasis on the source, rather than the nature, of the power being exercised by the body making the impugned decision. If the power derived from statute or the prerogative, E then it was a public body and the decision was amenable to public law challenges. If the source was contractual, then public law had no part to play. The importance of the seminal decision in R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815 was its recognition of the fact that the issue of amenability to judicial review often requires an examination of the nature of the power as well as its source. Lloyd LJ said, at p 847, that, where the source of the power did not clearly provide the answer, then the F nature of the power fell to be examined:

> "If the body in question is exercising public law functions, or if the exercise of its functions have public law consequences, then that may, as Mr Lever submitted, be sufficient to bring the body within the reach of judicial review. It may be said that to refer to 'public law' in this context G is to beg the question. But I do not think it does. The essential distinction, which runs through all the cases to which we referred, is between a domestic or private tribunal on the one hand and a body of persons who are under some public duty on the other."

13 Lloyd LJ did not explain what he meant by "public law functions". But Sir John Donaldson MR said, at p 838:

H
> "In all the reports it is possible to find enumerations of factors giving rise to the jurisdiction, but it is a fatal error to regard the presence of all those factors as essential or as being exclusive of other factors. Possibly the only essential elements are what can be described as a public element, which can take many different forms, and the exclusion from the jurisdiction of bodies whose sole source of power is a consensual submission to its jurisdiction." A

14 This test of a "public element which can take many forms" is expressed in very general terms, and of itself provides no real guidance. A similar formulation of the general test has been propounded in two recent decisions of this court as to the meaning of "public authority" in section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 to which I shall refer in more detail shortly. In Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48, 69, para 65 Lord Woolf CJ said that what could make an act, "which would otherwise be private, public is a feature or a combination of features which impose a public character or stamp on the act". In R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936, 946, para 35 Lord Woolf CJ referred to the lack of "evidence of there being a public flavour to the functions [of the body]". The issue in the Donoghue and Heather cases was whether the bodies whose decisions were the subject of challenge were public authorities within the meaning of section 6 of the 1998 Act. As Lord Woolf CJ pointed out in the judgment of the court in the Donoghue case [2002] QB 48, 69, para 65(i), section 6 "is clearly inspired by the approach developed by the courts in identifying the bodies and activities subject to judicial review". No doubt for this reason it was common ground in oral argument before us that (i) the tests for a functional public authority within the meaning of section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act and for amenability to judicial review are, for practical purposes, the same and (ii) the observations in both the Donoghue and Heather cases are equally relevant to the application of both tests. B C D

15 Since the completion of the oral argument, however, the House of Lords has decided the appeal in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] 3 WLR 283. We have had the benefit of further written submissions from counsel as to the effect of this decision on the appeal in the present case. The issue in the Aston Cantlow case was whether the decision of the church council to enforce a lay rector's obligation to meet the cost of chancel repairs was a private act or the discharge of a function of a public nature within the meaning of section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act. Certain observations were made as to the relationship between the public functions test in section 6(3)(b) and the test for amenability to judicial review, and I shall come to these later when I consider whether HFML acted as a public authority when it decided to exclude Mr Beer from the farmers' market programme. In my judgment, there is nothing in the speeches in the Aston Cantlow case which suggests that what was said in the Donoghue and Heather cases is not a useful guide to amenability to judicial review. Moreover, and unsurprisingly, their Lordships said nothing about the important market cases to which I refer at paragraphs 20–22 below. E F G

16 It seems to me that the law has now been developed to the point where, unless the source of power clearly provides the answer, the question whether the decision of a body is amenable to judicial review requires a careful consideration of the nature of the power and function that has been exercised to see whether the decision has a sufficient public element, flavour or character to bring it within the purview of public law. It may be said with some justification that this criterion for amenability is very broad, not to say H

A question-begging. But it provides the framework for the investigation that has to be conducted. There is a growing body of case law in which the question of amenability to judicial review has been considered. From these cases it is possible to identify a number of features which point towards the presence or absence of the requisite public law element. I do not propose to examine many of these authorities. Leaving aside the market cases, it seems to me that it is sufficient to refer to the two recent decisions which I have
B already mentioned.

17 The first is Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48. The issue in that case was whether a housing association was a public authority performing public functions for the purposes of section 6 of the 1998 Act. The housing association had obtained a possession order evicting the claimant from her
C home. She contended that the association was a public authority exercising a public function, and that her eviction violated her rights under article 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Lord Woolf CJ said, at pp 69–70, para 65 of the judgment of the court:

> "In coming to our conclusion as to whether Poplar is a public authority
> D within the Human Rights Act 1998 meaning of that term, we regard it of particular importance in this case that:
> "(i) While section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 requires a generous interpretation of who is a public authority, it is clearly inspired by the approach developed by the courts in identifying the bodies and activities subject to judicial review. The emphasis on public functions reflects the
> E approach adopted in judicial review by the courts and textbooks since the decision of the Court of Appeal (the judgment of Lloyd LJ) in R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815.
> "(ii) Tower Hamlets, in transferring its housing stock to Poplar, does not transfer its primary public duties to Poplar. Poplar is no more than the means by which it seeks to perform those duties.
> "(iii) The act of providing accommodation to rent is not, without
> F more, a public function for the purposes of section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998. Furthermore, that is true irrespective of the section of society for whom the accommodation is provided.
> "(iv) The fact that a body is a charity or is conducted not for profit means that it is likely to be motivated in performing its activities by what it perceives to be the public interest. However, this does not point to the
> G body being a public authority. In addition, even if such a body performs functions, that would be considered to be of a public nature if performed by a public body, nevertheless such acts may remain of a private nature for the purpose of sections 6(3)(b) and 6(5).
> "(v) What can make an act, which would otherwise be private, public is a feature or a combination of features which impose a public character or stamp on the act. Statutory authority for what is done can at least help
> H to mark the act as being public; so can the extent of control over the function exercised by another body which is a public authority. The more closely the acts that could be of a private nature are enmeshed in the activities of a public body, the more likely they are to be public. However, the fact that the acts are supervised by a public regulatory body does not necessarily indicate that they are of a public nature. This is analogous to the position in judicial review, where a regulatory body may be deemed public but the activities of the body which is regulated may be categorised private. A

"(vi) The closeness of the relationship which exists between Tower Hamlets and Poplar. Poplar was created by Tower Hamlets to take a transfer of local authority housing stock; five of its board members are also members of Tower Hamlets; Poplar is subject to the guidance of Tower Hamlets as to the manner in which it acts towards the defendant. B

"(vii) The defendant, at the time of the transfer, was a sitting tenant of Poplar and it was intended that she would be treated no better and no worse than if she remained a tenant of Tower Hamlets. While she remained a tenant, Poplar therefore stood in relation to her in very much the position previously occupied by Tower Hamlets." C

18 He said, at p 70, para 66 that there is no clear demarcation line between public and private bodies and functions. "In a borderline case, such as this, the decision is very much one of fact and degree." It is necessary to take account of all the circumstances. The conclusion of the court was that "the role of Poplar is so closely assimilated to that of Tower Hamlets that it was performing public and not private functions". D

19 The second recent decision is R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936. In that case the claimants were persons to whom the local authority owed a statutory duty to provide accommodation. It made arrangements for that accommodation to be provided at public expense by the Leonard Cheshire Foundation ("LCF"), a charitable foundation. LCF decided to close the home where the claimants had been living for many years. They applied for judicial review of the decision. The first issue was whether, in deciding to close the home, LCF was acting as a public authority exercising functions of a "public nature" within the meaning of section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act. Giving the judgment of the court Lord Woolf CJ said, at p 946, para 35: E

"The matters already referred to can, however, be put aside. In our judgment the role that LCF was performing manifestly did not involve the performance of public functions. The fact that LCF is a large and flourishing organisation does not change the nature of its activities from private to public. (i) It is not in issue that it is possible for LCF to perform some public functions and some private functions. In this case it is contended that this was what has been happening in regard to those residents who are privately funded and those residents who are publicly funded. But in this case except for the resources needed to fund the residents of the different occupants of Le Court, there is no material distinction between the nature of the services LCF has provided for residents funded by a local authority and those provided to residents funded privately. While the degree of public funding of the activities of an otherwise private body is certainly relevant as to the nature of the functions performed, by itself it is not determinative of whether the functions are public or private. Here we found R v HM Treasury, Ex p University of Cambridge (Case C-380/98) [2000] 1 WLR 2514, 2523, 2534–2535, relied on by Mr Henderson, an interesting illustration in relation to European Union legislation in different terms to section 6. F G H

A (ii) There is no other evidence of there being a public flavour to the functions of LCF or LCF itself. LCF is not standing in the shoes of the local authorities. Section 26 of the [National Assistance Act 1948] provides statutory authority for the actions of the local authorities but it provides LCF with no powers. LCF is not exercising statutory powers in performing functions for the appellants. (iii) In truth, all that Mr Gordon B can rely upon is the fact that if LCF is not performing a public function the appellants would not be able to rely upon article 8 as against LCF. However, this is a circular argument. If LCF was performing a public function, that would mean that the appellants could rely in relation to that function on article 8, but, if the situation is otherwise, article 8 cannot change the appropriate classification of the function. On the approach adopted in Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association C Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48, it can be said that LCF is clearly not performing any public function. Stanley Burnton J's conclusion as to this was correct."

The market cases

20 It is sufficient to refer to two of the market cases relied on by D Mr Maurici. The first is the well-known case of R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex p Hook [1976] 1 WLR 1052. The applicant applied to have quashed the decision of the council to exclude him from trading in the market and to revoke his right to have a stall. His application succeeded on the grounds that the decision had been taken in breach of the rules of natural justice. Ms Carrington submitted that this case (and indeed all the market E cases relied on by Mr Maurici: see paragraph 10 above) is distinguishable on the grounds that the decision was made by a local authority. Moreover, she pointed out that the market in the Hook case had been the subject of grant by royal charter and later a private Act. But I agree with Mr Maurici that neither of these factors was relied upon by the Court of Appeal as the reason for quashing the decision on the grounds of breach of natural justice. Lord F Denning MR said that the right of a stallholder to have access to the market was conferred by common law, and could only be taken away for just cause and then only in accordance with the principles of natural justice. He said, at p 1057D: "I do not mind whether the marketholder is exercising a judicial or an administrative function." It is clear that it was irrelevant that the marketholder was a local authority and that the market was authorised by royal charter and statute. What was relevant was that the stallholder had G the right at common law to come to a place to which the public had the right of access to sell his goods. The judgment of Scarman LJ was to similar effect. He emphasised the common law right in the public to go to market to buy and sell, subject to the statutory regulation of the exercise of that right by the local authority. He said, at p 1060:

H "Although, therefore, there is a contractual element in this case, there is also an element of public law, viz, the enjoyment of rights conferred upon the subject by the common law. I think, therefore, upon analysis, it is clear that the Barnsley Corporation in its conduct of this market is a body having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects."

There is no suggestion here that Scarman LJ attributed any relevance to the identity of the marketholder (the local authority) or the nature of the market (other than the fact that it was one to which the public had a right of access at common law).

21 The second decision is R v Wear Valley District Council, Ex p Binks [1985] 2 All ER 699. Here too the marketholder was the local authority. The applicant was a street trader who operated a hot food takeaway caravan from a market place. She had no written licence, and operated under what was described as an informal arrangement with the local authority. Her right to station the caravan in the market place was terminated without notice. Her application to quash the decision on the grounds that it had been made in breach of the rules of natural justice succeeded before Taylor J. He rejected the submission that decisions such as the Hook case [1976] 1 WLR 1052 were to be distinguished because the principles enunciated in them were only to be applied where there is a statutory market or something akin to a statutory market. In so doing he relied on a passage in the judgment of Templeman LJ in R v Basildon District Council, Ex p Brown (1981) 79 LGR 655, 667 to the effect that the status of the market was not relevant to the crucial question whether the stallholder's licence had been validly terminated. The exercise of the powers (in that case by the local authority) must be governed by the same principles whether in relation to a statutory market or an unofficial market managed by the local authority in the interests of the local community.

22 Having rejected this submission Taylor J continued [1985] 2 All ER 699, 703:

> "Moreover, in the present case the market place at Crook is conceded to be a place to which the public has right of resort at all times. It is not a highway, but it is nevertheless a place to which the public has a right of access and on which the council have a discretion whether to allow street traders or not. During the day, the market place is in fact used for a market. When it is not being so used between prescribed hours it is used as a public car park for which no charge is made. It therefore seems to me that the local authority in granting or revoking licences to street traders to operate in the market place are in exactly the same situation as that envisaged in the Basildon case by all three members of the Court of Appeal. It seems to me that there is a public law element in the decisions of the council with regard to whom they license and whom they do not license to trade in the market place."

Public authority

Summary of the parties' submissions

23 It was common ground that HFML is not a "core" public authority. It is a "hybrid" authority. It follows that the relevant question is whether the decision to exclude Mr Beer was a private act or the exercise of a public function. Both counsel rely on substantially the same factors in relation to this question as form the basis of their submissions on the amenability issue. In short Ms Carrington submitted that the act of HFML that Mr Beer seeks to challenge was not "governmental" in nature, but was of a private character. The assistance given by the council to HFML and the current use of public land are minor indicia which are insufficient to imbue what would

A otherwise be a private decision with a public stamp. Mr Maurici submitted that the guidance given by their Lordships in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] 3 WLR 283 in relation to hybrid authorities is not significantly different from that given in Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48 and R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936, and that for all the reasons given in relation to the amenability issue B the impugned decision was made in the exercise of a public function.

The Aston Cantlow decision

24 Much of the discussion in the speeches in the Aston Cantlow case [2003] 3 WLR 283 is on the question whether the parish council was a "core" public authority. The only general guidance on hybrid authorities C and what is a public function for the purposes of section 6(3) of the 1998 Act is to be found in the speech of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, who said, at p 288:

> "11. Unlike a core public authority, a 'hybrid' public authority, exercising both public functions and non-public functions, is not absolutely disabled from having Convention rights. A hybrid public D authority is not a public authority in respect of an act of a private nature. Here again, as with section 6(1), this feature throws some light on the approach to be adopted when interpreting section 6(3)(b). Giving a generously wide scope to the expression 'public function' in section 6(3)(b) will further the statutory aim of promoting the observance of human rights values without depriving the bodies in question of the E ability themselves to rely on Convention rights when necessary.
> "12. What, then, is the touchstone to be used in deciding whether a function is public for this purpose? Clearly there is no single test of universal application. There cannot be, given the diverse nature of governmental functions and the variety of means by which these functions are discharged today. Factors to be taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is F publicly funded, or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service."

25 Lord Hope of Craighead considered, at pp 296 and 303, paras 41 and 63 that the question of public function was fact-sensitive and did not admit of an answer in the abstract, an approach with which Lord Scott of Foscote agreed, at p 321, para 130. It is perhaps somewhat surprising that G there is no reference to the Donoghue case [2002] QB 48 or the Heather case [2002] 2 All ER 936 in the Aston Cantlow case. Ms Carrington submitted that these decisions have been "superseded" by the Aston Cantlow case. If by "superseded" she means that the two earlier decisions are to be taken as having been overruled, then I do not agree. As I have said, apart from what Lord Nicholls said, at p 288, paras 11 and 12, the Aston Cantlow case H contains no guidance as to what amounts to the exercise by a hybrid public authority of functions of a public nature. Provided that it is borne in mind that regard should be had to any relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence, then the passages which I have quoted from the judgments in the two earlier cases will continue to be a source of valuable guidance. Indeed, para 12 of Lord Nicholls's speech is redolent of the flavour of that guidance.

Conclusion

26 I can now state my reasons for concluding that Field J was right to decide that the decision of HFML which is challenged in these proceedings is amenable to judicial review, and that in making that decision HFML was acting as a public authority.

27 I should start by explaining why, in my judgment, if the decision is amenable to judicial review, it was by the same token made by HFML acting as a public authority. I accept that it is possible to conclude that a decision by a public authority is not amenable to judicial review and vice versa. This point was made very clearly by Lord Hope in the Aston Cantlow case [2003] 3 WLR 283, 299–300, para 52:

> "But, as Professor Oliver has pointed out in her commentary on the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case, 'Chancel repairs and the Human Rights Act' [2001] PL 651, the decided cases on the amenability of bodies to judicial review have been made for purposes which have nothing to do with the liability of the state in international law. They cannot be regarded as determinative of a body's membership of the class of 'core' public authorities: see also Grosz, Beatson & Duffy, Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000), p 61, para 4-04. Nor can they be regarded as determinative of the question whether a body falls within the 'hybrid' class. That is not to say that the case law on judicial review may not provide some assistance as to what does, and what does not, constitute a 'function of a public nature' within the meaning of section 6(3)(b). It may well be helpful. But the domestic case law must be examined in the light of the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court as to those bodies which engage the responsibility of the state for the purposes of the Convention."

E

28 Thus the domestic case law on amenability to judicial review can be "very helpful". But reliance on domestic cases must be tempered by, and sometimes yield to, relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence. This jurisprudence is especially likely to be helpful in determining whether a body is a core public authority. It is likely to be less helpful in relation to the fact-sensitive question of whether in an individual case a hybrid body is exercising a public function.

F

29 In the present case Ms Carrington has shown us no Strasbourg authority which points the way. Nor has she advanced any reasons peculiar to the public authority issue in support of the submission that, even if HFML's decision is amenable to judicial review, nevertheless it was not made by HFML in the exercise of a public function. In my judgment, she was right not to do so. On the facts of this case, and I would suggest on the facts of most cases, the two issues march hand in hand: the answer to one provides the answer to the other.

G

30 It is important to record the concession by Ms Carrington (in my view rightly made) that, if the decision to refuse Mr Beer's application had been made by the council before the incorporation of HFML, it would have been amenable to judicial review. The reason given by Ms Carrington for her concession was not that the decision would have denied a person access to a public market; rather it was that the decision would have been made by a public body, namely a local authority. In my judgment, the correct reason for the concession is more than the mere fact that the decision would have

H

A been made by a public body. Not all decisions by local authorities are amenable to judicial review or involve the exercise of public functions. The reason why I consider that the concession was correctly made is that the power being exercised by the council would have had that public element or flavour to which I have earlier referred. In this regard the fact that the power was being exercised in order to control the right of access to a public market is a most important feature.

B 31 I return to the decision that was actually made by HFML. It is clear from the market cases that decisions affecting the right of access to certain types of market may have a sufficient public element to be amenable to judicial review. There is a distinction between (a) an unofficial market in respect of which there are no public rights of access and (b) a statutory market in respect of which public rights do exist. A good example of the C former is a car boot sale held on a person's private land. The paradigm example of the latter is a statutory or charter market held on land dedicated to public use and to which the public has a right of access. Where do the markets held by HFML come within the spectrum of markets? It is true that HFML did not start to operate the markets until January 2002, a few weeks after the decision of 14 November 2001. But neither party has suggested that the situation that obtained at the time of the decision was not likely to D continue once HFML took over the running of the markets, or that it has not done so. The rather exiguous evidence as to the nature of these markets is not directed specifically at the time of the decision. But the brief summary that follows of the present position is the best evidence of the situation that existed at that time.

32 The markets are held on town centre sites. None of the sites is E owned by the council but they are all owned by other local authorities. Mrs Stokes says that the markets operated "on town centre sites in close association with the relevant local authorities". She does not explain exactly what she means by "close association with the relevant authorities". But she must mean that HFML and the local authorities who own the sites co-operate in the organising of the markets. The evidence also discloses that at Winchester the market stalls occupy a pedestrianised area and most of the F adjacent public car park. The pedestrianised area is used during the week by a conventional market.

33 In my view, it is clear from this evidence that these markets cannot be assimilated to the category of unofficial markets to which the public have no right of access. They are much closer to the second category to which I have referred, even though they are neither statutory nor charter markets. Their G essential feature is that they are markets held on publicly owned land to which the public have access.

34 What flows from this? There is much to be said for accepting the submission of Mr Maurici that, for this reason alone, the decision of 14 November 2001 is amenable to judicial review and that in making that decision HFML was exercising public functions and acting as a public authority. The decisions in R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, H Ex p Hook [1976] 1 WLR 1052 and R v Wear Valley District Council, Ex p Binks [1985] 2 All ER 699 show that the identity of the marketholder is not decisive, nor is the source of the power to hold the market. What is critical is whether the market is one to which the public has the right of access. It is this feature which led Scarman LJ in the Hook case to speak of the existence of "an element of public law" which opened the door to the remedy of certiorari for breach of natural justice. It was the same feature which led Taylor J in the Binks case to speak of a "public law element". It is significant that "public element" was the phrase used by Sir John Donaldson MR in R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815 to describe one of the essential elements of amenability to judicial review.

35 But I do not base my conclusion that there was a sufficient public element in HFML's decision of 14 November 2001 solely on the fact that it involved the denial to Mr Beer of access to a public market. I have already referred to Ms Carrington's concession that, if the decision had been taken by the council before HFML had been incorporated, it would have been amenable to judicial review. This concession brings into sharp focus the need to examine the relationship between the council and HFML. I accept the submission of Mr Maurici that there are several features of that relationship which strengthen Mr Beer's case that the decision is amenable to judicial review.

36 First, HFML owes its existence to the council. The company was set up by the council using its statutory powers. It was the council's economic development office which employed and paid for the services of Charles Morrison of Business Link Wessex to assist in the setting up of the company (it was bought "off the shelf"). The council's in-house legal practice undertook the necessary legal work. In the Donoghue case [2002] QB 48 it was a relevant feature which pointed towards there being a sufficient public element that the housing association was created by the local authority. By contrast, in R v Servite Houses, Ex p Goldsmith [2001] LGR 55, Moses J regarded the fact that Servite was a "private body which does not owe its existence to Wandsworth" as a factor militating against its function being within the scope of public law.

37 Secondly, HFML stepped into the shoes of the council. The phrase "standing in the shoes" of a public body derives from the Heather case [2002] 2 All ER 936, 946, para 35(ii). There is also a reflection of it in Lord Nicholls's speech in the Aston Cantlow case [2003] 3 WLR 283, 288, para 12 ("or is taking the place of central government or local authorities"). The phrase is not a term of art. But it is clear what it means. It connotes the idea of A performing the same functions as had previously been performed by B, to the same end and in substantially the same way. It was an important feature of the decision in the Heather case that LCF was not performing the statutory functions previously performed by the local authority under section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948. It was merely providing accommodation to the claimants. In the present case the council announced the 2002 programme of farmers' markets in 2001 before HFML started operating. They asked that applications for the 2002 programme be sent to themselves. After 2002 HFML took over the running of the markets, and ran them (as was always envisaged) in the same way as the council had previously run them. It is relevant that the three criteria for admission of farmers to the markets were the same as those promulgated by the council when the scheme was first established. These criteria were devised in what was perceived to be the public interest of promoting the interests of the local farming community. Ms Carrington drew attention to the fact that the main objects clause of HFML's memorandum of association was drafted in wide

A terms, so that it would be open to the company lawfully to change the criteria for admission to the markets, and operate them differently from the way they were previously operated, and indeed not operate markets at all. In theory this is true. Anything might happen in the future. But these proceedings are concerned with the lawfulness of the decision of 14 November 2001. At that time, in so far as HFML was doing anything at all, it had stepped into the shoes of the council in relation to these markets.

B 38 Thirdly, from the date of incorporation of HFML until the time when the company started operating the markets, and to some extent thereafter, the council assisted the company in a number of respects. For several months after incorporation the company's registered office was in the council's offices. The company has at all times been provided with a desk and computer in one room in the council's main building in Winchester. It C has not yet operated from anywhere else. The council agreed to make a discretionary grant to HFML to assist in the development of the markets. Two council personnel have provided important assistance to HFML, and continue to do so. Mrs Stokes is employed by the company as business development manager and is one of its directors. She played an influential role in setting up the company. She chaired the steering group that was established for that purpose. Ms Driscoll, the company's market manager, D was employed by the council until April 2002 when her employment was transferred to HFML. In November 2001 she was seconded to the company.

39 In my view, the combined effect of these three features (or groups of features) is sufficient to justify the conclusion that the decision of 14 November is amenable to judicial review. I regard the first two features as being of particular significance. To these must be added the fact that the E decision was one which affected a person's right of access to a public market.

40 What is Ms Carrington able to put into the scales as a counterweight to these points? She relied strongly on the fact that this is not a case involving the privatisation of the business of government, or the assimilation of HFML's role into a system of statutory control or regulation. It is true that HFML is not performing a function of statutory control or regulation on behalf of the council. The judge agreed that there is no statutory F underpinning of the company's role and its functions, and that those functions are not woven into a system of governmental control. In some cases the absence of such features may point decisively against amenability to judicial review. But it is necessary to have regard to all the relevant factors. In this case I do not consider that the absence of statutory underpinning and the lack of interweaving into a system of governmental G control is a matter of great weight. HFML was not simply another private company that was established to run markets for profit. It was established by a local authority to take over on a non-profit basis the running of the markets that the authority had previously been running in the exercise of its statutory powers in what it considered to be the public interest.

41 Ms Carrington also relied on the fact that the relationship between Mr Beer and HFML is consensual in character. The answer to this point was H provided by Scarman LJ as long ago as 1976 in R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex p Hook [1976] 1 WLR 1052. There is a consensual element in the case. But for the reasons that he gave, and for the additional reasons that I have sought to give in this judgment, there was also a public element too. This is a far cry from the paradigm case discussed in R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815 where, as in the case, for example, of a private arbitration, the sole source of power is a consensual submission to jurisdiction. A 42 There are some cases which may properly be described as close to the borderline. Lord Woolf CJ said that the Donoghue case [2002] QB 48 was such a case. But, in my view, that is not so here. It seems to me that the factors to which I have referred clearly compel the conclusion that the decision of 14 November 2001 is amenable to judicial review, and that in making that decision HFML was acting as a public authority within the meaning of section 6 of the 1998 Act. For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal. B

LONGMORE LJ

43 I agree with the judgment of Dyson LJ. For myself, I consider that the decision of the judge was correct for each of the two reasons identified by Dyson LJ, each reason being sufficient in itself to justify his decision. C

44 First, the market cases show that if a trader is denied the right to sell his goods in a place to which the public normally has access, that decision is a decision of public law and is amenable to judicial review. I do not think we could decide otherwise without overruling R v Wear Valley District Council, Ex p Binks [1985] 2 All ER 699. So far from overruling it, we should approve that decision and declare that it is good law. D

45 Secondly, the relationship between the council and HFML is such that, for that reason also, the decision of HFML to exclude Mr Beer is amenable to judicial review. I agree with the considerations set out in paras 28–30 of Dyson LJ's judgment and regard them as also justifying Field J's decision. E

46 Naturally, the combination of the two reasons makes the judge's decision that much more secure but, in my view, either reason alone would have been sufficient.

47 I would also like to record my agreement with para 25 of Dyson LJ's judgment in which he says that the decision of the House of Lords in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] 3 WLR 283 has not overruled Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48 or R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936; these cases continue to give authoritative guidance on amenability to judicial review. The claimant was an 84-year-old suffering from Alzheimer's disease and in respect of whom the first defendant council had a duty under section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948[1] to make arrangements for providing residential accommodation. Pursuant to its powers under section 26 of the 1948 Act, the council contracted with the second defendant company, an independent provider of health and social care services, for the claimant to be placed in one of its care homes, which accommodated both privately funded residents and those whose fees were paid by the council in full or in part. The claimant's fees were paid by the council, save for a small top-up fee paid by her relatives. The company subsequently sought to terminate the contract for her care and remove her from the home. The claimant, by her litigation friend the Official Solicitor, commenced proceedings in the Family Division of the High Court under CPR Pt 8 seeking, inter alia, declarations that it would not be in the claimant's best interests to be moved out of the home and that the company, in providing accommodation and care for the claimant, was exercising public functions within section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998[2] and would breach her rights under articles 2, 3 and 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, contrary to section 6(1) of the 1998 Act, were it to move her out of the home. The judge held as a preliminary issue that the company was not exercising a public function within the ambit of section 6(3)(b) and the Court of Appeal upheld that decision.

[1] National Assistance Act 1948, s 21, as amended: "(1) Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of this Part of this Act, a local authority may with the approval of the Secretary of State, and to such extent as he may direct shall, make arrangements for providing— (a) residential accommodation for persons aged 18 or over who by reason of age, illness, disability or any other circumstances are in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them . . ."

S 26, as substituted: "(1) . . . arrangements under section 21 of this Act may include arrangements made with a voluntary organisation or with any other person who is not a local authority where—(a) that organisation or person manages premises which provide for reward accommodation falling within subsection (1)(a) . . . of that section, and (b) the arrangements are for the provision of such accommodation in those premises."

On the claimant's appeal—

Held, dismissing the appeal (Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Baroness Hale of Richmond dissenting), that a distinction was to be made between the function of a local authority in making arrangements pursuant to section 21 of the 1948 Act for those in need of care and accommodation who were unable to make such arrangements for themselves and that of a private company in providing such care and accommodation under contract with the authority, on a commercial basis rather than by subsidy from public funds, in order for the authority to fulfil its section 21 duty; that the actual provision of such care and accommodation by the private company, as opposed to its regulation and supervision pursuant to statutory rules, was not an inherently public function and fell outside the ambit of section 6(3)(b); that it followed that a resident of a private care home placed there pursuant to sections 21 and 26 of the 1948 Act, though retaining public law rights as against the authority which had arranged the accommodation, did not have Convention rights as against the care home; and that, accordingly, the decision of the judge on the preliminary issue that the second defendant, in providing care and accommodation for the claimant, was not exercising a public function for the purposes of section 6(3)(b) would stand (post, paras 26–27, 29, 33, 35, 105, 114–115, 118, 120, 123, 126, 134, 138, 148, 155, 160, 170).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal

This was an appeal, by permission of the Court of Appeal, by the claimant, YL, by her litigation friend the Official Solicitor, from that part of the order of the Court of Appeal (Sir Anthony Clarke MR, Buxton and Dyson LJJ) dismissing her appeal against the order of Bennett J [2006] F EWHC 2681 (Fam) made in proceedings issued in the Family Division of the High Court under CPR Pt 8 against the first defendant, Birmingham City Council, and the second defendant, Southern Cross Healthcare Ltd ("the company"), the claimant's daughter, OL, and husband, VL, being named as third and fourth defendants, whereby on the claimant seeking, inter alia, declarations that (1) it would not be in the claimant's best interests to be G moved out of the company's care home, in which she had been placed pursuant to section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948 by the council, (2) the company, in providing accommodation and care for the claimant at the home was exercising public functions within section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998, and (3) to move the claimant out of the home would be contrary to her rights under articles 2, 3 and 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and H unlawful, the judge had held as a preliminary issue that the company, in providing care and accommodation for the claimant, had not been exercising a public function within section 6(3)(b).

The facts are stated in the opinions of Baroness Hale of Richmond and Lord Mance.

David Pannick QC, Ian Wise and Naina Patel for the claimant. The claimant enjoys Convention rights under the Human Rights Act 1998 against the care home in which she has been placed by the council in compliance with its statutory duty to provide her with accommodation as a person in need of care and attention by reason of age, illness or disability.

B

In deciding that the claimant should receive such care and accommodation, and formulating a care plan for her, pursuant to section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948 the council is performing "functions of a public nature" within section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act and acting as a public authority for the purpose of section 6 of the Act. In providing that accommodation and implementing the care plan the care home is also performing functions of a public nature and acting as a public authority. The decision in R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936 to contrary effect is wrong. Section 6(3)(b) focuses on function, not on the nature of the body providing it. Thus the status of the care home as a commercial enterprise is not in point. The function at issue is public in the classic, social welfare sense. The care is given in a statutory context: see Craig, "Contracting out, the Human Rights Act and the scope of judicial review" (2002) 118 LQR 551, 557.

One of the main functions of the 1998 Act was to implement the obligations of the United Kingdom under the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and section 6(3)(b) should, so far as possible, be construed consistently with that objective. Giving a wide scope to the term "public function" will further the statutory aim: see Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546, paras 9–12, 52, 87, 160.

E

Helen Mountfield for the OL and VL. Services are of a public nature where they are provided by the people as a whole in the form of legislation passed by a democratic legislature and funded, where necessary, by general taxation, regulated by legislation and available on the basis of publicly assessed need under arrangements which are made by, and on terms of which are negotiated by, a public authority acting on behalf of the people. The focus is on the function, not the nature of the body providing the services. The provision of care for old people on the basis of assessed need is a paradigm public function. The legal history of provision of accommodation for people who are in need of care and attention by reason of age shows that this has been regarded as a public function for at least 400 years.

G

Persons in the claimant's position are peculiarly vulnerable and unlikely to be able to enforce contractual rights or remedies. A "contractual" solution cannot provide proper protection of the rights of all affected persons. Nor are the continuing obligations of the core public authority sufficient to protect the rights of a care home resident or his or her family. Decisions affecting a resident's rights may also affect the latter's rights to respect for their private and family life under article 8 of the Convention, but the Care Standards Act 2000 does not impose any obligation upon a private care home to respect the private and family life of a member of a resident's family.

H

The accommodation in the same care home of those whose care was arranged by the state under section 21 and those who made their own

A private care arrangements does not render the provision of care for the former any less public. Different protective regimes may apply to the two cases.

Philip Sales QC and Cecilia Ivimy for the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs intervening. The phrase "functions of a public nature" is used in section 6(3)(b) in contradistinction to the concept of B functions and acts of a private nature: see section 6(5). It is necessary to assess whether public sphere features or private sphere features predominate in relation to the function in question. The interpretation of section 6(3)(b) should reflect the central purpose of the 1998 Act to give effect in domestic law to the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the United Kingdom under the Convention: see Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial C Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546, para 44 and R (Quark Fishing Ltd) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2006] 1 AC 529, para 34. The court should follow the approach of the European Court of Human Rights in determining under article 6(1) of the Convention the question whether rights fall within the public or private sphere by reference to common understandings of the role of the state. The D assumption of responsibility for the care of the elderly and disabled by the state is an indicator that the service being provided is a public service: compare Feldbrugge v The Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 425, para 34 and Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General) [1997] 3 SCR 624.

The provision of accommodation and care to a resident by a care home pursuant to arrangements made with a local authority under section 26 of the 1948 Act is a public function because it is a publicly funded and E regulated service intended to discharge the local authority's obligations under domestic public law in a area which is recognised as involving a central function of the state and to discharge the United Kingdom's positive obligations under the Convention.

A contracting state is subject to express and implied positive obligations under the Convention to secure rights: see Botta v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR F 241; Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175; Van der Mussele v Belgium (1983) 6 EHRR 163; Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom (1993) 19 EHRR 112; Woś v Poland (Application No 22860/02) (unreported) 1 March 2005; Sychev v Ukraine (Application No 4773/02) (unreported) 11 October 2005 and Buzescu v Romania (Application No 61302/00) (unreported) 24 May 2005. If a particular function has been identified by the European Court of G Human Rights as one which a state is under a positive obligation to carry out and that function is one which central or local government relies on a private provider to perform, that is a strong indicator that the function as exercised by the private provider is intended to be treated as a public function for the purposes of section 6(3)(b), in which case a claim may be brought directly against the private body. The provision of accommodation and care to those in need of it by reason of their physical health is such a function. By contrast, H the provision of accommodation and care by a care home to residents who have not been placed by a local authority but have made their own arrangements, the provision of accommodation for renting by private landlords which assists a local authority to discharge its duty towards homeless persons, and the provision of accommodation to children by foster parents fall outside section 6(3)(b). These are more in the nature of activities of a private character than a public character. A

Michael Fordham QC, Jessica Simor and Iain Steele for Justice, Liberty and the British Institute of Human Rights intervening. Where a state governmental body entrusts the discharge of a function of a public nature to a private sector body the function remains a public function. "Function of a public nature" in section 6(3)(b) refers to a function which the state has determined should be undertaken in the general interest to achieve some public policy objective. Once such a function has been identified its nature cannot be altered by the fact that it is being discharged using private sector bodies. B

The position at domestic public law is relevant when applying the concept of "public authority" which Parliament chose for the purpose of bringing Convention rights home. Common law standards of administrative law (lawfulness, fairness and reasonableness) are applicable by reference to the function being exercised, not the status of the body or the source of its powers: see R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815. Private entities with a business or commercial ethos can be the subject of public law obligations in respect of public functions which they undertake: see R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2610 and R (Beer (trading as Hammer Trout Farm)) v Hampshire Farmers' Markets Ltd [2004] 1 WLR 233. C D

Andrew Arden QC and David Carter for the council. Since the Poor Relief Act 1601 (43 Eliz 1, c 2) local authorities (or their predecessor bodies) have had the responsibility for the relief of destitution. At times this has involved the direct provision of services and facilities; at other times it has involved ensuring that an objective is achieved. The National Assistance Act 1948 in its original form imposed a duty on authorities to provide residential care for adults in need of care and attention, although they could discharge that duty through arrangements made with a voluntary organisation. As amended, the Act only requires an authority to make arrangements: see section 21(1). That function, in the sense of determining what is needed for the person and funding it, cannot be provided by the private sector and is a function of a public nature within section 6(3)(b). E F

Absent an express power to delegate or contract out, e g under section 70 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, local authorities cannot confer functions of a public nature on private care home providers. By contrast, some local authority functions involve the provision of services which are also provided by the private or voluntary sectors and which fall outside section 6(3)(b). G

Care of a person in need is a private act; to ensure the provision of care is a public function, but the execution of it is not. It is quite artificial to talk about actual care of the elderly being a public function—because actual care of the elderly is (and always has been) performed in many ways, e g by family, by paying for it, by charity. The public function is arranging for it. H

In determining whether a function is within section 6(3)(b) the test is not whether the ultimate source of income includes public funds. Even if a large part of the income of a care home comes from local authorities, that does not make the care home a "publicly funded" body. Nor is the test subjection to a

A regulatory regime. There is a wide range of private activity which is subject to regulatory regimes: see R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815 and R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, Ex p Aga Khan [1993] 1 WLR 909.

Regulation must be distinguished from control: regulation goes to how you do what you choose to do; control dictates what you do. There is no analogy between care services and the National Health Service, which is B clearly public. The latter is a state service, delegated to individual practitioners who make medical care decisions about an individual on behalf of the state. NHS doctors are not merely regulated as professionals; their activities are directly controlled in a number of respects.

Under Strasbourg jurisprudence, the United Kingdom's positive obligation is expressly limited to securing the provision of accommodation C and care. The state is not required to provide it. If a care home withdraws accommodation the obligation on the local authority is to arrange new accommodation. The United Kingdom Government would not be answerable at Strasbourg for the failure to require the private operator to continue the service.

There is no simple formula to govern every function. To take D responsibility for ensuring that provision is made for those dependent on public services and to fund that provision are public functions but to make that provision is essentially private. The "tipping point" between public and private is where the provision crosses over into an act being done for or to an individual. By analogy, an authority may undertake the public function of securing housing for a person but when it is taken up the tenant enters into a private law tenancy agreement.

E Residents of care homes are already protected by the regulatory framework provided by the Care Standards Act 2000 and the Care Homes Regulations 2001. Where a local authority has arranged accommodation for a person in a care home, the authority remains liable to that person for the discharge of its duties under section 21. The inability of the person to assert Convention rights against the care home does not amount to a F "protection gap". In the case of the proposed closure of a home, the care home could not be ordered to remain open whereas a local authority can be ordered to take action to keep it open under community care legislation. If an individual resident is threatened with eviction a publicly-placed resident is in no worse position than a private resident and, as in the instant case, the placing agreement between the care home, local authority and primary care trust will provide that the home may only give notice for a good reason the G validity of which can be tested in court. As to non-eviction issues, the resident has the protection of both the 2001 Regulations and the criminal law. The duty of the care home is to provide a system of good care. The duty of the local authority is to place a person where there is such a system.

Beverley Lang QC and Ivan Hare for the company. Section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 seeks to provide a domestic remedy for a breach of H the Convention where a remedy would be available in the European Court of Human Rights: see R (Quark Fishing Ltd) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2006] 1 AC 529, paras 33–34 and R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School [2007] 1 AC 100, para 29. The principal purpose of the Convention is to protect the rights of private individuals from violations by the state, not private bodies: see article 34 of the Convention, Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546, para 46 and Mykhaylenky v Ukraine Reports of Judgments and Decisions 2004-XII, p 153, paras 41–44.

The section 6 distinction between "core" and "functional" bodies is a device to capture within the scope of section 6(1) all those bodies carrying out functions of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom in Strasbourg. Where the Convention does impose a positive obligation on the state to take action to protect Convention rights, the state may be required to regulate relations between private individuals. Typically, the obligation will be to provide adequate procedures, remedies and safeguards against infringements of rights under domestic civil and criminal law. However, in such cases the state is not directly liable for the actions of private individuals, nor does the Convention impose any liability on private individuals or treat them as bodies exercising public functions: see X and Y v The Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235; Z v United Kingdom (2001) 34 EHRR 97; Storck v Germany (2005) 43 EHRR 96 and A v United Kingdom (1998) 27 EHRR 611. Thus a private school is not a public authority under section 6: see Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom 19 EHRR 112; R v Muntham House School, Ex p R [2000] LGR 255 and Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48, paras 59–60.

In the present case the care home is a private company carrying out private commercial functions. The relationship between it and the local authority (and that between the care home and resident) is governed by private law contract, not by statute. Under domestic law it cannot be required to provide accommodation for the claimant even if a court concludes that it is in her best interests to reside in that particular home: see A v A Health Authority [2002] Fam 213, para 53. Nor is it amenable to judicial review, as it is not a public body: see R v Servite Houses, Ex p Goldsmith [2001] LGR 55. The position of the care home is different from that of a privately run mental hospital or prison which is exercising coercive powers on behalf of the state: see R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2610, paras 17 and 25.

The only "public" feature is the status and function of the council in discharging its section 21 duty. Because of its continuing responsibility under section 21 the resident has a direct claim under the 1998 Act against the council for any breaches of article 8 of the Convention.

Rabinder Singh QC, David Wolfe and Samantha Knights for Help the Aged and the National Council on Ageing intervening by written submissions. When considering whether bodies fall within section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act the correct test is to focus on the character of the function in question, not the character of the person or organisation performing it. The Strasbourg jurisprudence is of limited assistance as the European court is primarily concerned with state obligations and liability rather than deciding whether liability falls on a body performing state functions in a domestic setting. There is nothing to prevent contracting states from making the Convention rights applicable to a wider range of bodies than would constitute the "state" as respondent in Strasbourg.

A Section 6(3)(b) should be interpreted so as to bring the residential care sector within its reach. The use of contracts between local authorities and care homes is not sufficient to secure compliance with the Convention. The residents for whose benefit the contract will be drawn up are unlikely to be able to participate in the negotiation process leading up to the contract and will not be sufficiently aware of their legal rights or be in a sufficiently strong bargaining position to ensure that those rights are adequately incorporated. B Standard form contracts may be made subject to exemptions or limitations, thus resulting in differing degrees of protection. Local authorities are not under any legal obligation to include Convention rights protection into contracts and, even if included, a third party may not be able to enforce it: see section 1(2) of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

It is anomalous that persons detained by compulsory powers are C protected by the 1998 Act (see R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2610 and HL v United Kingdom (2004) 40 EHRR 761) while older people in residential care homes are not. Older people are a group which is particularly vulnerable and in need of protection.

Robin Allen QC and David Wolfe for the Disability Rights Commission intervening by written submissions. Those residential care homes which D provide accommodation pursuant to arrangements with local authorities under section 26 of the National Assistance Act 1948 should be required to act compatibly with the Convention rights of their residents.

The Commission has a specific statutory role as regulator of the "disability equality duty" placed upon public authorities under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, as amended by the Disability Discrimination Act 2005. Since the term "public authority" is used in the E 1995 Act, as amended, as a condition for that duty being engaged, an interpretation of that phrase in the 1998 Act which tied the ambit of the term to the state's obligations under the Convention would risk affecting the reach and effect of the disability equality duty. "Public authority" in the 1998 Act must therefore be construed as including obligations imposed by the Convention but not limited by them.

Pannick QC in reply. Vulnerable individuals are entitled to effective protection: see Szula v United Kingdom (2007) 44 EHRR SE 237 and Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175. The distinction drawn between a duty to provide and a duty to arrange is unsustainable. Parliament imposed on local authorities a duty to provide accommodation, whether it is done by themselves or through a private body. The fact that the matter being G regulated is of a personal nature is no reason for excluding the Convention; rather, this is the area where the application of Convention rights is often most intense.

Section 6(3)(b) is not confined to cases where there are no other remedies. Its purpose is to set general standards which all public authorities should adhere to whether or not there are any other remedies. In enacting section 6(3)(b) Parliament was primarily concerned about functions which H the state had decided should be performed in the public interest, with the state accepting responsibility (by legislation or some other public instrument such as a Direction) for ensuring that the function was performed, whatever the legal status of the person who performed the function, especially if the function was performed at public expense (even if subject to a means test), and especially if the function was linked to Convention rights for which the state was answerable. A

The committee took time for consideration.

21 July. LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL

1 My Lords, the issue in this appeal is whether a care home (such as that run by Southern Cross Healthcare Ltd), when providing accommodation and care to a resident (such as Mrs YL, the appellant), pursuant to arrangements made with a local authority (such as Birmingham City Council) under sections 21 and 26 of the National Assistance Act 1948, is performing "functions of a public nature" for the purposes of section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998 and is thus in that respect a "public authority" obliged to act compatibly with Convention rights under section 6(1) of that Act. B C

2 For reasons more fully given by my noble and learned friend, Baroness Hale of Richmond, with whose opinion I wholly agree, I would answer that question in the affirmative. Despite the contrary opinions of my noble and learned friends, and of the Court of Appeal in R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936, I venture to think that the answer to the question is clear. For that reason, and because the issue is an important one, I give my reasons for reaching the conclusion I do. In doing so, I shall take as read, and will not repeat, Baroness Hale's survey of the facts, the legislation, the history and the authorities. D

3 Public authorities in the United Kingdom must not act incompatibly with a Convention right of anyone in the country. That is the effect of sections 6(1) and 1(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998. The same prohibition applies to any body which is not a public authority but certain of whose functions are of a public nature, save in respect of a particular act if the nature of that act is private. That is the effect of section 6(1) of the Act, read with section 6(3)(b), (5). Thus the question to be resolved is whether Southern Cross, as the owners and managers of the registered care home in which Mrs YL is resident, is in material respects exercising functions of a public nature not involving acts of a private nature. E F

4 Section 6 is a provision in a domestic statute, to be construed as such. Its meaning is not to be found in the Convention. The provision is found in a measure intended to give effective domestic protection to Convention rights as defined in and scheduled to the Act. It is accordingly appropriate to give a generously wide scope to the expression "public function" in section 6(3)(b), as Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead observed in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546, para 11. G

5 As Lord Nicholls also observed in the same case, at para 12, there is no single test of universal application to determine whether a function is of a public nature. A number of factors may be relevant, but none is likely to be determinative on its own and the weight of different factors will vary from case to case. Tempting as it is to try and formulate a general test applicable to all cases which may arise, I think there are serious dangers in doing so. The draftsman was wise to express himself as he did, and leave it to the courts to decide on the facts of particular cases where the dividing line should be drawn. There are, however, some factors which are likely to be H

A relevant, as Lord Nicholls recognised in para 12 of his opinion in Aston Cantlow.

6 It will be relevant first of all to examine with some care the nature of the function in question. It is the nature of the function—public or private?—which is decisive under the section.

7 It is also relevant to consider the role and responsibility of the state in relation to the subject matter in question. In some fields the involvement of B the state is long-standing and governmental in a strict sense: one might instance defence or the running of prisons. In other fields, such as sport or the arts, the involvement of the state is more recent and more remote. It is relevant to consider the nature and extent of the public interest in the function in question.

8 It will be relevant to consider the nature and extent of any statutory C power or duty in relation to the function in question. This will throw light on the nature and extent of the state's concern and of the responsibility (if any) undertaken. Conversely, the absence of any statutory intervention will tend to indicate parliamentary recognition that the function in question is private and so an inappropriate subject for public regulation.

9 Also relevant will be the extent to which the state, directly or indirectly, regulates, supervises and inspects the performance of the function D in question, and imposes criminal penalties on those who fall below publicly promulgated standards in performing it. This is an indicator of the state's concern that the function should be performed to an acceptable standard. It also indicates the state's recognition of the importance of the function, and of the harm which may be done if the function is improperly performed.

10 It will be relevant to consider whether the function in question is one E for which, whether directly or indirectly, and whether as a matter of course or as a last resort, the state is by one means or another willing to pay. The greater the state's involvement in making payment for the function in question, the greater (other things being equal) is its assumption of responsibility.

11 It will be relevant to consider the extent of the risk, if any, that improper performance of the function might violate an individual's F Convention right. In some fields, such as sport, the risk of infringing a Convention right might appear to be small; in relation to certain of the arts, the potential impact of article 10, for instance, could obviously be greater.

12 Certain factors are in my opinion likely to be wholly or largely irrelevant to the decision whether a function is of a public nature. Thus it will not ordinarily matter whether the body in question is amenable to G judicial review. Section 6(3)(b) extends the definition of public authority to cover bodies which are not public authorities but certain of whose functions are of a public nature, and it is therefore likely to include bodies which are not amenable to judicial review. In considering whether private body A is carrying out a function of a public nature, it is not likely to be relevant that public body B is potentially liable for breach of an individual's Convention right. The effect of the Act may be that both A and B are liable. It will in my H opinion be irrelevant whether an act complained of as a breach of a Convention right is likely to be criminal or tortious: the most gross breaches of the Convention—the improper taking of life, inhumane treatment, unjustified deprivation of liberty—will ordinarily be both criminal and tortious.

13 It is necessary to stress that no summary of factors likely to be relevant or irrelevant can be comprehensive or exhaustive. The present question may arise in widely varying contexts and on widely varying facts. Other factors may then call for consideration.

14 The nature of the function with which this case is concerned is not in doubt. It is not the mere provision of residential accommodation but the provision of residential accommodation plus care and attention for those who, by reason of age, illness, disability or any other circumstances are in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them.

15 Historically, the attitude of the state towards the poor, the elderly and the incapable has not been uniformly benign. But for the past 60 years or so it has been recognised as the ultimate responsibility of the state to ensure that those described in the last paragraph are accommodated and looked after through the agency of the state and at its expense if no other source of accommodation and care and no other source of funding is available. This is not a point which admits of much elaboration. That the British state has accepted a social welfare responsibility in this regard in the last resort can hardly be a matter of debate.

16 Sections 21 and 26 of the National Assistance Act 1948 confer statutory powers and impose a statutory duty. The duty is imposed on the relevant local authority. It may be discharged by arranging for the provision of residential care in a home run by itself, or by another local authority, or by a voluntary organisation (such as the Leonard Cheshire Foundation) or by a private provider such as Southern Cross. These are alternative means by which the responsibility of the state may be discharged. Counsel for the Birmingham City Council laid great emphasis on the fact that its duty under the Act is to arrange and not to provide. This is correct, but not in my view significant. The intention of Parliament is that residential care should be provided, but the means of doing so is treated as, in itself, unimportant. By one means or another the function of providing residential care is one which must be performed. For this reason also the detailed contractual arrangements between Birmingham, Southern Cross and Mrs YL and her daughter are a matter of little or no moment.

17 The provision of residential care is the subject of very detailed control by statute, regulation and official guidance, and criminal sanctions apply to many breaches of the prescribed standards. Little is left to chance, or the judgment of the particular provider.

18 Some of those for whom residential care is provided pursuant to sections 21 and 26 of the 1948 Act pay the full cost of the service they receive. A majority are subsidised to a greater or lesser extent out of public funds. No difference of legal principle depends on the group to which a particular resident, if accommodated and cared for pursuant to sections 21 and 26, belongs. The significant thing is that the state is willing to apply public funds to support those falling within sections 21 and 26 if, and to the extent that, they cannot pay for themselves, rather than leave them unaccommodated and uncared for. Those who need residential care but are able (through themselves or their families or other agents) to arrange it and pay for it fall into a different category, altogether outside sections 21 and 26. It is indicative of a function being public that the public are, if need be, bound to pay for it to be performed.

A 19 Those who qualify for residential care under sections 21 and 26 are, beyond argument, a very vulnerable section of the community. With children, mental patients and prisoners they are among the most vulnerable. Despite the intensive regulation to which care homes are subject, it is not unknown that senile and helpless residents of such homes are subjected to treatment which may threaten their survival, may amount to inhumane treatment, may deprive them unjustifiably of their liberty and may seriously B and unnecessarily infringe their personal autonomy and family relationships. These risks would have been well understood by Parliament when it passed the 1998 Act. If, as may be confidently asserted, Parliament intended the Act to offer substantial protection of the important values expressed in the articles of the Convention given domestic effect by the 1998 Act, it can scarcely have supposed that residents of privately run care homes, C placed in such homes pursuant to sections 21 and 26 of the 1948 Act, would be unprotected.

20 When the 1998 Act was passed, it was very well known that a number of functions formerly carried out by public authorities were now carried out by private bodies. Section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act was clearly drafted with this well-known fact in mind. The performance by private D body A by arrangement with public body B, and perhaps at the expense of B, of what would undoubtedly be a public function if carried out by B is, in my opinion, precisely the case which section 6(3)(b) was intended to embrace. It is, in my opinion, this case.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

21 My Lords, the opinions on this appeal prepared by my noble and E learned friends, Baroness Hale of Richmond, Lord Mance and Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury, which I have had the advantage of reading in draft, have described the facts that have given rise to this appeal and have lucidly explained the fairly complex statutory background applicable to the management of privately owned care homes and to the use of them made by local authorities pursuant to their statutory duties and responsibilities under the National Assistance Act 1948. I gratefully adopt, and hope not to repeat F unnecessarily, my noble and learned friends' exposition.

22 The issue which your Lordships must decide, as expressed in para 18 of the order of Ryder J of 12 September 2006, is whether the second respondent, Southern Cross Healthcare Ltd ("Southern Cross"), "in providing care and accommodation for YL [the appellant] is exercising a public function for the purposes of section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act G 1998". Bennett J held, on 5 October 2006, that it was not. The Court of Appeal, on 30 January 2007, agreed [2008] QB 1. But these decisions are challenged before the House by YL, supported by the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs and by Justice, Liberty, the British Institute of Human Rights, Help the Aged and Age Concern England, each an independent body. It is convenient to refer, briefly, to the statutory and factual background to the formulation of this preliminary issue.

H 23 The Human Rights Act 1998 incorporated into our domestic law the rights referred to in a number of specified articles of the European Convention on Human Rights. Section 6(1) of the Act said that "it [was] unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which [was] incompatible with . . ." any of these rights. The section did not contain any comprehensive definition of "public authority" but subsection (3)(b) said that a "public authority" included "any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature". However subsection (5) said that: "In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private." The effect of all this is that an act (or an omission) of a private person or company that is incompatible with a Convention right is not unlawful under the 1998 Act (it may, of course, be unlawful under ordinary domestic law) unless the person or company has at least some "functions of a public nature"; but even if that condition is satisfied the private person or company will not have any liability under the 1998 Act if the nature of the act complained of was private.

24 YL became a resident in one of Southern Cross' care homes on 3 January 2006. She became a resident under the terms of an agreement with Southern Cross signed on 20 February 2006. The agreement was signed on YL's behalf by her daughter. By a letter of 21 June 2006 Southern Cross gave the daughter 28 days' notice to terminate YL's right to remain in the care home. The agreement allowed Southern Cross to give four weeks' notice of termination but a contractual undertaking had been given by Southern Cross to Birmingham City Council ("the council") that notice of termination would be given "only for a good reason". There are unresolved issues as to whether Southern Cross did have "a good reason". YL contends that the notice given by Southern Cross was incompatible with her right under article 8 of the Convention to respect for her home and was unlawful under section 6(1) of the 1998 Act. Hence the preliminary issue directed by Ryder J to be tried.

25 The reason why I have referred to this statutory and factual background is that there are, in my opinion, two issues for your Lordships to consider; first, whether, for subsection (3)(b) purposes Southern Cross has functions of a "public nature", and, second, whether Southern Cross's act in serving notice to terminate its agreement with YL was an act the nature of which, for subsection (5) purposes, was "private".

26 My Lords, on both the issues to which I have referred I have reached the same conclusion for much the same reasons as my noble and learned friends, Lord Mance and Lord Neuberger. To express in summary terms my reason for so concluding, Southern Cross is a company carrying on a socially useful business for profit. It is neither a charity nor a philanthropist. It enters into private law contracts with the residents in its care homes and with the local authorities with whom it does business. It receives no public funding, enjoys no special statutory powers, and is at liberty to accept or reject residents as it chooses (subject, of course, to anti-discrimination legislation which affects everyone who offers a service to the public) and to charge whatever fees in its commercial judgment it thinks suitable. It is operating in a commercial market with commercial competitors.

27 A number of the features which have been relied on by YL and the intervenors seems to me to carry little weight. It is said, correctly, that most of the residents in the Southern Cross care homes, including YL, are placed there by local authorities pursuant to their statutory duty under section 21 of the 1948 Act and that their fees are, either wholly or partly, paid by the local authorities or, where special nursing is required, by health authorities. But the fees charged by Southern Cross and paid by local or health authorities

A are charged and paid for a service. There is no element whatever of subsidy from public funds. It is a misuse of language and misleading to describe Southern Cross as publicly funded. If an outside private contractor is engaged on ordinary commercial terms to provide the cleaning services, or the catering and cooking services, or any other essential services at a local authority owned care home, it seems to me absurd to suggest that the private contractor, in earning its commercial fee for its business services, is publicly B funded or is carrying on a function of a public nature. It is simply carrying on its private business with a customer who happens to be a public authority. The owner of a private care home taking local authority funded residents is in no different position. It is simply providing a service or services for which it charges a commercial fee.

28 The position might be different if the managers of privately owned C care homes enjoyed special statutory powers over residents entitling them to restrain them or to discipline them in some way or to confine them to their rooms or to the care home premises. The managers do, of course, have private law duties of care to all their residents and these duties of care may sometimes require, for the protection of a resident, or of fellow residents, from harm, the exercise of a degree of control over the resident that might in other circumstances be tortious. When the Mental Capacity Act 2005 comes D into force acts of that sort, in relation to persons who lack mental capacity, may attract a statutory defence to any civil action (see sections 5 and 6 of the Act). This, however, really does no more than place common law defences of self-defence or necessity on a statutory basis and does not, in my opinion, advance any argument about the "public nature" of the function being carried on by care homes.

E 29 An argument heavily relied on in support of the appeal has been a comparison of the management of a local authority care home with the management of a privately owned care home. There is no relevant difference, it is pointed out, between the activities of a local authority in managing its own care homes and those of the managers of privately owned care homes. The function of the local authority is unquestionably a function of a public nature, so how, at least in relation to residents the charges for F whom are being paid by the local authority, can the nature of the function of the managers of a privately owned care home be held to be different? So the argument goes. There are, in my opinion, very clear and fundamental differences. The local authority's activities are carried out pursuant to statutory duties and responsibilities imposed by public law. The costs of doing so are met by public funds, subject to the possibility of a means tested G recovery from the resident. In the case of a privately owned care home the manager's duties to its residents are, whether contractual or tortious, duties governed by private law. In relation to those residents who are publicly funded, the local and health authorities become liable to pay charges agreed under private law contracts and for the recovery of which the care home has private law remedies. The recovery by the local authority of a means tested contribution from the resident is a matter of public law but is no concern of H the care home.

30 As it seems to me, the argument based on the alleged similarity of the nature of the function carried on by a local authority in running its own care home and that of a private person running a privately owned care home proves too much. If every contracting out by a local authority of a function that the local authority could, in exercise of a statutory power or the discharge of a statutory duty, have carried out itself, turns the contractor into a hybrid public authority for section 6(3)(b) purposes, where does this end? Is a contractor engaged by a local authority to provide lifeguard personnel at the municipal swimming pool a section 6(3)(b) public authority? If so, would a local authority employee engaged by the local authority as a lifeguard at the pool become a public authority? Could it be argued that his or her function was a function of a public nature? If Southern Cross is a section 6(3)(b) public authority, why does it not follow that each manager of each Southern Cross care home, and even each nurse or care worker at each care home would, by reason of his or her function at the care home, be a section 6(3)(b) public authority?

31 These examples illustrate, I think, that it cannot be enough simply to compare the nature of the activities being carried out at privately owned care homes with those carried out at local authority owned care homes. It is necessary to look also at the reason why the person in question, whether an individual or corporate, is carrying out those activities. A local authority is doing so pursuant to public law obligations. A private person, including local authority employees, is doing so pursuant to private law contractual obligations. The nature of the function of privately owned care homes, such as those owned by Southern Cross, no different for section 6 purposes from that of ordinary privately owned schools or privately owned hospitals (nb some schools and hospitals may have special statutory powers over some pupils and patients e g reformatories in the olden days and mental hospitals these days), seems to me essentially different from that of local authority care homes.

32 It has been suggested that vulnerable elderly residents in care homes are in need of the extra protection that potential liability of private care home managers under section 6 of the 1998 Act would provide, and that section 6(3)(b) should be given a wide and generous construction accordingly. There is nothing, in my opinion, in this suggestion. It is common ground that it is a responsibility of government and, through government, of local authorities to establish a regulatory framework to provide legal remedies to those in care homes whose rights under the Convention might be breached by those in charge of them (see the cases cited by Lord Mance in paras 93 and 94 of his opinion). This regulatory framework is in place. A feature, or consequence, of it is that an obligation by Southern Cross to observe the Convention rights of residents is an express term of the agreement between the council and Southern Cross and is incorporated into the agreement between Southern Cross and YL. Any breach by Southern Cross of YL's Convention rights would give YL a cause of action for breach of contract under ordinary domestic law. No one has suggested that the contractual arrangements between the council and Southern Cross and between Southern Cross and YL are not typical. There is, in my opinion, no need to depart from the ordinary meaning of "functions of a public nature" in order to provide extra protection to YL and those like her. I would add that the ability of an inmate in a care home to challenge on article 8 grounds the efficacy of a notice to quit that was otherwise contractually effective would be subject to the same considerations that were explored and ruled upon by this House in Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] 2 AC 465.

A 33 For the reasons I have given I am unable to conclude that Southern Cross, in managing its care homes, is carrying on a function of a "public nature" for section 6(3)(b) purposes, whether the contractual charges are payable in respect of residents who are privately funded or are met out of public funds.

34 As to the act of Southern Cross that gave rise to this litigation, namely, the service of a notice terminating the agreement under which B YL was contractually entitled to remain in the care home, the notice was served in purported reliance on a contractual provision in a private law agreement. It affected no one but the parties to the agreement. I do not see how its nature could be thought to be anything other than private. In Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546 (referred to by Lord Mance in para 87 of his opinion) the C act, or acts, of the parochial church council ("PCC") held by the House to be private in nature were the steps taken to recover from private individuals the cost of repair to the chancel of the parish church. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead accepted that to some extent the state of repair of the church building affected rights of the public but said that a contract by the PCC with a builder could hardly be regarded as a public act: para 16. Lord Hope of D Craighead, explaining why the nature of the acts of the PCC were private, said that the liability of the defendants, lay rectors, to repair the chancel arose as a matter of private law: para 63. He went on, at para 64: "The nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce. It is seeking to enforce a civil debt" Lord Hope's emphasis was on the private law nature of the obligations sought to be enforced by the PCC. So here, the notice served by Southern Cross, whether E rightly or wrongly served, falls, in my opinion, to be tested by reference to YL's rights and Southern Cross's obligations under the agreement between them; by reference, that is to say, to private law. It was, in my opinion, an act the nature of which, for section 6(5) purposes, was private.

35 For these reasons, supplemental to those of my noble and learned friends, Lord Mance and Lord Neuberger, with which I am in full F agreement, I would dismiss this appeal.

BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND

36 My Lords, many services which used to be provided by agencies of the state are now provided, not by employees of central or local government, but by voluntary organisations or private enterprise under contract with central or local government. The issue before us is of great importance, both G to the many hundreds of thousands of clients of those services and to the organisations and businesses which provide them. To what extent, if at all, are they covered by the Human Rights Act 1998?

37 Under section 6(1) of the Act, it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. "Public authority" is nowhere exhaustively defined, but by section 6(3)(b) it includes "any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature". H However, in relation to any particular act, section 6(5) provides that "a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private". The broad shape of the section is clear. "Core" public authorities, which are wholly "public" in their nature, have to act compatibly with the Convention in everything they do. Other bodies, only certain of whose functions are "of a public nature" have to act compatibly with the Convention, unless the nature of the particular act complained of is private. The law is easy to state but difficult to apply in individual cases such as this.

The facts

38 The appellant is an 84-year-old woman with Alzheimer's disease. She and her family have lived in the area governed by Birmingham City Council ("the council") for many years. Since January 2006 she has been living in a nursing home owned and run by the second respondent ("the company"), a limited company which provides approximately 29,000 care home beds in the United Kingdom. Of these approximately 80% are funded by local authorities. When these proceedings began, 60 of the 72 residents in the appellant's home, including the appellant, were funded by local authorities and 12 paid privately.

39 The company has a contract with the council ("the service provision contract"). Under this, the company undertakes to provide accommodation for the residents placed with them by the council in accordance with the terms of the agreement and of the council's care plan for each individual resident. In return, the council agrees to pay the "SSD price" for each "SSD resident" (SSD stands for Social Services Department). In addition to residential care, the company also undertakes to provide the appropriate level of nursing care assessed to be needed for each resident, and the local NHS primary care trust agrees to pay for this.

40 Among the many detailed provisions about the standards of service to be provided are two of particular relevance to this case. Under clause 24.7.2, the service provider may only give notice of termination of a placement "for a good reason". And under clause 55.1:

> "The service provider shall and shall ensure that its employees agents and officers shall at all times act in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights within the meaning of section 1 of the Human Rights Act 1998."

41 The recitals to the agreement refer to the statutory duty of the council "to make arrangements for providing residential accommodation for persons in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them pursuant to section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948" (clause 4.1) and to the duty of the primary care trust "to assess and provide for the registered nursing care needs of the SSD residents who are resident at the care home, pursuant to the directions and guidance" of the Secretary of State: clause 4.3. I shall return to the statutory framework in due course.

42 For each SSD resident there is also a care home placement agreement, made between the council, the company and the resident (or someone acting on her behalf). This is expressly subject to and includes the specification and conditions of the current service provision contract between the council and the company. The company agrees to provide a service to the resident in accordance with that contract and with the individual resident's care plan. The resident agrees to pay direct to the council (unless directed otherwise) whatever sums the council has determined should be paid by the resident. The council undertakes to meet

A its obligations under the service provision contract, which expressly include arranging assessments and formal reviews of the resident's needs.

43 Coupled with the placement agreement there may also be a third party funding agreement. Under this a third party (usually a relative) agrees to pay a weekly "top up" amount "because the home chosen has a fee which is greater than the council would usually expect to pay". In this case, the appellant's daughter agreed to pay an extra £35 per week, on top of the B SSD price. The NHS contribution to the costs of nursing care was assessed at £129 per week.

44 In addition to the placement agreement, there is an agreement between the company, the council, the resident and the resident's receiver detailing, among other things, the specific accommodation and services to be provided and the payment arrangements. This agreement is to continue in C force until terminated by the death of the resident or by four weeks' notice in writing: clause 7.1. The company undertakes that it will "normally" only give notice if the fees are not promptly paid, the home is no longer able to meet the resident's needs, or the company "considers the circumstances or behaviour of the resident to be seriously detrimental to the home or the welfare of other residents": clause 7.2.

D 45 On 21 June 2006, the company wrote to the appellant's daughter stating that "in light of the continuing and irreconcilable breakdown in relationship between yourself and the home management and staff I am writing to formally give 28 days' written notice regarding your mother". This was prompted by concerns, which are disputed, about the appellant's husband's behaviour towards the appellant and her daughter's behaviour towards staff. When it became apparent that the company intended to serve E a formal notice to quit, the Official Solicitor launched proceedings on the appellant's behalf under the jurisdiction of the Family Division of the High Court to make declarations as to the best interests of people who are unable to take decisions for themselves.

46 Among the declarations sought was a declaration that the company, in providing accommodation and care for the appellant, was exercising public functions for the purpose of section 6 of the 1998 Act. F Ryder J ordered that this be tried as a preliminary issue. Both the High Court [2006] EWHC 2681 (Fam) and the Court of Appeal [2008] QB 1 decided this issue against the appellant, following the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936. Recognising the importance of the point, which has attracted considerable academic comment, the Court of Appeal gave leave to appeal G to this House.

47 Happily, following the first hearing in the Family Division, the council agreed to fund supervised contact between the appellant, her daughter and husband. The company has since withdrawn the request to remove the appellant from the home. The parties are now in discussions about arrangements for unsupervised visits. This is welcome, because a H consultant in the psychiatry of old age has reported that the appellant would certainly deteriorate clinically if she had to transfer to an unfamiliar care setting. It is also likely that any new care setting would be further away from her family home, making visiting more difficult for her 83-year-old husband, who visits her every day. He therefore has an independent interest in his own human rights in these proceedings.

48 It is to be hoped, therefore, that the future of this appellant is now more secure. The issue remains of great importance for the many thousands of other "SSD residents" who are looked after in care homes run by private companies or voluntary organisations.

The statutory framework

49 The National Assistance Act 1948 was part of the package of measures which created the modern welfare state. It stood alongside the Children Act 1948, which is the origin of our modern child care services, the National Insurance Act 1946, which laid the foundations of the modern social security system, and the National Health Service Act 1946, which created the National Health Service. The Education Act 1944 had already led the way in the fight against what Sir William Beveridge had called the "five giants on the road of reconstruction"—Want, Disease, Ignorance, Squalor and Idleness: "Social Insurance and Allied Services" (1942) (Cmd 6404), para 8. The education and health services were universal, in the sense that they were available to all, and originally without any charge, irrespective of ability to pay. But people who could afford to do so remained, and still remain, free to make their own arrangements if they wish. The social services were more limited, in that it was expected that families would continue to look after their children and their elderly or disabled relatives. But the social services were there to provide a safety net for those whose families could not look after them and from the start people were expected to pay what they could afford for the accommodation with which they or their children were provided. Once again, of course, there was nothing to prevent those with the means to do so from making their own arrangements.

50 Section 21(1)(a) of the National Assistance Act 1948 originally required each local authority to provide "residential accommodation for persons who by reason of age, infirmity or any other circumstances are in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them". Accommodation could be provided either in homes owned and run by the authority, or by another local authority (section 21(4)), or by a voluntary organisation (section 26), but not by private persons. Residents were required to pay for their local authority accommodation according to their ability to pay: section 22. Where accommodation was arranged with a voluntary organisation, the local authority was liable to pay for it and could then recoup a means-tested contribution from the resident: section 26(2)(3). Schemes were later replaced with ministerial approval and directions (section 195(3) of the Local Government Act 1972) and the relevant words of section 21(1) amended to read " a local authority may with the approval of the Secretary of State, and to such extent as he may direct shall, make arrangements for providing . . .": section 195(6) of, and para 2(1) of Schedule 23 to, the 1972 Act. Ministerial directions required that provision be made for people ordinarily resident in the area: DHSS Local Authority Circular 13/74.

51 But supply was never able to match demand. Many older people were accommodated in private residential homes but paid for by the state, through the means tested benefits system rather than by local authorities. This was widely regarded as inefficient and expensive, because there was no professional assessment of whether the resident really needed this expensive

A form of care, rather than to be helped to remain in her own home, nor was there any systematic control of the cost: see Audit Commission, "Making a Reality of Community Care" (1986) and Griffiths, "Community Care: Agenda for Action: A Report to The Secretary of State for Social Services" (1988). The result was Part III of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. Under this, each local authority must prepare and publish a strategic plan for the provision of community care services in B their area: section 46. They were instructed to develop a "mixed economy of care" making use of voluntary, not for profit and private providers whenever this was most cost-effective. They were to move away from the role of exclusive service provider and into the role of service arranger and procurer: Department of Health "Caring for People: Community Care in the Next Decade and Beyond" (1989) (Cm 849). To this end, section 26 C of the 1948 Act was amended to allow them to place residents with private providers as well as with voluntary organisations. The charging arrangements remained broadly the same, primary liability remaining with the local authority.

52 At the same time, local authorities were placed under a duty to carry out an assessment of the need for community care services of any person who might be in need of them (section 47(1)(a) of the 1990 Act) and then to D decide whether those needs called for the provision by them of any such services: section 47(1)(b). "Community care services" include arranging or providing accommodation under section 21(1) of the 1948 Act: section 46(3). If the person may also need health care under the National Health Service Act 1977, the local authority must invite the relevant health body to assist in the assessment. A large slice of the social security budget E was transferred to local authorities to enable them to meet these new responsibilities.

53 The appellant's case was a good example of how the system is supposed to work. She was first assessed as needing residential care in January 2005, but the family decided to continue looking after her at home with the help of social services. But eventually her health deteriorated to the extent that they could no longer do so. The local authority arranged the F placement with the care home provider and undertook to meet the charges under the tripartite contractual arrangements described above. The local authority has a continuing duty of assessment and remains responsible for the resident's welfare. The local NHS primary care trust assessed her health care needs, and found them to be in the high band, entitling her to a weekly contribution towards the nursing component in her care. This is paid direct G to the nursing home and will reduce the amount which the local authority would otherwise have to pay. The NHS contribution would also go to reduce the fees payable by a purely private resident for whom otherwise the contractual arrangements are quite different.

The Human Rights Act 1998

H 54 The purpose of the 1998 Act, as has so often been said, was to ensure that people whose rights under the European Convention on Human Rights had been violated would have an effective domestic remedy in the courts of this country, as required by article 13 of the Convention, and would not have to seek redress in the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. In the Labour party's consultation paper "Bringing Rights Home: Labour's Plans to Incorporate the European Convention on Human Rights into United Kingdom Law" (1996), by Jack Straw and Paul Boateng, it was said that: A

> "We take the view that the central purpose of the ECHR is to protect the individual against the misuse of power by the state. The Convention imposes obligations on states, not individuals, and it cannot be relied upon to bring a case against private persons. For this reason we consider that it should apply only to public authorities—government departments, B executive agencies, quangos, local authorities and other public services. An appropriate definition would be included in the new legislation and this might be framed in terms of bodies performing a public function. We would welcome views on this."

The Government's white paper "Rights Brought Home: The Human Rights Bill" (1997) (Cm 3782) explained the resulting clause in the Bill thus: C

> "The definition of what constitutes a public authority is in wide terms. Examples of persons or organisations whose acts or omissions it is intended should be able to be challenged include central government (including executive agencies); local government; the police; immigration officers; prisons; courts and tribunals themselves; and, to the extent that they are exercising public functions, companies responsible for areas of D activity which were previously within the public sector, such as privatised utilities." (Para 2.2.)

It is also worthwhile quoting the explanation given by the then Home Secretary, Mr Jack Straw, at the second reading of the Bill in the House of Commons (Hansard (HC Debates) 16 February 1998, col 773):

> E "Under the Convention, the Government are answerable in Strasbourg for any acts or omissions of the state about which an individual has a complaint under the Convention. The Government have a direct responsibility for core bodies, such as central government and the police, but they also have a responsibility for other public authorities, in so far as the actions of such authorities impinge upon private individuals. The Bill had to have a definition of a public authority that went at least as wide F and took account of the fact that, over the past 20 years, an increasingly large number of private bodies, such as companies or charities, have come to exercise public functions that were previously exercised by public authorities."

55 Two points emerge clearly from these extracts. One is that it was envisaged that purely private bodies which were providing services which G had previously been provided by the state would be covered. The second is that the Government were anxious that any acts for which the United Kingdom might later be held responsible in Strasbourg would be covered by the domestic remedies. Hence the definition would go "at least as wide" as that.

56 Strasbourg case law shows that there are several bases upon which a H state may have to take responsibility for the acts of a private body. The state may have delegated or relied upon the private body to fulfil its own obligations under the Convention: as in Van der Mussele v Belgium (1983) 6 EHRR 163, in which the provision of legal aid was delegated to the Belgian bar which required young advocates to provide their services pro

A bono; or, perhaps, in Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom (1993) 19 EHRR 112 where the fact that education is itself a Convention right was influential in engaging the state's responsibility for corporal punishment in private schools. The state may have delegated some other function which is clearly a function of the state to a private body: as in Woś v Poland (Application No 22860/02) (unreported) 1 March 2005, where the Polish Government delegated to a private body the task of allocating compensation received B from the German Government after World War II. The state may itself have assisted in the violation of Convention rights by a private body: as in Storck v Germany (2005) 43 EHRR 96, where the police had assisted in the illegal detention of a young woman in a private psychiatric hospital by taking her back when she ran away.

57 Above all, the state has positive obligations under many articles of C the Convention to take steps to prevent violations of an individual's human rights. These include taking general steps, such as enacting laws to punish and deter such violations: as in X and Y v The Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235, where Dutch law did not afford an effective remedy to a mentally disabled girl who had been raped by a relative of the directress of the care home where she lived. They also include making effective use of the steps D which the law provides: as in Z v United Kingdom (2001) 34 EHRR 97, in which a local social services authority did not use its powers to protect children whom they knew to be at risk of serious abuse and neglect.

58 Positive obligations arise under each of the articles most likely to be invoked by residents in care homes. Article 3 may afford them protection against inhuman and degrading treatment. Article 8 may afford protection against intrusions into their privacy, restrictions on their contacts with E family and the outside world, and arbitrary removal from their home. Article 5 may afford protection against deprivation of liberty. Regrettably, examples abound in the literature (I hasten to add, none of it with reference to the company involved in this case) of care homes where acts which might well amount to breaches of articles 3 or 8 are commonplace but might not amount to the criminal offence of ill-treatment or neglect. The following F example is taken from Jenny Watson "Something for Everyone: The impact of the Human Rights Act and the need for a Human Rights Commission" (2002) (British Institute of Human Rights):

> "An agency worker told us about going into a residential care home for older people at breakfast time. She was instructed to get the residents up and onto their commode. She was then told to feed them breakfast. G When she started to get the residents off their commodes first she was stopped. The routine of the home was that residents ate their breakfast while sitting on the commode and the ordinary men and women who worked there had come to accept this as normal."

59 Happily, there is now evidence in the literature that invoking human rights values in support of residents has produced change. The following H example comes from Sonya Sceats "The Human Rights Act—Changing Lives" (2007) (British Institute of Human Rights):

> "A learning disabled man in a care home became very anxious about bathing after slipping in the bath and injuring himself. Afterwards, in order to reassure him and build his confidence once again, a carer, usually female, would sit in the room with him as he bathed. His female carers felt uncomfortable with the arrangement . . . A discussion of the human rights principle of dignity had served as a 'trigger' for [one carer] and together with co-workers she was able to develop solutions that would both protect the man's dignity, whilst also providing him with the support he needed."

A

60 There is, of course, a difference between the negative obligation of the state to refrain from violating an individual's rights and the positive obligation of the state to protect an individual from the violations of others. But Storck v Germany 43 EHRR 96 is a good example of the willingness of the Strasbourg court to find several reasons for holding a state responsible for violations caused by private bodies. The most effective way for the United Kingdom to fulfil its positive obligation to protect individuals against violations of their rights is to give them a remedy against the violator.

Functions of a public nature

61 This is a domestic law concept which has no parallel in the Convention jurisprudence although the extracts quoted above give some indication of why it is in the Act. It is common ground that it is the nature of the function being performed, rather than the nature of the body performing it, which matters under section 6(3)(b). Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48 relied too heavily upon the historical links between the local authority and the registered social landlord, rather than upon the nature of the function itself which was the provision of social housing.

D

62 The contrast is drawn in the Act between "public" functions and "private" acts. This cannot refer to whether or not the acts are performed in public or in private. There are many acts performed in public (such as singing in the street) which have nothing to do with public functions. And there are many acts performed in private which are nevertheless in the exercise of public functions (such as the care of prisoners or compulsory psychiatric patients). The contrast is between what is "public" in the sense of being done for or by or on behalf of the people as a whole and what is "private" in the sense of being done for one's own purposes.

63 Hence it is common ground that "functions of a public nature" include the exercise of the regulatory or coercive powers of the state. Thus, were a public authority to have power to delegate the task of regulating care homes to a private body, that regulation would be a function of a public nature. Again, it is common ground that privately run prisons perform functions of a public nature. In a similar category are private psychiatric hospitals when exercising their powers of compulsory detention under the Mental Health Act 1983: see R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2610, 2619. This is so, even though the power to detain rests with the hospital managers rather than with a state body by whom it has been delegated.

H

64 The respondents argue that the concept should go no further than this. The appellants, with the support of all the interveners including the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, would go further. As Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead pointed out in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546, 555,

A para 10 "the phrase used in the Act is public function, not governmental function". He went on, in paras 11 and 12:

> "11. . . . Giving a generously wide scope to the expression 'public function' in section 6(3)(b) will further the statutory aim of promoting the observance of human rights values without depriving the bodies in question of the ability themselves to rely on Convention rights when B necessary.
> "12. What, then, is the touchstone to be used in deciding whether a function is public for this purpose? Clearly there is no single test of universal application. There cannot be, given the diverse nature of governmental functions and the variety of means by which these function are discharged today. Factors to be taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, C or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service."

65 Those factors tell heavily in favour of section 6(3)(b) applying to this case. While there cannot be a single litmus test of what is a function of a public nature, the underlying rationale must be that it is a task for which the public, in the shape of the state, have assumed responsibility, at public D expense if need be, and in the public interest.

66 One important factor is whether the state has assumed responsibility for seeing that this task is performed. In this case, there can be no doubt that the state has undertaken the responsibility of securing that the assessed community care needs of the people to whom section 21(1)(a) of the National Assistance Act 1948 applies are met. In the modern "mixed E economy of care", those needs may be met in a number of ways. But it is artificial and legalistic to draw a distinction between meeting those needs and the task of assessing and arranging them, when the state has assumed responsibility for seeing that both are done.

67 Another important factor is the public interest in having that task undertaken. In a state which cares about the welfare of the most vulnerable members of the community, there is a strong public interest in having people F who are unable to look after themselves, whether because of old age, infirmity, mental or physical disability or youth, looked after properly. They must be provided with the specialist care, including the health care, that they need even if they are unable to arrange or pay for it themselves. No-one can doubt that providing health care can be a public function, even though it can also be provided purely privately. This home was providing health care by G arrangement with the National Health Service as well as social care by arrangement with the local social services authority. It cannot be doubted that the provision of health care was a public function.

68 Another important factor is public funding. Not everything for which the state pays is a public function. The supply of goods and ancillary services such as laundry to a care home may well not be a public function. But providing a service to individual members of the public at public expense H is different. These are people for whom the public have assumed responsibility. There may be other residents in the home for whom the public have not assumed responsibility. They may not have a remedy against the home under the Human Rights Act, although there may well be circumstances in which they would. But they will undoubtedly benefit from the human rights values which must already infuse the home's practices as a result of clause 55.1 of the service provision contract.

69 Another factor is whether the function involves or may involve the use of statutory coercive powers. All in-patients receiving treatment for psychiatric disorder are potentially vulnerable to detention under section 5 of the Mental Health Act 1983. This means that their capacity for self-determination is diminished and their vulnerability to human rights abuses increased even before any compulsory powers are invoked. Currently, the Mental Capacity Act 2005 provides for the restraint of a person who lacks the capacity to decide for herself, but only in that person's best interests and if certain conditions are fulfilled: see sections 5(1), 6(1)–(4). It does not provide for the deprivation of liberty within the meaning of article 5(1) of the Convention, whether or not the defendant is a public authority: see section 6(5).

70 However, the unregulated deprivation of liberty which is frequently practised upon people who lack the capacity to decide for themselves under the common law doctrine of necessity has been held to contravene article 5 of the Convention: see HL v United Kingdom (2004) 40 EHRR 761. Given the approach of the Strasbourg court in Storck v Germany 43 EHRR 96, it is perhaps unlikely that the United Kingdom would be absolved from responsibility for deprivations of liberty taking place in private care homes. Hence provisions to safeguard incapacitated people who are deprived of their liberty will be inserted into the Mental Capacity Act 2005 by the Mental Health Bill currently going through Parliament. These will apply to residents in care homes as well as in hospital. The use or potential use of statutory coercive powers is a powerful consideration in favour of this being a public function.

71 Finally, then, there is the close connection between this service and the core values underlying the Convention rights and the undoubted risk that rights will be violated unless adequate steps are taken to protect them.

72 The fact that other people are free to make their own private arrangements does not prevent a function which is in fact performed for this person pursuant to statutory arrangements and at public expense from being a function of a public nature. People are free to provide their own transport rather than to use the publicly provided facilities. People are free to arrange their own health care rather than to use the National Health Service. Nor does the fact that people pay for or towards the service they receive necessarily prevent its provision being a function of a public nature. National Health Service dentistry is no less a function of a public nature because those patients who can afford to do so pay for it. I accept that not every function which is performed by a "core" public authority is necessarily a "function of a public nature"; but the fact that a function is or has been performed by a core public authority for the benefit of the public must, as Lord Nicholls pointed out in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, para 12, be a relevant consideration.

Conclusion

73 Taken together, these factors lead inexorably to the conclusion that the company, in providing accommodation, health and social care for the appellant, was performing a function of a public nature. This was a function performed for the appellant pursuant to statutory arrangements, at public

A expense and in the public interest. I have no doubt that Parliament intended that it be covered by section 6(3)(b). The Court of Appeal was wrong to reach a different conclusion on indistinguishable facts in R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936. Furthermore, an act in relation to the person for whom the public function is being put forward cannot be a "private" act for the purpose of section 6(5) (although other acts, B such as ordering supplies, may be). The company is therefore potentially liable to the appellant (as well as to the council) for any breaches of her Convention rights.

74 We have not been concerned with whether her rights have been or might be breached in this case. It is common ground that the company may seek to justify any invasions of her qualified rights. Whether "the rights . . . of others" for this purpose includes the rights of the company itself is a C question for another day. But it is also common ground that the company, being a "non-governmental organisation" for the purpose of article 34 of the Convention, may complain of violations of its own Convention rights, as pointed out by Lord Nicholls in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, para 11. Any court would have to strike a fair balance between the competing rights.

75 For these reasons, in amplification of those given by my noble and D learned friend, Lord Bingham of Cornhill, with which I agree, I would allow this appeal and make the declaration sought.

LORD MANCE

Introduction

76 My Lords, does a privately owned, profit-earning care home E providing care and accommodation for a publicly funded resident have "functions of a public nature", and is it therefore a public authority, under section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998? The second respondent, Southern Cross Healthcare Ltd ("Southern Cross") is such a care home. It has some 29,000 beds in the United Kingdom. About 80% of its residents benefit by full or partial local authority funding. The appellant, YL, is 84 years old and suffers from Alzheimer's Disease. She has lived in a F Southern Cross care home since 3 January 2006. Her residence is largely funded by the first respondent, Birmingham City Council ("the council"). It is covered by a "three way" placement agreement signed on 20 February 2006 by Southern Cross as "the provider [homeowner]", the council and the third respondent, OL (YL's daughter), acting on behalf of YL, as well as by a third party funding agreement between the council and OL. Under these G agreements Southern Cross receives a basic fee from the council and a top-up fee from OL. A further tripartite agreement dated 10 March 2006 records that Southern Cross's fee was £478 per week including the top up fee of £35 per week, and that each party [i e the council and YL/OL] "will only be liable for their own agreed proportion".

77 The council in arranging the placement acted pursuant to its duty under section 21 the National Assistance Act 1948. Because Southern H Cross's fee for residence in the care home chosen by or on behalf of YL was greater than the council would usually expect to pay, the council was only obliged to agree to the placement upon a third party (YL or, in this case, OL) agreeing to meet the top up fee: section 54 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001 and regulation 4 the National Assistance (Residential Accommodation) (Additional Payments and Assessment of Resources) (Amendment) (England) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/3441). In May 2006 the local primary care trust, South Birmingham NHS, authorised additional higher band nursing care, pursuant to its responsibility under section 3 of the National Health Service Act 1977, and section 49 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001, and an additional weekly figure (around £130) became payable on that account by South Birmingham NHS to Southern Cross. Although in the case of YL Southern Cross thus received fees under three heads from three sources, in the case of other residents and/or care homes fees for care and accommodation could be covered by a simple arrangement between the local authority and the care home. There were also resident in YL's and other care homes a number of "self-funders", that is residents who or whose relatives had arranged their own placement and met their fees themselves.

78 The issue of principle which the House must address is general and continuing, although the particular difficulties which led to this litigation have happily resolved themselves. They arose from allegations (strongly disputed) about the conduct of OL and YL's husband, VL, during visits, followed by a notice given by the care home to OL to have YL moved. In response YL invoked section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act and article 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms against Southern Cross as well as the council. The potential relevance of the issue is not confined to article 8. If, under section 6(3)(b) of the Act, the Convention applies against Southern Cross, then in other circumstances (not suggested as applicable in this case) other articles of the Convention—such as some or all of articles 3 to 5 and 9 to 11—might apply. Further, if the Convention applies, then relatives such as YL's husband, VL, might in some circumstances be able directly to invoke the Convention (e g under article 8 in respect of the right to visit). However, the domestic case law in this field to date suggests that the main impact of the Convention, if applicable, would be in the area of closure of care homes or termination of residence for other reasons.

79 Whether the Convention applies under section 6(3)(b) does not depend upon whether other common law, statutory or contractual protection anyway exists. But on each side reference has been made to the extensive regulation of care homes, generally under statute and contractually in the case of this particular care home. Under the Care Standards Act 2000 and the Care Homes Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/3965), any care home must establish its fitness and obtain registration from the Commission for Social Care Inspection ("CSCI"). Its operations must comply with substantial and detailed regulations, backed by a procedure for complaints to the CSCI and in many cases by criminal sanctions. Under section 23 of the 2000 Act, the Secretary of State for Health is empowered to prepare and publish statements of national minimum standards. These are to be taken into account by the CSCI in relation to registration and in any proceedings for an offence under the regulations. The third edition of such national minimum standards "Care Homes for Older People" published in February 2003 extends to over 91 pages. Standard 13 requires service users to be able to have visitors of their choice in private at any reasonable time.

80 As to contract, the tripartite placement agreement incorporated (cf the opening paragraph of its introduction and clauses 1 and 2(5)) a set of

A general contractual conditions agreed between the council and Southern Cross. These restricted Southern Cross's right to give notice of termination to circumstances where it had "good reason" (clause 24.7.2). Southern Cross also undertook that its service to residents would comply with the national minimum standards published under section 23 (clause 6.2.1), and that its employees, agents and officers would "at all times act in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights within the meaning of section 1 of B the Human Rights Act 1998" (clause 55.1). That general tort and criminal law would also cover abuse of residents is evident. But, as stated, the issue for decision by the House does not depend upon the existence of protections other than the Convention.

Section 6(1)

C 81 Section 6(1) of the 1998 Act makes it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. Section 6(3) includes in the concept of a public authority "(a) a court or tribunal, and (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature". But section 6(5) provides that: "In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is D private". Thus, the section identifies two types of public authority—"core" public authorities who are to be so regarded in relation to all their functions and "hybrid" persons with functions both of a public and of a private nature who are only to be so regarded when the nature of their particular act under consideration is public rather than private.

The parties' submissions

E 82 The interpretation and application of section 6(3)(b) have been left by Parliament to the courts. A range of approaches to section 6(3)(b) was advocated before the House. Mr Andrew Arden for the council and Miss Beverly Lang for Southern Cross distinguish the council's public law functions in placing and funding YL in the care home from Southern Cross's private law activities under contract in running the care home. In contrast, F Mr David Pannick for YL and Miss Helen Mountfield for OL and VL describe Southern Cross as performing functions of the state, in the form here of the council. Thus, in reply, Mr Pannick suggested that Parliament was in section 6(3)(b):

> "primarily concerned about functions which the state has decided should be performed in the public interest, with the state accepting G responsibility (by legislation or some other public instrument such as a Direction) for ensuring that the function is performed, whatever the legal status of the person who performs the function, especially if the function is performed at public expense (even if subject to a means test), and especially if the function is linked to Convention rights for which the state is answerable."

H Mr Pannick invited the House to confine its attention to care homes. But some consideration of wider implications is necessary. On Mr Pannick's formulation, any contractor agreeing with a governmental authority to supply goods or services, the supply of which fulfils a responsibility incumbent on that authority in the public interest, will itself in that regard be a public authority. Mr Pannick suggested that section 6(3)(b) would exclude "incidental" services undertaken by private contractors such as window cleaning, but it is not easy to see on what principle, at least if the cleaning was of premises let by the council to its tenants rather than of the council's offices.

83 Mr Philip Sales for the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs as intervener was, in contrast, concerned to look more widely. He advances a nuanced, "factor-based" test, with limitation of the application of section 6(3)(b) avowedly in mind. He submits that contracting out by a governmental authority of services involved in a particular function of that authority does not of itself make the contractor a public authority. Other factors have to be examined. In his submission Southern Cross was and is a public authority within section 6(3)(b) because its services discharge the local authority's duty, are publicly funded, are subject to detailed and intensive regulation and are not services which the beneficiaries of the services could provide for themselves, and there is an immediate and direct link between the services and Convention rights, such that state responsibility might be engaged by the manner of their performance.

84 In oral submissions Mr Sales added that, had Southern Cross had coercive powers (e g to detain), that would have been another pointer. In written submissions after the hearing, Mr Sales suggests that this last factor applies to this case in the light of section 22(5)(b) of the Care Standards Act 2000 and regulation 13(7)(8) of the Care Homes Regulations 2001, and will be reinforced when the Mental Capacity Act 2005 come into force. But in my view the former provisions do no more than reflect the common law doctrine of necessity, and anyway only operate in limited circumstances, while the 2005 Act, not yet in force, will apply (expressly) to all carers whether or not they are a public authority, and is neutral. None of these provisions assists analysis of the general activity of providing accommodation and care to care home residents.

85 Mr Sales also suggests, as a further factor, that the existence of an essentially private or personal element in a relationship between a service provider and the beneficiary (as with fostering) would point against any conclusion that the provider (e g a foster parent) was a public authority. But Mr Pannick responds that it is often where there are private relationships that the protection of the Convention is most needed, and Mr Fordham for Justice, Liberty and the British Institute of Human Rights as interveners positively asserts that foster parents are a public authority under section 6(3)(b). Another category which Mr Sales argues falls outside section 6(3)(b) is the private landlord, with whom or which a local authority makes arrangements for the provision of accommodation in discharge of its duties to the homeless under sections 188, 190, 200 or 204(4) of the Housing Act 1996. Mr Pannick would wish to leave that open, while Mr Fordham submits that private landlords generally should be seen as falling within section 6(3)(b), whenever the accommodation is paid for by public funding, even if only by housing benefit. In the event, I consider that it is unnecessary and unwise to follow Mr Sales and Mr Fordham into any definite analysis of these particular cases, the circumstances of which have not been examined at all closely before the House.

A Guidance to the interpretation of section 6(3)(b)

86 Section 6(3)(b) is a domestic law provision with no direct parallel in European human rights or domestic jurisprudence. Various guides to its interpretation have been suggested. In Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] QB 48, para 65, Lord Woolf CJ considered that section 6 was "clearly inspired by the approach B developed by the courts in identifying the bodies and activities subject to judicial review". Several recent authorities (e g R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2610 and R (Beer (trading as Hammer Trout Farm)) v Hampshire Farmers' Markets Ltd [2004] 1 WLR 233) have indeed assimilated the tests.

87 However, it is clear from the House's decision in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC C 546 and R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School [2007] 1 AC 100 that, while authorities on judicial review can be helpful, section 6 has a different rationale, linked to the scope of state responsibility in Strasbourg. In the latter case, at para 29, my noble and learned friend, Lord Bingham of Cornhill, said of the Act's general aim that:

D "the purpose of the Human Rights Act 1998 was not to enlarge the rights or remedies of those in the United Kingdom whose Convention rights have been violated but to enable those rights and remedies to be asserted and enforced by the domestic courts of this country and not only by recourse to Strasbourg."

In Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, section 6 was specifically addressed. E My noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead said, at para 6:

"the broad purpose sought to be achieved by section 6(1) is not in doubt. The purpose is that those bodies for whose acts the state is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights shall in future be subject to a domestic law obligation not to act incompatibly with Convention rights."

F The rationale was further spelled out by my noble and learned friend, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry who said, at para 160:

"Prima facie . . . when Parliament enacted the 1998 Act . . . the intention was to make provision in our domestic law to ensure that the bodies carrying out the functions of government in the United Kingdom G observed the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention. Parliament chose to bring this about by enacting inter alia section 6(1), which makes it unlawful for 'a public authority' to act in a way that is incompatible with a Convention right. A purposive construction of that section accordingly indicates that the essential characteristic of a public authority is that it carries out a function of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg organs."

H In para 163 Lord Rodger concluded that:

"In the present case the question therefore comes to be whether a PCC is a public authority in the sense that it carries out, either generally or on the relevant occasion, the kind of public function of government which would engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the Strasbourg organs."

My noble and learned friends, Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough and Lord Scott of Foscote, all, I understand, accepted this rationale, at paras 52, 87 and 129 respectively. Lord Hope observed that, although the domestic case law on judicial review might be helpful, it could not be determinative of what is a core or hybrid public authority and "must be examined in the light of the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court as to those bodies which engage the responsibility of the state for the purposes of the Convention".

88 Section 6(3)(b) merely elucidates section 6(1), to which Lord Nicholls and Lord Rodger referred in paras 6 and 160. Further, Lord Rodger's use of the phrase "either generally or on the relevant occasion" in para 163 makes explicit that the rationale applies as much to the identification of a person exercising a function of a public nature under section 6(3)(b) as it does to the identification of a core public authority.

89 A second point which emerges from Aston Cantlow is that, with the general purpose of section 6 thus identified, the rule in Pepper v Hart [1993] AC 593 provides no further assistance. In paras 161 to 162, Lord Rodger expressly rejected a submission that reference to Hansard was permissible as an aid to construing the term "public authority" in section 6 (adding only that, had it been, it would have confirmed his view). Lord Hope agreed, at para 37, that the Court of Appeal had (in rejecting a contrary submission based on Pepper v Hart: cf [2002] Ch 51, para 29) rightly declined to look at Hansard for assistance. Lord Scott, in agreeing, at para 129, with the reasons given by Lord Hope and Lord Rodger for concluding that the parish council of Aston Cantlow was not a core public authority, can, as I read his opinion, also be taken to have agreed with their rejection of Hansard, although disagreeing on the application of section 6(3)(b). No submission was made to the House to the effect that any of these statements was wrong, or that Pepper v Hart has any greater relevance on this appeal than in Aston Cantlow.

90 The House was shown two substantial, and informative, reports of the Joint Committee on Human Rights of the House of Lords and House of Commons on "The Meaning of Public Authority under the Human Rights Act" (the Seventh Report of Session 2003–04, HL 39 and HC 382, and the Ninth Report of Session 2006–07, HL 77 and HC 410). But, so far as these reports recite particular statements made during either House's consideration of the 1998 Act (which, on any issue relevant to this appeal, seem to have been very limited), such statements must be left on one side. So far as these reports proceed on the basis that Parliament had any particular intention, that is the issue which the House has to determine according to relevant principles of statutory construction.

91 Thirdly, Lord Nicholls at paras 7 to 12 in Aston Cantlow expressed more detailed views on the characteristics of those bodies or persons which might constitute either core or hybrid public authorities. At para 7, he said that "behind the instinctive classification" as "governmental", and as core public authorities, of organisations such as government departments, local authorities, the police and the armed forces lay "factors such as the possession of special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in

A whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest, and a statutory constitution"; and he referred to an article by Professor Dawn Oliver, "The Frontiers of the State: Public Authorities and Public Functions under the Human Rights Act" [2000] PL 476, as valuable in this connection. At para 9 he explained section 6(3)(b) as addressing situations where in the interests of efficiency and economy or otherwise, functions of a governmental nature were discharged by non-governmental bodies, B sometimes as a result of privatisation, sometimes not. He gave as "obvious" examples the running of prisons by private organisations and the discharge of regulatory functions by organisations in the private sector such as the Law Society, or one might add the Bar Council. Further, while a core public authority was disabled from having any Convention rights (cf article 34), a hybrid authority was not so disabled in respect of any act of a private C nature, and:

> "Giving a generously wide scope to the expression 'public function' in section 6(3)(b) will further the statutory aim of promoting the observance of human rights values without depriving the bodies in question of the ability themselves to rely on Convention rights when necessary" (para 11).

D Finally, there was, in his view, "no single test of universal application" to decide whether a function was of a public nature, "given the diverse nature of governmental functions and the variety of means by which these functions are discharged today". However:

> "Factors to be taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, or is E exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service" (para 12).

Lord Nicholls's view supports not only a broad application of section 6(3)(b) but also a factor-based approach such as Mr Sales in particular advocated. On the other hand, none of Lord Nicholls's specific examples is close to the present case.

State responsibility in the Strasbourg case law

92 In the light of the rationale of section 6 identified in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, it is logical to start by considering whether Strasbourg case law offers any clear guidance on the scope of state responsibility in the present field. In my opinion it lacks any case directly G in point. But two relevant principles appear. First, the state may in some circumstances be responsible for failure to take positive steps to regulate or control the activities of private persons where there will otherwise be a direct and immediate adverse impact on a person's Convention protected interests. Second, the state may in some circumstances remain responsible for the conduct of private law institutions to which it has delegated state powers. The case law does not always distinguish clearly between these H principles.

93 Examples of the first principle are Botta v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 241 and Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175 (failure to protect an individual's right to respect for private life) and Z v United Kingdom (2001) 34 EHRR 97 (local authority's failure to protect children known to be suffering ill-treatment). In R (Bernard) v Enfield London Borough Council [2003] LGR 423, Sullivan J on the same principle held responsible a local authority which in breach of article 8 failed to act for over 20 months on assessments of need under section 47 of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, which should have led it to arrange care and accommodation under section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948, as amended.

94 Storck v Germany (2005) 43 EHRR 96 falls under the same principle. The Federal Republic was responsible in respect of the applicant's confinement in a private clinic in circumstances not authorised by a court or any other state entity, in view of (a) the lack at the time of any system for supervision by state authorities of the lawfulness and conditions of confinement of persons treated in such a clinic, and (b) the use of police force to return the applicant to the clinic after she had fled: paras 90 and 91. At one point (para 103), the European Court of Human Rights in Storck noted that the state could not "completely absolve itself from its responsibility" by delegating its obligations:

> "the state is under an obligation to secure to its citizens their right to physical integrity under article 8 of the Convention. For this purpose there are hospitals run by the state which co-exist with private hospitals. The state cannot completely absolve itself from its responsibility by delegating its obligations in this sphere to private bodies or individuals."

This was followed by a reference to Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom (1993) 19 EHRR 112 and the observation that "similarly, in the present case, the state remained under a duty to exercise supervision and control over private psychiatric institutions": para 103. It is clear that the basis of responsibility in Storck was not some general responsibility for every misdeed in the clinic, but responsibility under the first principle for the state's supervisory and policing failures.

95 Costello-Roberts itself is not an easy case to analyse. This is because the court held that there was in fact no breach of any Convention duty. The issue was whether the particular corporal punishment ("slippering") suffered by a pupil in a private school had infringed his Convention rights, and it was held that it was not of a severity to infringe either of articles 3 and 8. But the court started by considering the state's potential responsibility, in which regard the United Kingdom argued "the English legal system had adequately secured the rights guaranteed by articles 3 and 8 . . . by prohibiting the use of any corporal punishment which was not moderate or reasonable": para 26. The court concluded however, at para 28, that in

> "the particular domain of school discipline, the treatment complained of although it was the act of a headmaster of an independent school, is none the less such as may engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom under the Convention if it proves to be incompatible with article 3 or article 8 or both."

The basis was said to be the state's duty to secure to its children their right to education, including an appropriate school disciplinary system, which "cannot be said to be merely ancillary to the educational process", the co-existence of independent and state schools, in circumstances where the right to education is guaranteed equally to pupils in both, and the state's inability to "absolve itself from responsibility by delegating its obligations to private bodies or individuals": para 27. While the Court in Storck treated the state in Costello-Roberts as responsible under the first principle, the actual reasoning in Costello-Roberts is open to the wider interpretation that the state may under the second principle have a non-delegable or vicarious responsibility for education, at least for such acts of a private school as may be said to be central to its educational role. In Professor David Feldman's Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England, 2nd ed (2002), p 97, he suggests that other aspects of a private school's activities, such as its contractual relations with parents, could fall outside its public functions. This might in turn suggest that termination of contractual relations would fall outside the Convention protections. It was along such lines that Buxton LJ [2008] QB 1 may have been thinking in the present case when he suggested that "a hybrid body may be directly impleaded in the protection of some Convention rights but not of others": para 78. But this was not a theme pursued by any side before the House.

96 Footnotes to the relevant passages in both Costello-Roberts and Storck refer to Van der Mussele v Belgium (1983) 6 EHRR 163. That case concerned a complaint by a pupil advocate that he was compelled to represent clients without fee. It was the Belgian State's obligation under article 6(3)(c) of the Convention to administer a system of free legal assistance in criminal matters. Belgian domestic legislation in turn obliged the Belgian Bar Association to provide such a system. As the European Court of Human Rights said, "legislation 'compels them to compel' members of the Bar to 'defend indigent persons' ". The court continued: "Such a solution cannot relieve the Belgian State of the responsibilities it would have incurred under the Convention had it chosen to operate the system itself": para 29. In the next sentence, the court pointed out that the domestic legislation expressly obliged pupil advocates to act in cases assigned under the free legal assistance scheme. In the event and since pupil advocates had chosen to enter the profession, the legislative scheme was held consistent with the Convention. The case was not so much one of potential responsibility for delegated acts, as one of potential responsibility for the state's own legislative scheme.

97 The second principle is that the state may in some circumstances remain responsible for the manner of performance of essentially state or governmental functions or powers which it has chosen to delegate to a private law institution. Examples are provided by Woś v Poland (Application No 22860/02) (unreported) 1 March 2005 and Sychev v Ukraine (Application No 4773/02) (unreported) 11 October 2005. In Woś a minister in the Polish cabinet in 1991 established the Polish-German Reconciliation Foundation under the Foundations Act 1984, a statute enabling persons to establish private law foundations to carry out socially and economically useful goals complying with the basic interests of the Republic. The minister and his successor had as founder full control over appointments to the foundation's boards, over the amendment of its statute and its dissolution. The foundation's capital consisted of DEM 500m contributed by the Federal Republic of Germany under treaty with Poland, and the foundation's role was to use such moneys to compensate victims of Nazi persecution. As a result of further international negotiations culminating in 2000 in an agreed joint statement signed by inter alia the Federal Republic and Poland, the foundation also acquired in 2001 the role of disbursing to Polish resident claimants further moneys contributed by the Federal Republic and German companies to a German Foundation established to compensate victims of slave and forced labour. The court held that "the specific circumstances of the present case give rise to the conclusion that the actions of the Foundation . . . in respect of both compensation schemes are capable of engaging the responsibility of the state" (para 74). It said that the state's choice of "a form of delegation in which some of its powers are exercised by another body cannot be decisive for the question of state responsibility ratione personae" (para 72) and that delegation to a body operating under private law of the Polish State's obligations arising out of international agreements could not "relieve the Polish state of the responsibilities it would have incurred had it chosen to discharge these obligations itself, as it could well have": para 73.

98 In Sychev the state had established a private law commission to which were delegated certain state powers relating to the execution of court judgments. The court did not find it necessary to discuss whether or not the commission was or was not in itself a state authority for the purposes of article 34, but said that: "It suffices to note that the body in question exercised certain state powers at least as regards the execution of court judgments": para 54. The distinction drawn may be seen as mirroring that between core and hybrid public authorities in English domestic law. The court went on to say that "the exercise of state powers which affects Convention rights and freedoms raises an issue of state responsibility regardless of the form in which these powers happen to be exercised, be it for instance by a body whose activities are regulated by private law": para 54. It also made points about the absence of any judicial or administrative control over the commission which could have invoked the first principle I have mentioned.

The relevance of European case law

99 The first principle does not assist to determine whether Southern Cross is a public authority under section 6. State and governmental bodies have an important role in regulating and supervising the activities of many private bodies and persons, including care homes. But it is not suggested that Southern Cross occupied any such regulatory or supervisory role. The second principle recognises that there may be certain essentially state or governmental functions, particularly involving the exercise of duties or powers, for the manner of exercise of which the state will remain liable, notwithstanding that it has delegated them to a private law body. It is necessary to consider whether the provision of care and accommodation in a private care home under an arrangement made with a local authority falls within this principle. The above analysis confirms that Strasbourg case law contains no case directly in point. In contrast with Sychev, a private care home does not acquire or exercise any obvious state power or duty. In contrast with both Woś and Sychev, it is not established and capitalised by the state for state purposes. The ambit and significance of the reasoning in Costello-Roberts is less clear, but the case concerns the very different field of education, where the court may, on one view, have considered that any activity bearing centrally on the provision of education was a non-delegable state function, whether it is provided by a state or under private contractual

A arrangements in a private school. The case does not indicate that the same can or should be said of the provision of care and accommodation.

The meaning of section 6(3)(b) in domestic law

100 Coming against this background to the interpretation of section 6(3)(b), the phrases "public authority" and "functions of a public B nature" are readily understandable and applicable in cases of what Lord Nicholls called "special powers" or functions of a "governmental" nature in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, paras 7 and 9. Thus, local authorities were granted power, by section 111(1) of the Local Government Act 1972, to do "any thing . . . which is calculated to facilitate, or is conducive or incidental to, the discharge of any of their functions", and in Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council [1992] 2 AC 1, 29F Lord Templeman C said that "the word 'functions' embraces all the duties and powers of a local authority; the sum total of the activities Parliament has entrusted to it. Those activities are its functions".

101 On the other hand, as both Aston Cantlow and R (West) v Lloyd's of London [2004] 3 All ER 251 show, the mere possession of special powers conferred by Parliament does not by itself mean that a person has functions D of a public nature. Such powers may have been conferred for private, religious or purely commercial purposes. Conversely, there can be bodies without special statutory powers amenable to judicial review, as shown by R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, Ex p Datafin plc [1987] QB 815 and R v Code of Practice Committee of the British Pharmaceutical Industry, Ex p Professional Counselling Aids Ltd (1990) 3 Admin LR 697, cited by E Moses J in R v Servite Houses, Ex p Goldsmith [2001] LGR 55, 74B. In Datafin, the panel was as a matter of fact entrusted with an extensive and vital regulatory role in the public interest, and that was sufficient to make it susceptible to judicial review. In Code of Practice Committee, applying Datafin, judicial review was available in respect of the administration by a trade association of a code of practice which it had voluntarily developed in conjunction with the Department of Health, and which was obligatory for F members and followed in practice by non-members. I do not doubt that such bodies would in respect of their regulatory functions also constitute a public authority under section 6(3)(b). In Datafin Sir John Donaldson MR said [1987] QB 815, 826, 834, 835 that:

> "Lacking any authority de jure, it [the take-over panel] exercises G immense power de facto . . . the panel is a truly remarkable body, performing its function without visible means of legal support. But the operative word is 'visible', although perhaps I should have used the word 'direct'. Invisible or indirect support there is in abundance. Not only is a breach of the [City] code [on Take-overs and Mergers], so found by the panel, ipso facto an act of misconduct by a member of the Stock Exchange, and the same may be true of other bodies represented on the H panel, but the admission of shares to the Official List may be withheld in the event of such a breach . . . The picture which emerges is clear. As an act of government it was decided that, in relation to take-overs, there should be a central self-regulatory body which would be supported and sustained by a periphery of statutory powers and penalties wherever non-statutory powers and penalties were insufficient or non-existent or where EEC requirements called for statutory provisions."

102 The reasoning in Datafin has been welcomed for underlining the importance for the public of the role and de facto power exercised by the Take-over Panel, but regretted in so far as it retained as a supporting factor, in the passage at p 835, the imputed governmental source of the power: see Murray Hunt "Constitutionalism and the Contractualisation of Government in the United Kingdom" published in The Province of Administrative Law (ed Taggart) (1997), p 29. But it should be no surprise that the usual source of the "functions of a public nature" addressed by section 6(3)(b) is legislative or governmental, when section 6(3)(b) is intended to reflect in domestic law the scope of the state responsibility which the Convention addresses. The concept "governmental" or "of government" was found useful in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, paras 10, 49, 88 and 159 by Lord Nicholls, Lord Hope, Lord Hobhouse and Lord Rodger. The existence and source of any special powers or duties must on any view be a very relevant factor when considering whether state responsibility is engaged in Strasbourg or whether section 6(3)(b) applies domestically. On this point, I prefer Mr Sales's submissions, that it is necessary to look at the context in which and basis on which a contractor acts, to Mr Pannick's submission, that all that is appropriate is to look at what a contractor "does". There is, for example, a clear conceptual difference between the functions of a private firm engaged by a local authority to enforce the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, as amended, on a public road and the activities of the same firm engaged by a private land-owner or a local authority to enforce a private scheme or parking restrictions of which notice have been given on a private property or estate. Mr Pannick in his own submissions seeks to identify what Southern Cross does by reference to the duties which the council owes.

103 Typical state or governmental functions include powers conferred and duties imposed or undertaken in the general public interest. I shall not attempt to identify the full scope of the concept of "functions of a public nature", any more than Lord Nicholls did in Aston Cantlow. But some further consideration is appropriate of his suggested hallmarks of a public authority. As stated, these were, in the case of a core public authority and in addition to special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest and a statutory constitution. All these factors can readily be understood to throw light on the nature of a person's functions. When considering section 6(3)(b), Lord Nicholls suggested as factors, again in addition to statutory powers, the extent that a body is publicly funded or is "taking the place" of central government or local authorities or is providing a public service: [2004] 1 AC 546, para 12. These are more generally expressed factors, to which I address some further comments.

104 In the Court of Appeal Buxton LJ [2008] QB 1, para 72 considered it arguable that Southern Cross did indeed "stand in the shoes of the local authority as it discharges its public duties under section 21", but Mr Pannick in my view rightly did not endorse that approach. That powers or duties may in some circumstances be delegated to others is clear—witness the examples, given by Lord Nicholls, of privately run prisons and the regulation (at that time) of the solicitors' profession by the Law Society or

A the example of the private contractor entrusted with responsibility for enforcing the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984. Section 101 of the Local Government Act 1972 enables a limited form of delegation, whereby arrangements may be made for the discharge of local authority functions by a committee or subcommittee or an officer of the authority or by any other local authority. More significantly, under section 70 of the Deregulation and B Contracting Out Act 1994, the Secretary of State may specify statutory functions which may be discharged by a person other than the authority primarily responsible for them. Section 72 provides that any acts or omissions of a person so authorised shall be treated for all purposes as done or omitted to be done by or in relation to the authority. Examples of such orders include the Contracting Out (Management Functions in relation to certain Community Homes) Order 1996 (SI 1996/586) and the Local C Authorities (Contracting Out of Allocation of Housing and Homelessness Functions) Order 1996 (SI 1996/3205). In such cases, while the acts or omissions are by statute attributed to the authority, there is a clear basis for regarding the authorised delegate as a person having functions of a public nature within section 6(3)(b). But no delegation of that sort exists in relation to the council's functions under section 21 of the 1948 Act.

D 105 Democratic accountability, an obligation to act only in the public interest and (in most cases today) a statutory constitution exclude the sectional or personally motivated interests of privately owned, profit-earning enterprises. Public funding and the provision of a public service are most easily understood in a similar sense. In a much looser sense, the self-interested endeavour of individuals usually works to the general benefit of society, as Adam Smith noted. But more than that is required under E section 6(3)(b). The difficulty is where to draw the line. Public funding takes various forms. The injection of capital or subsidy into an organisation in return for undertaking a non-commercial role or activity of general public interest may be one thing; payment for services under a contractual arrangement with a company aiming to profit commercially thereby is potentially quite another. In every case, the ultimate focus must be upon the F nature of the functions being undertaken. The deployment in Poplar Housing [2002] QB 48, apparently as a decisive factor in favour of the application of section 6(3)(b), of the close historical and organisational assimilation of Poplar Housing with the local authority is in my view open to the objection that this did not bear on the function or role that Poplar Housing was performing.

106 Other domestic legislation adopts the concept of public authority, G in particular the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. The different contexts of these statutes mean that they offer very limited assistance in the construction of the Human Rights Act 1998. Their technique was to set out (differing) lists of bodies which were to be regarded as public authorities, either for all purposes or in respect of certain functions. The Race Relations Act thus lists various Royal Colleges (Anaesthetists, H General Practitioners, Nursing, Surgeons, etc), the Bank of England and the BBC, the General Council of the Bar and the Law Society each "in respect of its public functions", as well as a large number of other bodies generally. Neither Act includes in its list any private company or organisation offering services comparable to those rendered by Southern Cross, though that is, as stated, of little relevance in view of their different contexts. Of some interest is however a power conferred on the Secretary of State by section 5 of the Freedom of Information Act to designate as a public authority for the purposes of the Act any person not listed who either "(a) appears . . . to exercise functions of a public nature, or (b) is providing under a contract made with a public authority any service whose provision is a function of that authority". The careful distinction between (a) and (b) highlights the point that a person with whom a public authority contracts for a service which it is the function of that authority to provide is not axiomatically exercising a function of a public nature. Under the Freedom of Information Act, there might be reason to extend the benefit of the Act to such a person. But section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act only extends the concept of a public authority to a person within (a).

Analysis of Southern Cross's role

107 In submitting that Southern Cross in providing care and accommodation has and is exercising functions of a public nature, Mr Pannick relies on the statutory framework which led to the council's involvement and to the placement of YL with Southern Cross. That consists primarily in the National Assistance Act 1948 as amended in (inter alia) 1972, 1990 and 1992. The Act as amended reads:

> "21 Duty of local authorities to provide accommodation
> "(1) Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of this Part of this Act, a local authority may with the approval of the Secretary of State, and to such extent as he may direct shall, make arrangements for providing— (a) residential accommodation for persons aged 18 or over who by reason of age, illness, disability or any other circumstances are in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them; and (aa) residential accommodation for expectant and nursing mothers who are in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them . . ."
> "(2A) In determining for the purposes of paragraph (a) or (aa) of subsection (1) of this section whether care and attention are otherwise available to a person, a local authority shall disregard so much of the person's resources as may be specified in, or determined in accordance with, regulations made by the Secretary of State for the purposes of this subsection . . ."
> "(4) Subject to the provisions of section 26 of this Act accommodation provided by a local authority in the exercise of their functions under this section shall be provided in premises managed by the authority or, to such extent as may be determined in accordance with the arrangements under this section, in such premises managed by another local authority as may be agreed between the two authorities and on such terms, including terms as to the reimbursement of expenditure incurred by the said other authority, as may be so agreed.
> "(5) References in this Act to accommodation provided under this Part thereof shall be construed as references to accommodation provided in accordance with this and the five next following sections . . ."

108 Section 22 requires a local authority to recover from any person to whom accommodation is provided under section 21 a payment consisting of

A the full cost to the authority of providing such accommodation or such lower rate as the authority may assess that such person is able to pay. Section 26 provides:

"26 Provision of accommodation in premises maintained by voluntary organisations

"(1) Subject to subsections (1A) and (1C) below, arrangements under B section 21 of this Act may include arrangements made with a voluntary organisation or with any other person who is not a local authority where—(a) that organisation or person manages premises which provide for reward accommodation falling within subsection (1)(a) or (aa) of that section, and (b) the arrangements are for the provision of such accommodation in those premises.

"(1A) Arrangements must not be made by virtue of this section for the C provision of accommodation together with nursing or personal care for persons such as are mentioned in section 3(2) of the Care Standards Act 2000 (care homes) unless—(a) the accommodation is to be provided, under the arrangements, in a care home (within the meaning of that Act) which is managed by the organisation or person in question; and (b) that organisation or person is registered under Part II of that Act in respect of D the home."

109 Section 26(2)(3) requires arrangements made under section 26 to provide for payments by the local authority to the accommodation provider "at such rates as may be determined by or under the arrangements" and for the resident to refund the local authority either in full or according to his or her ability to pay. Section 26(3A) enables the local authority, the resident E and the service provider to agree instead for the resident to pay direct to the provider any share that he or she would otherwise have to refund to the local authority and for the local authority to be liable only to pay the balance to the provider.

110 Mr Pannick submits that the 1948 Act gives effect to a basic state or public responsibility to provide care and accommodation for those in need. In R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936, F para 15, Lord Woolf CJ said:

"If the authority itself provides accommodation, it is performing a public function. It is also performing a public function if it makes arrangements for the accommodation to be provided by [The Leonard Cheshire Foundation ("LCF")]. However, if a body which is a charity, G like LCF, provides accommodation to those to whom the authority owes a duty under section 21 in accordance with an arrangement under section 26, it does not follow that the charity is performing a public function."

Taking as his premise Lord Woolf's first two sentences, Professor Paul Craig argues with force that the nature of a function does not alter if it is H contracted out, rather than performed in house ("Contracting Out, the Human Rights Act and the Scope of Judicial Review" (2002) 118 LQR 551). But Professor Dawn Oliver in the article in 2000 to which Lord Nicholls referred and in a later article in 2004 ("Functions of a Public Nature under the Human Rights Act" [2004] PL 329) pertinently observes that it is a fallacy to regard all functions and activities of a core public authority as inherently public in nature. All such functions and activities are subject to the Convention, because the authority is a core public authority. It only becomes necessary to analyse their nature, if and when they are contracted out to a person who is not a core public authority. Some of them may then on analysis be private in nature. Reference to a core public authority performing a public function when providing care and accommodation is potentially confusing.

111 How then is the provision of care and accommodation to be regarded? The House was taken to the history and amendments of the 1948 Act and to the more remote background of the Poor Law abrogated by section 1 of that Act. Mr Pannick submits that the Act gave effect to an essential duty of the state to provide care and accommodation for the needy. As originally enacted, section 21 made it the duty of every local authority "to provide" residential accommodation for persons in need of care and attention not otherwise available to them. This function was under section 21(3) to be exercised in accordance with a scheme. The accommodation was under section 21(4) to be provided in premises managed by the local authority, or by another local authority on terms to be agreed between them. However, under section 21(5) references to accommodation provided were to be construed as references to accommodation provided in accordance with the five next sections, and section 26(1) stated that, notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions, a scheme under section 21 "may provide for the making by a local authority . . . of arrangements with a voluntary organisation managing any premises for the provision of accommodation in those premises".

112 In 1972, section 21 was amended to its present form, whereby a local authority's duty is expressed generally as being to "make arrangements for providing . . . accommodation" not otherwise available for those in need of care and attention. With effect from 1 April 1993, as a result of amendments made in 1990 and 1992, sections 21 and 26 enable arrangements to be made not merely with a voluntary organisation, but also "with any other person who is not a local authority". In 2000 section 26(1A) was further amended by section 116 of and paragraph 1(1)(3) of Schedule 4 to the Care Standards Act 2000 to require any such arrangements for care and accommodation to be with a care home registered under the 2000 Act. Mr Pannick points out that in its modern form the 1948 Act still retains headings suggesting a duty of provision on the local authority (most obviously, the heading to section 21: "Duty of local authorities to provide accommodation").

113 In response, Mr Arden submits that the appellants' propositions are supported neither by history nor by the amended form of the legislation. As a matter of history, he observes that the state's duty to address the needs of the poor "often took the form of cash payments": Neville Harris, Social Security Law in Context (2000), p 71. Further, attention should focus on the modern form of the 1948 Act, and this is deliberately phrased in terms of a duty on the local authority to make arrangements. That duty never passes to the care home, which does no more than provide care and accommodation under contract.

114 In my view it is appropriate to focus on the modern form of the 1948 Act. This is particularly so when contracting with a care home such as

A Southern Cross only became possible from 1 April 1993, when the legislation was amended to formulate the local authority's duty as being to arrange care and accommodation. Neither the concept nor the extent of a function of a public nature is immutable in either national or European law (cf also per Lord Rodger in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, para 159). The modern legislation distinguishes clearly between a local authority with a statutory duty to arrange care and accommodation and a private company B providing services with which the local authority contracts on a commercial basis in order to fulfil the local authority's duty to arrange care and accommodation. My noble and learned friend, Lord Hoffmann, summarised the effect of the modern form of legislation, aptly also for present purposes, in R v Wandsworth London Borough Council, Ex p Beckwith [1996] 1 WLR 60, 64:

> "The duty of the council under section 21 is to make 'arrangements' for providing residential accommodation for certain classes of people. Subsection (4) says that the accommodation must be managed by the local authority or by some other authority. But this is expressed to be subject to section 26, which says that 'arrangements under section 21 of this Act' (not, notice, 'the arrangements made under section 21 of this D Act') may include arrangements with the private sector. The draftsman is therefore not saying that homes in the private sector may be included in the collective of homes which the council has to provide. He is saying that the concept of 'arrangements' which has been used to define the council's duty in section 21 is to include arrangements with the private sector. This produces an altogether different result: it extends the meaning of the concept by which the council's duty is defined. Any arrangements which E fall within the extended definition will satisfy the council's duty."

A rider that perhaps calls for mention is that it is not, and could not be, suggested that a local authority has no continuing duty in respect of the suitability of a placement, once made. As Moses J observed in R v Servite Houses, Ex p Goldsmith [2001] LGR 55, 66:

> "It remains under a duty to see that the applicants' needs are met and if necessary to re-assess them. It remains under an obligation to ensure that the arrangements which it has made continue to be sufficient to meet the needs of those qualified for such community care provision."

115 I do not regard the actual provision, as opposed to the arrangement, of care and accommodation for those unable to arrange it G themselves as an inherently governmental function. The duty on a local authority under section 21 constitutes a safety net, conditional upon care and attention being "not otherwise available". In practice, this means that, if a person assessed as in need of care and accommodation has more than £21,000 capital and can arrange care and accommodation or (for example through relatives) make arrangements for it, then the local authority will not be further involved. In contrast with the position relating to the National H Health Service, the default position is one in which the local authority is not involved. I can see no basis, and none was really suggested, on which a private care home could somehow be regarded as exercising functions of a public nature in providing care and accommodation for "self-funders", those who or whose relatives could fund and make their own arrangements. The local authority's involvement is aimed at making arrangements (including funding) which put those in need in effectively the same position as those "self-funders" Once such arrangements are made, the actual provision of care and accommodation is a different matter, which, as the modern legislation recognises, does not need actually to be undertaken by the local authority and can take place in the private sector, as it does for those who or whose relatives are able to make arrangements including funding for themselves.

116 In providing care and accommodation, Southern Cross acts as a private, profit-earning company. It is subject to close statutory regulation in the public interest. But so are many private occupations and businesses, with operations which may impact on members of the public in matters as diverse for example as life, health, privacy or financial well-being. Regulation by the state is no real pointer towards the person regulated being a state or governmental body or a person with a function of a public nature, if anything perhaps even the contrary. The private and commercial motivation behind Southern Cross's operations does in contrast point against treating Southern Cross as a person with a function of a public nature. Some of the particular duties which it has been suggested would follow—a duty not to close the home without regard to the Convention right to a home of publicly funded residents, and perhaps even a duty to give priority to accepting such residents into the home—fit in my view uneasily with the ordinary private law freedom to carry on operations under agreed contractual terms, even accepting (as I would) that, if the Convention applied, a private care home would be able to invoke that freedom as a relevant factor under article 8(2).

117 A private care home company provides services for residents in its care homes, which do not—and should not—depend in their nature or quality on the person with whom it contracts to provide such services. Age Concern England in a memorandum dated January 2006 annexed to the Joint Committee of the House of Lords and House of Commons of March 2007 was aware of this, and observed that "it would also be inequitable if self-funders—who pay higher fees (often called the 'self-funders rate')—had less legal protection than residents whose lower fees are met by the local authority": para 3.5. Age Concern's only antidote was to recommend some form of legislation: paras 8.4 to 8.5. In my view, however, a submission which leads to such a distinction being drawn under section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act is inherently questionable. Care homes would be bound to be, and to make their staff, aware of the distinction between Human Rights Convention protected and other residents. If it came to an issue like closure of a wing of a home or relocation of some residents during works, there could be an incentive (it might be argued even a legal duty) to give priority to the wishes and demands of publicly funded residents. To distinguish between different residents in the same care home on the basis of their ability to make the relevant contractual arrangements necessary to gain entry to the home appears undesirable.

118 Some differences do of course exist between care home residents whose placement is arranged under section 21 and residents whose placement is privately arranged. Every resident, privately or publicly funded, must consent, either personally or through a representative, to being admitted to the particular care home. A privately funded resident has,

A subject to space and funds, a choice of care homes. A publicly funded resident also has the choice which care home to enter, at least if the necessary funds exist to meet any consequential top-up liability. All care home residents have common and criminal law rights not to be mistreated (including any claims that may, perhaps, exist for breach of statutory duty). But a privately placed resident will either be party to a contract with the care B home or be resident as a result of a contract covering his or her residence made by a representative or relative. In contrast, the only contract covering the publicly funded resident's placement may be between the local authority and the care home, although YL was through her representative party to the tripartite arrangements described at the start of this opinion. On the other hand, even if a publicly funded resident is not party to any contract with the care home, he or she will (unlike privately funded residents) have public law C rights, including the right to invoke the protection of the Human Rights Convention, as against the local authority. These will enable him or her effectively to place on the local authority the onus to take any steps open to it as against the care home to protect the resident's human rights.

119 In my view the differences mentioned do not either justify or require a different approach to the application to the care home of the D Convention as between privately and publicly funded residents in one and the same care home. Apart from any contractual arrangements, the care home should view and treat all such residents with equality. Their contractual arrangements differ, but not in any way which indicates that publicly funded residents need additional protection compared with privately funded residents. A publicly funded resident's Convention rights against the local authority may even mean that he or she is in some respects E already more amply protected than a privately funded resident. As to the direct application of the Convention as against a care home, it is less incongruous to distinguish between residents in privately owned, profit-earning care homes on the one hand and residents in a local authority owned and managed care home on the other hand, than it is to distinguish between publicly and privately funded residents in one and the same care home. F Residents in a local authority owned and managed care home have the protection of the Convention not because the function of providing care and accommodation for those in need is inherently public in nature, but simply because a local authority is a core public authority, all of whose activities are, whatever their nature, subject to the Convention under section 6(1) of the 1998 Act.

G 120 The House was referred to a number of previous domestic authorities. The decision which I would reach on this appeal fits within them. Before the 1998 Act came into force, in R v North and East Devon Health Authority, Ex p Coughlan [2001] QB 213, the court granted judicial review of a health authority's decision to close one of its National Health Service nursing homes; and in an illuminating judgment in R v Servite Houses, Ex p Goldsmith [2001] LGR 55, Moses J concluded that a private H care home company was not exercising a public function in relation to residents placed with it under contract with the local authority, in the absence of any statutory source or underpinning for its operations and although the nature of its activities was "a matter of public concern and interest". Moses J said, at p 81, this was > "not to say that a fresh approach ought not to be adopted so that the court can meet the needs of the public faced with the increasing privatisation of what were hitherto public functions", but that, if this was to be done, it would have to be in a higher court. For my part, however, his reasoning remains persuasive, and the essentially contractual source and nature of Southern Cross's activities differentiates them from any "function of a public nature", even though it is (as often in the private sector) a matter of public concern, interest and benefit that reputable, efficient and properly regulated providers of such services should exist.

121 In R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2610, Keith J held that section 6(3)(b) covered the functions performed by a mental nursing home registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984 in which the claimant, who had a severe personality disorder, was compulsorily detained pursuant to section 3(1) of the Mental Health Act 1983. He distinguished the circumstances before him, admission by compulsion, from those in the then first instance decision of Stanley Burnton J in R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation (2001) 4 CCLR 211, residence by choice—a fact which, Keith J [2002] 1 WLR 2610, para 25 thought that Stanley Burnton J "rightly considered as critical". I agree.

122 Finally, in R (Beer (trading as Hammer Trout Farm)) v Hampshire Farmers' Markets Ltd [2004] 1 WLR 233, the county council, which had previously run farmers' markets under statutory powers, set up a non-profit making company to run such markets on a contractual basis on publicly owned land to which the public had, and at common law had the right of, access for the sale of goods. The Court of Appeal held that, despite the lack of any statutory source or underpinning for the company's role, the company was both performing a function of a public nature under section 6(3)(b) and subject to judicial review. An important element in this decision was the common law right of access of the public to such markets, which was being regulated by the company in succession to the council: cf R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex p Hook [1976] 1 WLR 1052. There is in the present case no such right or feature in relation to Southern Cross. Publicly funded residents have public law rights against the local authority, but no common law right of access to or residence in any private care home, other than under a contractual arrangement with whomsoever made.

Conclusion

123 For these reasons I would hold that Southern Cross in providing care and accommodation for YL was not and is not exercising functions of a public nature within section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998. I would leave entirely open the position of those operating in the different areas of health and education services, but I agree with the reasoning and conclusions regarding privately owned care homes such as Southern Cross's contained in the opinions of Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury which I have had the benefit of seeing in draft. If further protection or regulation is considered to be necessary in respect of privately owned care homes, in addition to that which is available under common law or statute and for which local authorities may contract as indicated in para 80 above, the means may already be available to achieve this under the Care Standards Act 2000. And, if additional protection is to be achieved by statutory means,

A it is no matter for regret that this should be done without distinguishing between residents in one and the same care home who on the one hand arrange and fund their own care and accommodation and others who on the other hand benefit from local authority assistance to arrange and fund such care and accommodation. I would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

LORD NEUBERGER OF ABBOTSBURY

Introductory

124 My Lords, where a "person [is] by reason of age, illness [or] disability in need of care and attention which [would] not otherwise [be] available to [her]", the local authority "in whose area [she] is ordinarily resident" becomes liable, under sections 21(1)(a) and 24(1) of the National C Assistance Act 1948 as amended, to "make arrangements for providing . . . residential accommodation" for her. By virtue of section 21(5), "accommodation" in this context extends to such "board and other services, amenities and requisites" as she needs, and in this speech I shall refer to these services as "care and accommodation". Such care and accommodation can be provided by the local authority itself (sections 21(4), 22 and 23), by another local authority (section 24(4)), or by "a voluntary organisation D or . . . any other person [who] manages premises which provide for reward [such] accommodation": section 26(1).

125 The issue raised on this appeal is whether, in a case where a local authority performs its duty by arranging and paying for care and accommodation in a privately owned care home, the person concerned can claim that the proprietor of the care home is thereby someone "certain of E whose functions are functions of a public nature" within the meaning of section 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998. The appeal arises from facts, and in a historical context, which are fully set out in the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Baroness Hale of Richmond and Lord Mance, which I have had the privilege of reading in draft.

126 I agree with the conclusion reached by Lord Mance, and with his reasons for reaching that conclusion. However, as the issue raised on this F appeal is of some importance, and as it has resulted in a sharp difference of opinion in this House, it seems appropriate to explain my thinking, although, in doing so, I do not intend to detract from my agreement with Lord Mance's reasoning.

127 If the provision of care and accommodation in circumstances such as those of the instant case is a function falling within subsection (3)(b) of G section 6 of the 1998 Act ("section 6"), then, by virtue of section 6(1), it would be "unlawful" for the proprietor of the care home "to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right" of that person. Thus, a resident of a privately owned care home, whose care and accommodation is paid for (in whole or in part), or even (possibly) whose care and accommodation has simply been arranged, by a local authority would have rights against the proprietor of the home ("the proprietor") in addition to H those that would lie under contract, common law or purely domestic legislation.

128 While the issue can be relatively easily and briefly expressed and explained, it is much harder to resolve with confidence, as is demonstrated by the sharp difference of opinion revealed in the four preceding opinions.

Any reasoned decision as to the meaning of section 6(3)(b) risks falling foul of circularity, preconception and arbitrariness. The centrally relevant words, "functions of a public nature", are so imprecise in their meaning that one searches for a policy as an aid to interpretation. The identification of the policy is almost inevitably governed, at least to some extent, by one's notions of what the policy should be, and the policy so identified is then used to justify one's conclusion. Further, given that the question of whether section 6(3)(b) applies may often turn on a combination of factors, the relative weight to be accorded to each factor in a particular case is inevitably a somewhat subjective decision.

129 In the light of section 6(3)(b), section 6(1) has been interpreted as applying to two types of public authority, namely "core" public authorities "whose nature is governmental in a broad sense", and "hybrid" (or "functional") public authorities, only some of whose functions are of a public nature — see the discussion in the speech of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546, paras 7 to 9. Under section 6(5), an entity which would otherwise be a hybrid public authority is none the less not to be treated as such in relation to an act "the nature of [which] is private", but this exception does not apply to core public authorities.

130 Section 6 is, at least in some respects, not conspicuous for the clarity of its drafting. Thus, there was some debate before your Lordships as to whether there was a distinction between "acts" and "functions" in the section. In my view, both as a matter of ordinary language and on a fair reading of the section, there is a difference between "functions", the word used in section 6(3)(b), and "act[s]", the word used in section 6(2) and (5) and defined in section 6(6). The former has a more conceptual, and perhaps less specific, meaning than the latter. A number of different acts can be involved in the performance of a single function. So, if this appeal succeeds, a proprietor providing care and accommodation pursuant to section 26(1) of the 1948 Act would be performing a "function", which, while "of a public nature", would involve a multitude of acts, many of which would be private—e g contracting for the purchase of food or for the consumption of electricity.

131 Accordingly, a core public authority is bound by section 6(1) in relation to every one of its acts whatever the nature of the act concerned; there is therefore no need to distinguish between private and public acts or functions of a core public authority. On the other hand, a hybrid public authority is only bound by section 6(1) in relation to an act which (a) is not private in nature and (b) is pursuant to or in connection with a function which is public in nature.

132 Having made those preliminary points about section 6, I turn to the specific issue in the present case. In that connection, in the light of the arguments addressed to us, I propose to consider that issue in three stages. First, I shall discuss the individual specific factors which are said to bring the performance of a contract for the provision of care and accommodation between a proprietor and a resident, paid towards or arranged by a local authority pursuant to sections 21 to 26 of the 1948 Act, within the ambit of section 6(3)(b). Secondly, I shall address a policy argument based on those factors which involve "contracting-out", that is, the system whereby a core public authority, most commonly a local authority, contracts to pay a

A private company to carry out services which the authority is statutorily liable to provide. Thirdly and finally, I shall express my conclusion by considering these various factors together in the context of wider issues of principle.

A particulate analysis

B 133 It may be helpful to start by considering a simple case of a person who independently enters into a contract with a proprietor for the provision to her of care and accommodation in a privately owned care home. In such a case, I have some difficulty with the notion that the proprietor would be thereby performing a function within section 6(3)(b). Although Mr Pannick, for Mrs YL, did not concede this, Mr Sales, on behalf of the Secretary of State, did so. That concession was, in my view, at least on the face of it, C realistic and correct. In such a case, there would simply be a private law contract for the provision of care and accommodation. At any rate at first sight, it is hard to see why, in performing such a contract, the proprietor would be carrying out a function "of a public nature".

134 Reliance was placed on the fact that care homes are subject to detailed rules and supervision under the provisions of the Care Homes D Regulations 2001. That is not, in my opinion, a telling reason for saying that, in providing care and accommodation to a private person, the proprietor of a care home is carrying out a function of a public nature. There is no identity between the public interest in a particular service being provided properly and the service itself being a public service. As a matter of ordinary language and concepts, the mere fact that the public interest requires a service to be closely regulated and supervised pursuant to E statutory rules cannot mean that the provision of the service, as opposed to its regulation and supervision, is a function of a public nature. Otherwise, for example, companies providing financial services, running restaurants, or manufacturing hazardous material would ipso facto be susceptible to being within the ambit of section 6(1).

135 It was also said that it is in the public interest that the old and infirm are cared for, and that there are charities which offer the sort of services F which care homes provide. In my opinion, that feature does something, but relatively little, to justify the view that section 6(3)(b) applies where care and accommodation are provided in a privately owned care home. The fact that a service can fairly be said to be to the public benefit cannot mean, as a matter of language, that it follows that providing the service itself is a function of a public nature. Nor does it follow as a matter of logic or policy. G Otherwise, the services of all charities, indeed, it seems to me, of all private organisations which provide services which could be offered by charities, would be caught by section 6(1). It is in the public interest that health, education, housing, indeed food, is available to everyone. That cannot mean that those who provide such commodities on a commercial basis (including private hospitals, private schools, private landlords, and food retailers and distributors) therefore fall within the scope of section 6(3)(b).

H 136 It was also suggested that the fact that it will almost always be the vulnerable who are provided with care and accommodation in care homes indicates that such provision falls within section 6(3)(b). This point was advanced partly on the basis that the Strasbourg court has indicated that such people are entitled to particular protection under the Convention: see for example Botta v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 241, para 32. I do not think that that point goes much further than the argument based on the quasi-charitable nature of, and the detailed regulations applicable to, the function. The fact that the vulnerable are entitled to particular protection ties in with the detailed regulatory regime which the government has imposed on those who run care homes, but it does not appear to me to go to the point in the present case.

137 The factors so far mentioned are not, I accept, irrelevant to the issue that has to be decided on this appeal, but I do not find them persuasive on their own. Accordingly, subject to wider policy considerations indicating otherwise, it appears to me that a straightforward arrangement whereby a proprietor of a care home agrees to provide care and accommodation for a person under a private contract would not engage section 6(3)(b).

138 The same conclusion must logically apply where the contract for the provision of care and accommodation in a privately owned care home is arranged and/or paid for by a third party, such as a relative of the person concerned. In other words, by entering into (whether pursuant to an arrangement with that person or a third party) and performing a contract for the provision of care and accommodation for a person "who by reason of age, illness [or] disability [is] in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to [her]", a care home proprietor does not appear to me to be performing a "function" which is, at least intrinsically, "of a public nature", at least in the absence of telling reasons of policy or principle to the contrary.

139 As I see it, the basis for justifying a different conclusion in this case essentially rests on three further factors. First, the contract whereby Southern Cross Healthcare Ltd agreed to provide Mrs YL with care and accommodation was made as a result of Birmingham City Council carrying out its duty to arrange for care and accommodation for Mrs YL under section 21(1) of the 1948 Act under its "umbrella agreement" with Southern Cross. Secondly, the majority of the care home charges for Mrs YL's care and accommodation were paid to Southern Cross by Birmingham, pursuant to the same statutory duty. Thirdly, Birmingham itself could have provided Mrs YL with care and accommodation pursuant to the 1948 Act.

140 While the statutory involvement of Birmingham can fairly be said to give the function performed by Southern Cross in providing care and accommodation for Mrs YL a public connection, I do not consider that it can, at least on its own, convert that function into one "of a public nature" which engages section 6(3)(b). Birmingham's function in connection with the provision of the care and accommodation, according to its counsel, Mr Arden, fairly can be described as being of a public nature, but that is not really in point for two reasons.

141 First, at any rate in the context of section 6, it is meaningless, and therefore potentially misleading, to describe a function of a core public authority as being "of a public nature", as that concept (like that of "an act which is private") has relevance only to hybrid authorities. Secondly, even if Birmingham performed a function of a public nature by arranging the care and accommodation in accordance with its statutory duty, that would not mean, either as a matter of logic or policy, that the actual provision of the care and accommodation to Mrs YL by Southern Cross pursuant to a private law contract must thereby be converted from what would otherwise be a

A function of a private nature into one of a public nature. If the Ministry of Defence placed an order for military materiel with a private manufacturer, the Ministry could fairly be said, as a matter of ordinary language, to be carrying out a function of a public nature in placing the contract, but it would not follow, in my opinion, that the manufacturer would be carrying out a function of a public nature in performing the contract.

B 142 The fact that Southern Cross was paid by Birmingham for the provision in its care home of care and accommodation for Mrs YL does not appear to me to render such provision a "function of a public nature", at any rate on its own. It may well be that an activity of an entity which is not a core public authority is often unlikely to be a "function of a public nature" if it is not ultimately funded by a core public authority, but, again as a matter of logic and language, it cannot be a sufficient condition, in my view. C Otherwise, the activities of every employee and every supplier of a core public authority would be within section 6(1).

143 The existence of the umbrella agreement between Birmingham and Southern Cross does not, in my view, take matters further. It merely reflects the fact that Birmingham recognises that it will have to perform its statutory duty under section 21(1) of the 1948 Act to a number of persons, and that it D wishes to have the basis on which it gives effect to the "arrangements", which it has to make under section 21(1) of the 1948 Act, identified in advance.

144 The fact that Birmingham, as a core public authority, could have provided care and accommodation for Mrs YL in a care home which it ran itself seems to me to be a factor which assists the contention that Southern Cross is performing a function of a public nature, but only to a limited E extent. It is certainly not a sufficient condition: indeed, it appears to me to be more like a necessary condition. While it would be wrong to be didactic in this difficult area, I suspect that it would be a relatively rare case where a company could be performing a "function of a public nature" if it was carrying on an activity which could not be carried out by any core public authority. On the other hand, I would not accept that the mere fact that a F core public authority, even where it is the body funding the activity, could carry out the activity concerned must mean that the activity is such a function. Apart from anything else, there must scarcely be an activity which cannot be carried out by some core public authority.

The argument based on "contracting-out"

G 145 It is, I think, appropriate to consider in a little more detail the combined effect of two of the factors just discussed, namely the fact that Birmingham paid for the care and accommodation and the fact that Birmingham could have provided the care and accommodation itself. It was suggested that these two factors throw up a general point of principle, namely that section 6(3)(b) should apply to a case where a core public authority contracts-out one or more of its functions to a private company. H This was a concern which weighed heavily with the Joint Committee (of the House of Lords and the House of Commons) on Human Rights, as may be seen in two of their reports on "The Meaning of Public Authority under the Human Rights Act" (2003–04) HL 39, HC 382 and (2006–07) HL 77, HC 410.

146 There is undoubted force in the point that, if a person would have Convention rights if a service was provided by a core public authority, she should not lose them merely because the service is contracted-out by that authority to a private company. It is a point which has been made in a number of articles and reports. In para 41 of the first of the two reports, quoted in support of Mrs YL's case before your Lordships, the Joint Committee said that it would mean that the existence of Convention rights would be "dependent not on the type of power being exercised, nor on its capacity to interfere with human rights, but on the relatively arbitrary (in human rights terms) criterion of the body's administrative links with institutions of the state". However, it seems to me that there are several countervailing arguments, some of which apply to the present type of case, while others are of more general application.

B

147 First, this is not a case of contracting out a duty: under the 1948 Act, Birmingham does have a duty to arrange for the provision of care and accommodation for Mrs YL, but it has no duty to provide such care and accommodation itself. The 1948 Act requires a local authority to arrange and, where necessary, to pay towards or for, care and accommodation for a person falling within section 21(1)(a); however, the 1948 Act does no more than to permit a local authority to provide the care and accommodation through its own care homes (and your Lordships were told Birmingham did not have any homes capable of providing for Mrs YL's needs).

148 Secondly, where a company carries on a business providing services for individuals, it appears to me that there is a difference between (a) a core public authority supporting, or subsidising, the business generally (e g a care home all of whose expenses are met either as they arise or by a grant intended to cover all such expenses), and (b) such an authority funding services provided by the business to specific individuals (e g some or all of a care home's care and accommodation charges for a person who is not well off). I consider that it is easier in the former case to contend that the business as a whole is therefore a function "of a public nature", than it is in the latter case to contend that the services provided to the specific individuals constitute such a function. That is not so much because it seems unattractive to have two categories of resident in a single care home. It is more that section 6(3)(b) appears to me to be concerned primarily with "functions", or services, as such, rather than with the identity of the person who is paying for the provision of the services, or the reason for payment (although such factors are not, in my view, irrelevant). I agree in this connection with the views expressed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote in para 27 of his opinion which I have had the benefit of seeing in draft.

G

149 Thirdly, Mrs YL continues to enjoy Convention rights in respect of the provision of care and accommodation provided under section 21 of the 1948 Act against Birmingham, even after the care and accommodation was provided to her. It is true that, at least in some circumstances, those rights could be of somewhat less value in practice than if they existed against the proprietor, but I am not persuaded that any such disadvantage would be likely to be significant, let alone substantial. Further, as the documentation in this case illustrates, the contractual terms which a local authority is often able to impose on a proprietor of a care home with whom it makes arrangements under the 1948 Act may well ensure that a person's rights

H

A against the proprietor are pretty similar in practice to those which would be enjoyed against the local authority.

150 Fourthly, much of the concern of those who consider that contractors under contracting-out arrangements should have a Convention liability co-extensive with that which the contracting-out authority would have, is based on the nature of the powers given to contractors under such arrangements. This is illustrated by the reference to "the type of power" in B the extract from paragraph 41 of the Joint Committee Report quoted above. In the present type of case, however, the proprietor of a care home is not given significant, if any, statutory powers, a point discussed in a little more detail below.

151 Fifthly, the arbitrariness identified in the same extract from the Joint Committee report, if this appeal fails, is at least equalled by the C arbitrariness, if this appeal succeeds, of the existence of Convention rights of a private care home resident depending on whether her care and accommodation is being paid for (or was arranged by) the local authority, as opposed to herself or her family. Quite apart from that, I agree on this aspect with what Lord Scott says in paras 29 and 30 of his opinion.

152 Sixthly and more generally, I consider that, in answer to the policy argument for allowing this appeal on the basis of contracting-out, there is a D policy argument for dismissing it on the same basis. It is thought to be desirable, in some circumstances, to encourage core public authorities to contract-out services, and it may well be inimical to that policy if section 6(1) automatically applied to the contractor as it would to the authority. Indeed, unattractive though it may be to some people, one of the purposes of contracting-out at least certain services previously performed by E local authorities may be to avoid some of the legal constraints and disadvantages which apply to local authorities but not to private operators. I am in no position to decide on the relative strength of the two competing policy arguments: that is a matter for the legislature. However, the fact that there are competing arguments makes it hard to justify the courts resolving the instant issue by reference to policy.

153 Seventhly, it does not seem to me that, as a matter of ordinary F language, an activity is "a function of a public nature" merely because it is contracted-out, as opposed to its being provided directly, by a core public authority. If an activity were thereby automatically rendered such a function, it would mean that activities such as providing meals or cleaning and repairing buildings could be caught. Referring again to the Ministry of Defence contracting for the manufacture of military materiel, it seems to me G that the private manufacturer's activities would not be within section 6(3)(b) even though the Ministry could have manufactured the materiel in its own factory.

A wider perspective

154 The factors which I have so far considered to support the case for H saying that, by providing care and accommodation for Mrs YL pursuant to an agreement with Birmingham, Southern Cross was performing a "function which is public in nature" are, in summary form: (a) the existence and detailed nature of statutory regulation and control over care homes; (b) the provision of care and accommodation for the elderly and infirm is a beneficial public service; (c) the elderly and infirm are particularly vulnerable members of society; (d) the care and accommodation was provided pursuant to the local authority's statutory duty to arrange its provision; (e) the cost of the care and accommodation is funded by the local authority pursuant to its statutory duty; (f) the local authority has power to run its own care homes to provide care and accommodation for the elderly and infirm; and (g) the contention that section 6(3)(b) should apply to a contracting-out case.

155 For the reasons so far given, I consider that each factor, at least if taken individually, would be insufficient to render the provision of care and accommodation by Southern Cross in its care home to Mrs YL a "function of a public nature". However, it must be right to consider the effect of the various factors together, and, indeed, in the broader policy context. There is no doubt that, if one takes the various factors which I have summarised together, rather than examining the effect of each one separately, Mrs YL's case looks significantly stronger, but I still do not find it very persuasive. Each factor has some force, but, for the reasons already given, not very much force, at least in my opinion. Without some other, more powerful, wider, or policy, consideration to support the contention that section 6(3)(b) applies, I do not consider that the combination of the factors so far discussed serves to establish that Southern Cross is performing a function "of a public nature" in providing care and accommodation to Mrs YL in its care home.

156 I turn to what may be characterised as wider, policy, considerations. In that connection, the House was referred to a number of decisions concerning judicial review. The issue as to the meaning of the words "functions of a public nature" in a statute concerned with incorporating the Convention into domestic law does not necessarily involve quite the same principles as the question of whether a decision of a particular body is susceptible to judicial review. However, particularly given that the meaning of section 6(3)(b) is ultimately an issue of domestic law, the similarity in the character of the two issues, and the overlap of factors which come into play on the two issues, satisfies me that such decisions are of real assistance. So far as the effect of the cases on the present issue is concerned, there is nothing which I can usefully add to Lord Mance's analysis and conclusion in paras 100 to 105 of his speech.

157 While the question of the effect of section 6(3)(b) is one of domestic law, it seems to me that the Strasbourg jurisprudence is also of help, especially in the light of what has been said in your Lordships' House about the purpose of the 1998 Act, and section 6 in particular. In para 34 of his speech in R (Quark Fishing Ltd) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2006] 1 AC 529, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead said that the 1998 Act was "not intended to provide a domestic remedy where a remedy would not have been available in Strasbourg", and in para 29 of his speech in R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School [2007] 1 AC 100, my noble and learned friend, Lord Bingham of Cornhill said, to much the same effect, that the purpose of the 1998 Act "was not to enlarge the rights or remedies of those . . . whose Convention rights have been violated". These general observations are consistent with the views expressed by Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry in relation to section 6(3)(b) at paras 45 to 51 and paras 158 and 159 respectively in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546.

158 Indeed, the observations of this House in Aston Cantlow are in my opinion of more specific assistance to the resolution of the present appeal.

A Lord Hope and Lord Rodger said that the Strasbourg court jurisprudence on the effect of article 34 of the Convention (which restricts applications to the Strasbourg court to "any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals . . .") was relevant when considering whether an entity was a "core public authority".

159 Even more to the point, Lord Hope also said, at para 49, that " 'public functions' in this context is thus clearly linked to the functions and B powers, whether centralised or distributed, of government". In the following paragraph, he referred to article 34 as extending to "a person or body . . . established with a view to public administration as part of the process of government". Lord Rodger referred in paras 159, 160 and 163 to entities "exercising governmental power", "carrying out the functions of government" and having the "public function of government". This is very C much in line with the broader approach of Lord Nicholls: in para 10, while stressing that it was "no more than a useful guide", he said that in the light of "the repetition of the description 'public' " in section 6(3)(b), "essentially the contrast being drawn is between functions of a governmental nature and functions, or acts, which are not of that nature". To similar effect, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough invoked the test of a function which is "governmental in nature" and of entities which are "inherently D governmental" in para 88.

160 With the assistance of this guidance, and looking at other policy issues, the following considerations (which, in some cases, have already been mentioned and, in other cases, overlap to some extent and are not ranked in order of importance), are in point: (a) the activities of Southern Cross in providing care and accommodation for Mrs YL would not be susceptible to E judicial review; (b) Mrs YL would not, I think, be treated by the Strasbourg court as having Convention rights against Southern Cross, and she retains her Convention rights against Birmingham; (c) Southern Cross's functions with regard to the provision of care and accommodation would not be regarded as "governmental" in nature, at least in the United Kingdom; (d) in relation to its business, a care home proprietor such as Southern Cross has no special statutory powers in relation to those it provides with care and F accommodation, or otherwise; (e) neither the care home nor any aspect of its operation, as opposed to the cost of the care and accommodation provided to Mrs YL and others in her situation, is funded by Birmingham; and (f) the rights and liabilities between Southern Cross and Mrs YL arise under a private law contract. When taken together, these considerations establish to my satisfaction that the provision of care and accommodation by Southern G Cross to Mrs YL, despite being arranged and paid for by Birmingham pursuant to its statutory duty under sections 21 to 26 of the 1948 Act, is not a function "of a public nature" within section 6(3)(b).

161 I have already explained that I agree with Lord Mance's analysis of what the position would be in relation to judicial review. The Strasbourg jurisprudence has also been admirably discussed in his speech, and it would be otiose for me to repeat his analysis. The decisions are not all entirely easy H to reconcile, but it appears to me that they support the arguments put forward by Ms Beverley Lang for Southern Cross. First, Southern Cross would be regarded as falling within article 34 in connection with the provision of care and accommodation to Mrs YL. Secondly, and more controversially, Southern Cross would not be susceptible to a claim in the Strasbourg court at the suit of Mrs YL. In other words, to interpret section 6(3)(b) as giving Mrs YL Convention rights against Southern Cross would appear to involve extending her rights in a way inconsistent with the observations quoted above from Quark and Denbigh. Further, as already discussed, she has substantial Convention rights against Birmingham. A

162 Also of real significance, in my view, is the not unrelated point arising from the reference in the speeches in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546 to the governmental character of the functions covered by section 6(3)(b). As Lord Rodger explained in para 159, "the exact range of governmental power will vary . . . from state to state". Providing care and accommodation in a care home would not, in my opinion, be seen in this country as being a function which was of a character which could be described as "governmental", in the normal sense of that word. The fact that local authorities are empowered to run care homes no more justifies a contrary conclusion than the fact that they enter into maintenance or cleaning contracts in respect of their buildings or run restaurants for their staff justifies the view that such activities are governmental functions. B C

163 It is true, as Lord Bingham points out, that the state has accepted responsibility for the past 60 years for ensuring that care is provided for the old and infirm who cannot support themselves. However, that does not mean that the actual provision of such care to an individual is a function of a public nature, or that it would be perceived as being a governmental function, at least in a privately owned care home, even if paid for, as in her particular case at least in part, by a core public authority. D

164 The state provides education and health to everyone, and indeed it is obliged by the Convention to provide education. However, that certainly does not mean that the provision of health or education services in a private school or hospital is a function of a public nature, and, at least as at present advised, that would apply, in my view, even where the costs of the recipient of the service happens to be paid for by a core public authority. Similarly, local authorities provide free or subsidised accommodation for those who need it, but that does not mean that a private landlord falls within section 6(3)(b), even if its tenants receive rent support (including direct payment to the landlord) from a local authority. There are state pensions for every retired worker, and public sector workers receive earnings-related pensions, but that does not mean that a private company managing those pension funds, or underwriting of the pensions, would thereby be exercising a function of a public nature. E F

165 As already mentioned, it seems to me much easier to invoke public funding to support the notion that service is a function of "a public nature" where the funding effectively subsidises, in whole or in part, the cost of the service as a whole, rather than consisting of paying for the provision of that service to a specific person. Section 6(3)(b) is primarily concerned with functions and what is entailed with them (e g statutory powers and duties) rather than to whom they are provided, or indeed who provides them. Thus, it appears to me to be far easier to argue that section 6(3)(b) is engaged in relation to the provision of free housing by an entity all of whose activities are wholly funded by a local authority, than it is in relation to the provision of housing by an independently funded entity to impecunious tenants whose rent is paid by the local authority. G H

A 166 In my judgment, it is of particular importance in relation to the issue which we have to decide that a proprietor of a care home is not given significant, or indeed (as far as I am aware) any, coercive or other statutory powers, over its residents, whether they are in the care home pursuant to an arrangement with a local authority or otherwise. If proprietors had such powers, that would be a powerful reason for justifying the conclusion that a function was "public in nature". Running a prison, discharging a statutory B regulatory regime (Lord Nicholls's examples in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, para 9), maintaining defence (as is mentioned by Lord Bingham) and providing police services, which are plainly functions falling within section 6(3)(b), carry with them such powers.

167 I accept that the fact that some statutory power is attached to a function may not always determine that the function is "of a public nature". C Indeed, if it were, Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546 may well have been differently decided: see also R (West) v Lloyd's of London [2004] 3 All ER 251. In Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, para 147, Lord Rodger said the existence of a statutory power was not "sufficient" to bring the function within section 6(3)(b), and he characterised the existence of such a power as an "imprecise criterion for identifying [a public] authority". However, the D existence of a relatively wide-ranging and intrusive set of statutory powers in favour of the entity carrying out the function in question is a very powerful factor in favour of the function falling within section 6(3)(b). Indeed, it may well be determinative in many cases, because such powers are very powerfully indicative of a public institution or service. (For completeness, I should add that the source of the powers need not always be statutory: see, by analogy, R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers Ex p Datafin plc [1987] E QB 815).

168 In para 63 of his speech in Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 AC 546, Lord Hope of Craighead approached the issue slightly differently. He held that section 6(3)(b) did not apply because "the liability [in question] arises as a matter of private law". Although he dissented in the answer on this aspect, Lord Scott appears, in para 131, to have thought this the right approach. F The liability of Southern Cross to provide Mrs YL with care and accommodation in the present case similarly "arises as a matter of private law". That is illustrated by the fact that Mrs YL was (or her relatives were) free to choose which care home she went into, and took advantage of that right by selecting a care home more expensive than Birmingham was prepare to pay for, and funding the difference. Indeed, although provided as a result of a core public authority carrying out its duty to arrange and pay towards G its cost, the services provided in this case are very much of a personal nature, as well as arising pursuant to a private law contract between Southern Cross and Mrs YL.

169 Mr Fordham, for the Interveners, Justice, Liberty and BIHR, made much of the point which I have already briefly mentioned, namely the alleged anomaly which would result if the question of whether a person H whose care home was paid for (or arranged by) the local authority would have Convention rights should depend on whether the care home was run by the local authority or a private entity. Even if that can be characterised as an anomaly, it is a point which seems to me to be of little relevance. It is inherent in the scheme of section 6 that any service provided by a core public authority is caught, whereas it is only if the service falls within section 6(3)(b) that it is caught where the service is provided by anyone else. It would in my view, if anything, be rather more of an anomaly if inhabitants of a privately owned care home, who were funded in whole or in part by a local authority, had Convention rights, whereas other inhabitants, who paid for themselves but were in an otherwise identical situation, did not. In any event, the balancing exercise in the case of a resident who claimed her Convention rights were being infringed, would be different in a care home run by a local authority (who would have no Convention rights) from a care home with a private proprietor (who would be able to pray in aid his own Convention rights).

Conclusion

170 Accordingly, for the reasons given by Lord Mance, as well for those given by Lord Scott, and for the additional reasons I have set out, I am of the view that the provision of care and accommodation by Southern Cross to Mrs YL, even though it was arranged, and is being paid for, by Birmingham pursuant to sections 21 to 26 of the 1948 Act, does not constitute a "function of a public nature" within section 6(3)(b). Accordingly, I would dismiss this appeal.

171 Finally, it is right to add this. It may well be thought to be desirable that residents in privately owned care homes should be given Convention rights against the proprietors. That is a subject on which there are no doubt opposing views, and I am in no position to express an opinion. However, if the legislature considers such a course appropriate, then it would be right to spell it out in terms, and, in the process, to make it clear whether the rights should be enjoyed by all residents of such care homes, or only certain classes (e g those whose care and accommodation is wholly or partly funded by a local authority).

Appeal dismissed.

Lord Justice Laws:

INTRODUCTION

1. This is an appeal, with permission granted by Waller LJ on 13th May 2008, against the decision of the Divisional Court (Maurice Kay LJ and Walker J) given on 6th March 2008 by which it dismissed the appellant's application for judicial review seeking to challenge the legality of paragraph 7(2)(f) of the Atomic Weapons Establishment (AWE) Aldermaston Byelaws 2007 (the 2007 Byelaws).

2. The appellant is a long-time member of the Aldermaston Women's Peace Camp (the AWPC). The AWPC protest against nuclear weapons. They do so in the vicinity of the Atomic Weapons Establishment at Aldermaston (the AWE). They have camped on land at Aldermaston, most recently in an area owned by the respondent Secretary of State within what the 2007 Byelaws call "the Controlled Areas". Paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws prohibits camping in the Controlled Areas from which, therefore, it bans the AWPC. The question in the case is whether this prohibition violates the appellant's right of free expression guaranteed by Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights (the ECHR).

THE FACTS

3. What follows is an outline. It will be necessary to say a little more about some of the facts in the context of particular submissions advanced by counsel and the conclusions I will arrive at.

4. The camp has been going for some 23 years. The women assemble on the land for the second weekend of each month. They stay from Friday evening until Sunday morning. They hold vigils, meetings and demonstrations, and hand out leaflets. Their protest is and always has been entirely peaceful.

5. The land occupied by the AWE includes what are called the Protected Areas and the Controlled Areas. Public entry into the Protected Areas, where the actual Research Establishment is situated, is forbidden. However the public has free access to the Controlled Areas, and it is there, as I have indicated, that the AWPC foregathers each month. We were told that the Controlled Areas have been open to the public at least since 1986.

THE LEGISLATION

6. The 2007 Byelaws have been in force since 31st May 2007. Their vires is s.14(1) of the Military Lands Act 1992. S.14(2) is also material. The relevant provisions are:

> "(1) Where any land belonging to a Secretary of State or to a volunteer corps is for the time being appropriated by or with the consent of a Secretary of State for any military purpose, a Secretary of State may make byelaws for regulating the use of the land for the purposes to which it is appropriated, and for securing the public against danger arising from that use, with power to prohibit all intrusion on the land and all obstruction of the use thereof …

(2) Where any such byelaws permit the public to use the land for any purpose when not used for the military purpose to which it is appropriated, those byelaws may also provide for the government of the land when so used by the public, and the preservation of order and good conduct thereon, and for the prevention of nuisances, obstructions, encampments, and encroachments thereon, and for the prevention of any injury to the same, or to anything growing or erected thereon, and for the prevention of anything interfering with the orderly use thereof by the public for the purpose permitted by the byelaws."

7. Paragraph 6 of the 2007 Byelaws allows the public to have access to the Controlled Areas. It provides:

> "Subject to the provisions of these byelaws, members of the public are permitted to use all parts of the Controlled Areas not specially enclosed or entry to which is not shown by signs or fences as being prohibited or restricted, for any lawful purpose at all times when the Controlled Areas are not being used for the military purpose for which they are appropriated."

Paragraph 7(2) of the 2007 Byelaws opens with the words "No person shall within the Controlled Areas …", and there then follow twenty prohibited acts, listed under (a)-(t). I should read paragraph 7(2)(f), (g) and (j):

> "(f) camp in tents, caravans, trees or otherwise;
> (g) attach any thing to, or place any thing over any wall, fence, structure or other surface;
> (j) act in any way likely to cause annoyance, nuisance or injury to other persons …"

Contravention of any provision of Byelaw 7 is a criminal offence: see Byelaw 9.

8. ECHR Article 10 provides:

> "(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority …
> (2) The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the > prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

I should also set out Article 11:

> "(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others …
> (2) No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others …"

THE ISSUE

9. The appellant sought originally to challenge the legality of paragraph 7(2)(f), (g) and (j). The Divisional Court, having granted permission to seek judicial review and proceeded to determine the substantive judicial review claim, upheld the challenge to paragraph 7(2)(g) but dismissed the balance of the application relating to 7(2)(f) and (j). We are no longer concerned with (j). The appeal relates only to (f).

10. As I have foreshadowed the appellant's primary case is that paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws constitutes an unlawful interference with her right – indeed the right of every member of the AWPC – of freedom of expression guaranteed by ECHR Article 10. It is also said there is a violation of Article 11. That, I think, is on the facts not so much to be regarded as an autonomous claim, but rather as underlining the mode of free expression relied on: a communal protest in a camp established for the purpose.

11. It is of course common ground, having regard to s.6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 which I need not read, that in framing paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws the Secretary of State was obliged to respect the Article 10 rights of persons potentially affected by the prohibition thereby enacted. It is clear that paragraph 7(2)(f) constitutes in practice an interference with the rights of the AWPC pursuant to Article 10(1). So much is also common ground. The ultimate question in the appeal, therefore, is whether this byelaw is nevertheless justified by any of the considerations in Article 10(2).

THE SECRETARY OF STATE'S CASE

12. Although the Secretary of State is respondent to the appeal it is convenient first to explain his case. He bears the burden of justifying the accepted interference with the Article 10 right. As a preliminary, there are some foothills to cross.

The Legal Setting

13. In deciding whether the interference is justified the court has to consider whether paragraph 7(2)(f) serves the achievement of a legitimate aim and, if it does, constitutes a proportionate means of doing so. The requirement of proportionality is derived from the rubric "necessary in a democratic society" in Article 10(2). It is well established that this standard can only be satisfied if the impugned measure is required to fulfil what the European Court of Human Rights has described as a "pressing social need": see, amongst a welter of authority, Sunday Times v United Kingdom (1979) 2 EHRR 245.

14. Moreover the weight of the Article 10(2) justification advanced by the State cannot – certainly in this case – be looked at in isolation. Whether paragraph 7(2)(f) imposes no more than a proportionate restriction of AWPC's free expression rights depends also on the particular nature and quality of the right's exercise with which the prohibition interferes. Here the Secretary of State's case has two specific aspects. First, Mr Nardell on his behalf submits that we should attach importance to the fact that the only source of the public's right (thus AWPC's right) to go on the Controlled Areas is to be found in the 2007 Byelaws themselves: paragraph 6, which I have set out. They are not, otherwise, public land at all. Mr Nardell says that all that has happened is that the Secretary of State has through the 2007 Byelaws granted the public a right to go on the Controlled Areas, but subject to conditions including that provided for by paragraph 7(2)(f). The State owes no positive obligation whatever to set aside any part of the property as a place for public protest. Moreover the Secretary of State has not previously admitted the public to the Controlled Areas for camping purposes, let alone political protest: the predecessor byelaws also prohibited camping. In all those circumstances, while as I have foreshadowed Mr Nardell accepts that paragraph 7(2)(f) constitutes an interference with AWPC's rights under Article 10, he says that the interference is weak.

15. The second aspect of the Secretary of State's case concerning the particular nature and quality of the Article 10 right's exercise (with which the paragraph 7(2)(f) prohibition interferes) is altogether broader. It consists in what Mr Nardell submits is an important distinction: between the so-called essence of the Article 10 right on the one hand, and the "manner and form" of its exercise on the other. Mr Nardell submits that paragraph 7(2)(f) only intrudes upon the latter, and this has, or should have, a significant bearing on the court's readiness to hold that paragraph 7(2)(f) is no more than a proportionate interference. Plainly there is not, nor could there be, any suggestion that the Secretary of State has sought to impose anything approaching a blanket ban on AWPC's rights of protest. They may protest as much as they like: all they are stopped from doing is camping in the Controlled Areas. Mr Nardell submits that such a restriction goes at most to the manner and form of AWPC's exercise of the right of free expression; and not to the right's essence.

16. The distinction between a right's essence and the manner and form of its exercise has been recognised in the Strasbourg jurisprudence: Ziliberberg v Moldova (Application 61821/00), Ashingdan v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528 (paragraph 57), and F v Switzerland (1987) 10 EHRR 411. Of particular interest in the context of this case is an authority referred to by Mr Nardell in response to the reply skeleton argument put in by Mr Pievsky for the appellant, namely Rai, Allmond & "Negotiate Now" v UK (1995) 19 EHRR CD93. Mr Nardell would submits that this case tends to show – and does so in the then highly charged context of protest and demonstration concerning Northern Ireland – that restrictions on the manner of the Article 10 right's exercise may very well be regarded as proportionate provided they betray no bias or arbitrariness and do not amount to a blanket prohibition. Rai, Allmond concerned an application to hold a political rally in Trafalgar Square by an organisation favouring negotiations without pre-conditions in Northern Ireland. The police considered that there would be no danger to public order, but the application was turned down having regard to the policy of successive governments since 1972 to refuse permission for public demonstrations or meetings in Trafalgar Square on the Northern Ireland issue. After the IRA bombing in Aldershot which killed seven civilians, the Secretary of State had in 1972 stated that > "... the Government had to decide whether it would be fitting to permit the use of the Square by any organisation that had declared its support for the perpetrators of violence of that kind and they had no hesitation in deciding that it would be an affront to the British people to do so. The Government having made the decision, it would be wrong to attempt to distinguish between different organisations..."

17. In Strasbourg the applicants submitted that their assembly was banned in Trafalgar Square because it was "controversial" and liable to shock or offend rather than for any reason of public safety. The Commission, which concluded that the applicants' complaint was manifestly ill-founded, held that the question whether the applicants' policy was merely "controversial" was within the government's margin of appreciation, and said this (CD98):

> "Having regard to the fact that the refusal of permission did not amount to a blanket prohibition on the holding of the applicants' rally but only prevented the use of a high profile location (other venues being available in central London)... the restriction in the present case may be regarded as proportionate and justified as necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of Article 11(2) of the Convention."

18. One might compare Chorherr v Austria (1993) 17 EHRR 358, in which persons displaying placards and distributing leaflets at a military ceremony were arrested and convicted of "causing a breach of the peace by conduct likely to cause annoyance". The court, holding there had been no violation of Article 10, stated:

> "31. ... [The] margin of appreciation extends in particular to the choice of the - reasonable and appropriate - means to be used by the authorities to ensure that lawful manifestations can take place peacefully...
> 32. … [W]hen he chose this event for his demonstration against the Austrian armed forces, Mr Chorherr must have realised that it might lead to a disturbance requiring measures of restraint, which in this instance, moreover, were not excessive. Finally, when the Constitutional Court approved these measures it expressly found that in the circumstances of the case they had been intended to prevent breaches of the peace and not to frustrate the expression of an opinion...

> 33. In the light of these findings, it cannot be said that the authorities overstepped the margin of appreciation which they enjoyed in order to determine whether the measures in issue were 'necessary in a democratic society' and in particular whether there was a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the legitimate aim pursued."

19. Mr Nardell would submit that the learning shows not only that there is a real distinction between restrictions on the manner and form of a protest (or other utterance) and a prohibition of the protest altogether; it shows also that once the court is satisfied that the case is in the former territory and not the latter, it will be much readier to allow the State what may be a generous margin of appreciation to take restrictive measures for practical or prudential reasons. As Professor Barendt has said (Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn., p. 281):

> "[R]easonable time, manner, and place restrictions have been upheld, provided at any rate that they leave ample alternative channels for communication of the ideas an information."

One may compare the decision of the Divisional Court in Blum v DPP & Orsv DPP [2007] UKHRR 233 in which it was held that a requirement for prior authorisation of a demonstration would not generally be repugnant to ECHR Article 11.

20. On Mr Nardell's case the space given by the Strasbourg court to manner and form restrictions is, moreover, all of a piece with another dimension of the court's jurisprudence. This is the care taken in the authorities to avoid a position in which invocation of a Convention right might seem to, or might in fact, confer an immunity from the effects of ordinary State regulation for proper purposes. Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 (Application No 272385/95) is a good example. The applicant was a gypsy. The local authority refused planning permission for her mobile home to be stationed on a piece of land she had purchased, and served enforcement notices which were upheld at a public inquiry. Further applications for planning permission for a bungalow were refused, and the refusals again upheld at public inquiries. The court at Strasbourg held that the authority's decisions constituted an interference with the applicant's right to respect for her private life, family life and home pursuant to ECHR Article 8; but the interference had the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of others, the national authorities enjoyed a margin of appreciation as to how that should be achieved, and they had weighed in the balance the various competing interests. Accordingly the decisions arrived at were proportionate to the legitimate aim of preserving the environment. At paragraph 96 the court observed that > "the fact of belonging to a minority with a traditional lifestyle different from that of the majority does not confer an immunity from general laws intended to safeguard the assets of the community as a whole, such as the environment..."

21. Mr Nardell submits that all these aspects of the case-law provide the setting for the Secretary of State's justification of the interference with the AWPC's rights constituted by paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws. Their effect is that while the justification must be real and not fanciful, and of course serve a legitimate aim, it must be judged by reference to a very broad margin of appreciation enjoyed by the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State's Justification of paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws

22. What then is the Secretary of State's justification for paragraph 7(2)(f)? It is offered in the witness statement of Mr Timothy Pinchen, who is employed by the Ministry of Defence dealing with estate management issues across various parts of the Defence Estate. The essence of his evidence is crisply summarised by Maurice Kay LJ giving the judgment of the Divisional Court:

> "23. … As a matter of policy, there is a general prohibition on unauthorised camping across the Defence Estate. It is only allowed with express permission. The reasons include operational and security concerns. Dealing specifically with Aldermaston, Mr Pinchen says that camping in the vicinity of the security fence is not appropriate for security reasons. If it were allowed, additional surveillance would be necessary. Camping can be used as a base, a cover or a distraction in relation to terrorist or similar activities. There are no publicly accessible sanitation facilities anywhere in the Controlled Areas. AWE have received numerous complaints about the AWPC and its occupants, ranging from the leaving of human excreta in the area to passing motorists beeping their horns … The claimant denies all allegations of antisocial behaviour and we are content to accept that, in general, the members of the AWPC do not behave badly. They have been camping there or thereabouts for many years and the prohibition on camping in the Byelaws has existed since at least 1986. We have previously explained why it has not been enforced over the years."

The reference to a previous explanation is to paragraph 5 of the Divisional Court's judgment:

> "It seems that the 1986 Byelaws were never used against the AWPC, probably because there was for a time some doubt as to whether the women were on land belonging to the Secretary of State and, more recently, because of apprehension about the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998."

23. I should notice some further specific points made by Mr Pinchen. At paragraph 48 of his statement he says that camping on the verges "is in dangerous proximity to high volume traffic... [and] provides a distraction to motorists". At paragraph 52 he refers to an area called "Bluebell Wood" which has been used for camping, but is also "regularly used by residents for recreational and access purposes as there is no footpath along the verge of the busy road. Last year there was an attack on the unauthorised camp by, it is believed, local residents."

24. In light of all these matters Mr Nardell would pray in aid a series of legitimate aims or purposes, among those listed in ECHR Article 10(2), which are promoted by paragraph 7(2)(f): national security, public safety, the prevention of disorder or crime, and the protection of the rights of others. And given the broad margin of appreciation to be accorded to the Secretary of State for the reasons which (on Mr Nardell's case) I have explained, the court should not undercut the Secretary of State's deployment of paragraph 7(2)(f) as a proportionate measure supporting those aims.

25. Given all these considerations Mr Nardell submits that paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws constitutes no violation of the appellant's rights under ECHR Article 10; and if it does not, there is no free-standing case under Article 11.

THE APPELLANT'S CASE

The Legal Setting

26. Mr Pievsky for the appellant does not dispute, nor could he, that the Strasbourg court has accepted a distinction between manner and form on the one hand and the essence of a Convention right on the other. He also concedes that the prevention of public disorder may in appropriate cases justify such measures as a requirement of prior authorisation or even the prohibition of a protest; though he submits that the feared disorder must be imminent. He does not, however, accept that in principle the law allows a wider discretionary area of judgment in relation to the manner and form, as opposed to the essence, of a political protest. ("Discretionary area of judgment" is a better phrase than "margin of appreciation": as is well known the latter is a Strasbourg term of art reflecting the international court's distance from the facts and circumstances of decision-making in the States Parties.)

27. In any event, however, Mr Pievsky roundly submits that we are not in "manner and form" territory. His case is that the AWPC camp is not merely the setting or the context – the manner and form – of his client's protest: it is an inherent part of the protest itself. It has a symbolic effect. Attending a peace camp is a traditional and well-recognised form of political expression. There are many well-known instances. Waller LJ granting permission to appeal considered that "the byelaw as construed catches a form of peaceful protest used in many places..." It is undoubted that acts as well as words may constitute political expression: see for example Vajna v Hungary (Application 33629/06). In his reply skeleton argument Mr Pievsky puts it thus (paragraph 4):

> "Defacing a flag, deliberately using a seat on a bus supposedly reserved for citizens of a different race, in order to defy a racist law on segregation, going on a hunger strike, carrying out a silent vigil, and attending a peace camp are well-known ways in which political messages about fundamentally important political matters can be very powerfully expressed – albeit silently."

28. As for the contention that the appellant's ECHR rights are the less because (in light of paragraph 6 of the 2007 Byelaws) all that has happened is that the Secretary of State has granted public access to the Controlled Areas subject to conditions, this is, on Mr Pievsky's argument, a non sequitur. He submitted in terms that government property is held for the public good; the Secretary of State has no legitimate private axe to grind. I apprehend Mr Pievsky would say that once it is accepted that the appellant enjoys Article 10 rights with the AWPC, the fact that the government landowner has granted access to the land means only that the AWPC is not a trespasser.

29. Mr Pievsky also submits that the Secretary of State has given no weight to the subject-matter of the AWPC protest: nuclear weapons. Where the acts or speech in question relate to "a debate on a matter of general concern and [constitute] political and militant expression … a high level of protection of the right to freedom of expression is required under Article 10": Lindon and others v France (2008) 46 EHRR 35.

30. In all these circumstances Mr Pievsky submits that the interference with his client's rights constituted by paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws, far from being weak or insubstantial, goes to the right's core or essence; and the discretionary area of judgment which the domestic court should allow the Secretary of State (whatever the margin of appreciation which might be contemplated by the international tribunal) should be severely circumscribed. Paragraph 7(2)(f) could only be vindicated by a substantial objective justification, amounting to an undoubted pressing social need.

The Secretary of State's Justification of paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws

31. Mr Pievsky has advanced arguments in reply to all of the points put forward by Mr Pinchen. As for concerns about security, it has not been suggested that the AWPC have ever proposed to enter the Protected Areas, and (as my Lord Wall LJ suggested in the course of argument) the perimeter fence is presumably patrolled in any event. Then there is a point about sanitation: the appellant has given evidence, which I do not think is contradicted, as to the availability of adequate sanitation facilities. Moreover the 2007 Byelaws include provisions relating to nuisance and waste and there has been no suggestion of any breach. Next there is Mr Pinchen's evidence of "numerous complaints about the AWPC and its occupants", some of them taking a particularly unpleasant form. The Divisional Court accepted that "in general, the members of the AWPC do not behave badly", and the evidence overall shows that their activities down the years have been consistently peaceful.

32. On this last aspect of the case, the reaction of other members of the public to the presence and the activities of the AWPC, Mr Pievsky understandably relies on the decision of the Divisional Court in Redmond-Bate v DPP [1999] EWHC Admin 732. That case concerned an episode in which one or more of three women, Christian fundamentalists, were preaching from the steps of Wakefield Cathedral. A crowd gathered. Some of the people in the crowd showed themselves hostile to the women. A police officer at the scene feared a breach of the peace. He asked the women to stop preaching. They refused. He arrested them for breach of the peace. One of the women was subsequently convicted of obstructing a police officer. Her appeal to the Crown Court was dismissed. She launched a further appeal, by way of case stated, to the High Court; and this appeal was successful. Sedley LJ (with whom Collins J agreed) said this:

> "18. ... The question for PC Tennant was whether there was a threat of violence and if so, from whom it was coming. If there was no real threat, no question of intervention for breach of the peace arose. If the appellant and her companions were (like the street preacher in Wise v Dunning) being > so provocative that someone in the crowd, without behaving wholly unreasonably, might be moved to violence he was entitled to ask them to stop and to arrest them if they would not. If the threat of disorder or violence was coming from passers-by who were taking the opportunity to react so as to cause trouble (like the Skeleton Army in Beatty v Gilbanks), then it was they and not the preachers who should be asked to desist and arrested if they would not."

33. In all these circumstances Mr Pievsky submits that the Secretary of State has not begun to demonstrate a substantial objective justification for paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws, amounting to an undoubted pressing social need.

THE DECISION OF THE DIVISIONAL COURT

34. The Divisional Court's conclusions are expressed in paragraph 25:

> "The questions become: has the Secretary of State established that the prohibition on camping is necessary in a democratic society and that it satisfies a pressing social need by reference to the reasons set out in Articles 10(2) and 11(2). Has he accordingly established the proportionality of the prohibition …? In our judgment, the answer to both questions is in the affirmative. We attach some significance to the fact that the prohibition only limits freedom of association and of expression on the property of the Secretary of State. Importantly, a prohibition on camping only impacts on one form of association and expression. Mr Pievsky is eloquent on the significance of camping to his client and her colleagues but we see his point more in terms of poetry than of true principle. In our judgment, the evidence of Mr Pinchen and the matters to which we have referred enable the Secretary of State to justify the prohibition on camping."

CONCLUSIONS

The Legal Setting

35. In my judgment the supposed distinction between the essence of a protest and the manner and form of its exercise has to be treated with considerable care. In some cases it will be real, in others insubstantial. All depends on the particular facts; and it is worth remembering that the Strasbourg court has always been sensitive to factual nuance.

36. As I have said it is plain in this case that the Secretary of State has not sought to impose anything approaching a blanket ban on AWPC's rights of protest. They may protest as much as they like: all they are stopped from doing is camping in the Controlled Areas. In that sense it may be said that paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws only goes to the manner and form of the exercise of the appellant's rights under ECHR Article 10. It is not on its face directed towards the suppression of free speech, on the part of the AWPC or anyone else. It merely prohibits camping, which happens to be the mode or setting chosen by the AWPC for its protest. It happens also (Mr Pinchen, paragraph 37) that there is a general prohibition of unauthorised camping across the Defence estate.

37. But this "manner and form" may constitute the actual nature and quality of the protest; it may have acquired a symbolic force inseparable from the protesters' message; it may be the very witness of their beliefs. It takes little imagination to perceive, as I would hold, that that is the case here. As I have said, the AWPC has been established for something like 23 years. Some of those involved may have been steadfast participants the whole time. Others will have come and gone. But the camp has borne consistent, long-standing, and peaceful witness to the convictions of the women who have belonged to it. To them, and (it may fairly be assumed) to many who support them, and indeed to others who disapprove and oppose them, the "manner and form" is the protest itself.

38. In my judgment, therefore, the fact that the camp can be categorised as the mode not the essence of the protest carries little weight. And the fact that the Secretary of State is himself the source of the public's right to go on the Controlled Areas carries none. Mr Pievsky's submission that government property is held for the public good is obviously correct; indeed, nothing could be more elementary. The Secretary of State has, as I have said, no legitimate private axe to grind. It follows that the Secretary of State's grant of a general permission to go on the Controlled Areas would only have resonance if the case were like a private landowner's grant, whereby he reserved certain rights to himself. In such a case the reserved rights would of course limit the permission in the landowner's own legitimate interests. There is no analogy here.

39. In light of all these considerations I consider that if he is to show compliance with his obligations under the Human Rights Act the Secretary of State must demonstrate a substantial objective justification for paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws, amounting to an undoubted pressing social need. The byelaw's interference with the appellant's rights is far from being weak or insubstantial. The Secretary of State does not enjoy so broad a margin of discretionary judgment as Mr Nardell submits.

The Secretary of State's Justification of paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws

40. Against that background I turn to the Secretary of State's justifications for the interference with the appellant's Article 10 rights constituted by paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws. Mr Pinchen helpfully explains that the making of the 2007 Byelaws followed a Byelaws Review which began in 2004 as a rolling exercise. Various recent legal developments were considered, and the Review led to "a number of adjustments to the generic byelaws template" (Mr Pinchen, paragraph 20). There was correspondence with the AWPC in which the AWPC (and their lawyers) asserted Convention rights. At length the Byelaws were made.

41. In my judgment the Secretary of State's justifications are insubstantial. First of all, the fact that no steps were taken to put a stop to the camp over the 23 years of its existence to my mind speaks loud. I have already referred to the explanation offered for the fact that the 1986 Byelaws were never used against the AWPC: "there was for a time some doubt as to whether the women were on land belonging to the Secretary of State and, more recently, because of apprehension about the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998" (Divisional Court judgment, paragraph 5). I am afraid I think this is extremely feeble. I acknowledge that the AWPC has occupied different locations over the years, and there seems even today to be a degree of uncertainty, if not confusion, as to where the boundaries of the Controlled Area have precisely lain. But if the Secretary of State in truth entertained substantial objections to the presence of the camp, he was surely able to deploy appropriate resources to ascertain the exact position and take legal steps to deal with it. And acting on expert advice he would, no less surely, have adopted a clear stance on the Human Rights Act, which has now been in force for eight years and more.

42. Mr Pievsky's responses to the individual justifications canvassed in Mr Pinchen's evidence are all generally persuasive. Paragraph 7(2)(f) was not framed in the face of high-profile public concerns, as in Rai, Almond (1995) 19 EHRR CD93; or threats of violent public disorder, as in Chorherr v Austria (1993) 17 EHRR 358; or defiance of the general law, as in Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48. In my judgment the Secretary of State has viewed, or treated, the AWPC's presence at Aldermaston for all the world as if it were no more nor less than a nuisance. I accept he appears to have regarded it as more than that, and I certainly accept that Mr Pinchen's evidence accurately describes the Secretary of State's perception of the matter. But the individual points made – the security fence, traffic problems, lavatories, the bad behaviour of other members of the public – are, in objective terms, nuisance points.

43. Rights worth having are unruly things. Demonstrations and protests are liable to be a nuisance. They are liable to be inconvenient and tiresome, or at least perceived as such by others who are out of sympathy with them. Sometimes they are wrong-headed and misconceived. Sometimes they betray a kind of arrogance: an arrogance which assumes that spreading the word is always more important than the mess which, often literally, the exercise leaves behind. In that case, firm but balanced regulation may be well justified. In this case there is no substantial factor of that kind. As for the rest, whether or not the AWPC's cause is wrong-headed or misconceived is neither here nor there, and if their activities are inconvenient or tiresome, the Secretary of State's shoulders are surely broad enough to cope.

44. For all these reasons, in my judgment the effect of paragraph 7(2)(f) of the 2007 Byelaws is to violate the appellant's rights guaranteed by ECHR Articles 10 and 11. I would accordingly allow the appeal. If my Lords agree, we should hear argument as to the appropriate form of relief.

Lord Justice Wall :

45. I do agree. Since I have had the great advantage of reading in draft the judgment of my Lord, Laws LJ and since I find myself in complete agreement with it, I propose to add only a short judgment of my own; (1) because of what I see as the importance of the case; and (2) because we are differing from the Divisional Court on the critical issue.

46. I would like to make two short points. The first is that I was unimpressed, on the facts of this case, by the argument advanced on behalf of the Secretary of State in paragraph 6 of Mr. Pinchen's witness statement that the prohibition on camping was merely a means of redirecting the protest, and not of extinguishing it. In Mr Pinchen's words: -

> The MOD recognises that members of the public may have strongly held opinions about military activity, not least about the development and manufacture of nuclear weapons…… It entirely respects the entitlement of individuals to express views and participate in protest activity about those matters. The MOD's aim in making and enforcing byelaws for Controlled "Areas is not to prevent people from participating in such activity, but to impose on all who wish to use the Controlled Areas the regulation considered necessary to enable the Ministry to offer public access in a way that is compatible with the operational requirements of the establishment".

47. In my judgment, this paragraph is vulnerable to attack on a number of fronts. I will identify only two. In the first place, it seems to me to give take no cognisance of the nature of the protest, as explained by the appellant in paragraph 7 of her second witness statement: -

> "I would like to emphasise how fundamental camping is to the AWPC's protests at Aldermaston. As AWPC's name suggests, its very nature is the camp. Without the camp AWPC simply would not exist……."

48. In the second place, there is absolutely no evidence that the presence of the AWPC over many years has been incompatible "with the operational requirements of the establishment". Had it been, Mr. Pinchen's statement would, no doubt have provided a great deal of detail. As it is, his statement, as I read it, is highly unspecific.

49. I therefore find myself in respectful disagreement with paragraph 25 of the judgment of the Divisional Court, which my Lord has set out and which I will not repeat. Whatever one's views of the AWPC (which are, as my Lord says, neither here nor there) the penultimate sentence of that paragraph strikes me as unduly dismissive, and in my judgment the evidence of Mr. Pinchen comes nowhere near demonstrating a "pressing social need". In this regard, I gratefully adopt and associate myself with my Lord's analysis of Mr. Pinchen's evidence which I cannot better and need not repeat.

50. My second point is that, in my judgment, this is a case about freedom of expression under ECHR Article 10, and freedom of association and assembly under Article 11. For the Secretary of State, Mr Nardell spent a considerable amount of time taking us through the decision of the ECtHR in Chapman v UK which my Lord discusses in paragraph. 20 of his judgment. Chapman is, of course, a case concerned with ECHR Article 8, and speaking for myself, I found wholly unpersuasive Mr. Nardell's argument that the margin of appreciation allowed in such a case could be translated to a case such as the present, involving as it does, Articles 10 and 11.

51. I have given these short reasons, which are I think entirely parasitic on my Lord's judgment, to explain how, in part at least, I reached the clear conclusion at the end of the argument that this appeal should succeed. It follows, of course, that I am extremely grateful to have the reasons for allowing the appeal so fully and clearly articulated by my Lord.

Lord Justice Stanley Burnton:

52. I agree both with the judgment of Laws LJ and that of Wall LJ.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE HIGH COURT

The Chancellor:

Introduction

1. In November 2004 the University of Cambridge ("the University") went into occupation of a building it had newly constructed for the purposes of its faculty of education. The building is used by the University both for the provision of education at undergraduate and graduate level and for purposes of research. The University applied to Her Majesty's Revenue & Customs ["HMRC"] for the necessary consent to entitle it to issue a certificate to the supplier of electricity to the building requiring the supplier to charge VAT in respect of those supplies at the reduced rate of 5% allowed by s.29A of and Note 3 of Group 1 to Schedule 7A to the VAT Act 1994. Those provisions allow payment of the reduced rate of 5% in respect of supplies of electricity for:

> "use by a charity otherwise than in the course or furtherance of a business".

The University is a charity but, as it admits, its provision of higher education is a business activity.

2. The University seeks to avoid the likely consequence of that admission by relying on Article 13 EU Principal VAT Directive (2006/112/EC). That article is in the same terms as article 4(5) of the Sixth VAT Directive and provides:

> "Article 13
> 1. States, regional and local government authorities and other bodies governed by public law shall not be regarded as taxable persons in respect of the activities or transactions in which they engage as public authorities, even where they collect dues, fees, contributions or payments in connection with those activities or transactions.
> However, when they engage in such activities or transactions, they shall be regarded as taxable persons in respect of those activities or transactions where their treatment as non-taxable persons would lead to significant distortions of competition.
> In any event, bodies governed by public law shall be regarded as taxable persons in respect of the activities listed in Annex I, provided that those activities are not carried out on such a small scale as to be negligible.
> 2. Member States may regard activities, exempt under Articles 132, 135, 136, 371, 374 to 377, and Article 378(2), Article 379(2), or Articles 380 to 390, engaged in by bodies governed by public law as activities in which those bodies engage as public authorities."

3. The case for the University involves three propositions, namely:

> (1) the University is an "other bod[y] governed by public law";
> (2) the University engages in its activities or transactions "as [a] public authorit[y]";
> (3) the proper application of Article 13 requires that the engagement of the University in those activities and transactions is to be treated for VAT purposes as not carrying on an economic activity.

It is common ground that if Article 13 does apply in the manner for which the University contends then the use of electricity by the University in its new building is not "in the course or furtherance of a business" for the purposes of Note 3 of Group 1 to Schedule 7A to the VAT Act 1994.

4. These contentions were rejected by HMRC on 1st September 2005 and by the VAT and Duties Tribunal (Mr Edward Sadler and Miss Sheila Wong Chong) on the appeal of the University in a decision released on 12th March 2008. It is from that decision of the VAT and Duties Tribunal that the University now appeals pursuant to s.11 Tribunals and Enquiries Act 1992 on the ground that it is dissatisfied with it "in point of law".

The Facts

5. The Tribunal heard extensive evidence from Mr Kerry Sykes, the deputy director of finance of the University, and Mr Ian Lewis, the head of finance of Higher Education Funding Council for England ("HEFCE") as to the constitution and funding of the University. So far as material to the first two propositions set out in paragraph 3 above, the Tribunal summarised that evidence in paragraphs 49 to 63 of its decision. For immediate purposes the following broad summary will suffice.

6. The University was incorporated by Statute in 1571. It is currently regulated by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act 1923 and the secondary and tertiary legislation made thereunder. That legislation provides a complete code for the powers, governance and administration of the University. In addition, as the Tribunal recorded in paragraph 54 of its decision:

> "...over the centuries an abundance of statutory and prescriptive rights have accreted to the [University], conferring special privileges or regulating aspects of its historic activities or assets and property rights."

7. The funding of the University is derived from a number of sources, including the Cambridge University Press, public examination and assessment services, research grants and contracts, endowment and investment income, student fees and government funding almost entirely through HEFCE. The latter represents

20% of the University's income from all sources (30% of the University Press and public examination fees are excluded). With regard to HEFCE funding the Tribunal recorded in paragraph 61:

> "...the greater part of the funding is a block grant for teaching based simply on the number of students, and under current policy no conditions are attached to such per capita funding beyond standard conditions such as accounting for the spending of the funds and submitting to quality assurance supervision if requested. The [University] has full liberty to allocate the block grant funding as it sees fit. The [University] may be funded for a specific purpose beyond the block grant in which case, of course, the funding must be applied for that purpose and the University must comply with any special conditions imposed by HEFCE relating to the relevant project or funding."

8. Whilst HEFCE funding is available to other universities on a similar basis their constitutions vary widely. The Tribunal recorded the evidence of Mr Lewis on that topic in paragraph 56 in these terms:

> "...universities other than Oxford and Cambridge may be established in a number of ways: those created before 1992 were established by Royal Charter granted through the Privy Council or, in the case of some universities, incorporated under the Companies Act as companies limited by guarantee. In the case of those created since 1992, which changed status from polytechnics under local authority control to universities, they derive their university status and degree-awarding powers under the Further and Higher Education Act 1992. The University of Buckingham is a private university (that is, not funded by the State), and is incorporated as a non-profit-making company with degree-awarding powers granted by the Privy Council."

9. As recorded by the Tribunal in paragraph 58 of its decision Mr Lewis described all English Universities as:

> "...legally independent bodies responsible for the governance, management and direction of their own affairs which are funded from a range of public and private sources. They are not regarded as part of the public sector in the way that, say, a maintained school or NHS hospital is so regarded - thus, for example, their accounts are not classified to the public sector for National Accounts purposes, and they are not subject to direction from the government except to the extent that they receive public > funding and thereby render themselves subject to any conditions attaching to such funding."

The decision of the Tribunal

10. The Tribunal noted in paragraph 4 of its decision that if the University failed on the third proposition, to which I have referred in paragraph 3 above, its appeal would be dismissed but that for its appeal to succeed it must establish all the three propositions on which it relied. The Tribunal dealt with the third proposition first in paragraphs 34 to 46. It noted in paragraph 35 the University's concession that it was in fact carrying on an economic activity or business. It concluded in paragraph 45 that for the reasons expressed in the intervening paragraphs the University had not made out the convincing case required if it was to establish that Article 13 deemed it not to be carrying on a business when in fact it is.

11. The Tribunal recognised that this conclusion necessitated the dismissal of the University's appeal but, in case it was wrong, went on to consider whether the University was within the ambit of Article 13. The Tribunal noted that this required the University to satisfy the two conditions reflected in the first and second of the propositions set out in paragraph 3 above. It considered the first of those propositions in paragraphs 76 to 91. For reasons I will consider in detail later the Tribunal concluded that the University is not "a body governed by public law".

12. The Tribunal noted in paragraph 92 that if it was wrong in its conclusion on the first proposition then in order to succeed the University must show that in carrying out its activities it is acting as a public authority. It considered that issue in paragraphs 106 to 122. It concluded that even if the University is a body governed by public law it does not engage in its activities of providing higher education as a public authority.

13. Accordingly the University failed to establish any of the three propositions on which the success of its appeal depended. I propose to deal with them in the order in which I have set them out. That is the logical order and as the University must succeed on all of them if its appeal is to be allowed I see no reason to depart from it.

Is the University a body governed by public law for the purposes of Article 13?

14. I start with the detailed reasons given by the Tribunal for answering that question in the negative. The Tribunal's starting point was that:

> "....the relevant expression, "States, regional and local government and other bodies governed by public law" must > be understood in its proper context, namely as Community law which must apply fairly, uniformly and sensibly across the range of Community states and the diverse entities and organisations which are to be found in those states and through which those states organise their affairs." [77]

15. The Tribunal then rejected a submission advanced by Counsel for the University to the effect that Community Law looks to the domestic law of the member state concerned to determine the conditions which a body must satisfy. The Tribunal considered that:

> "...even if Article 13 has effect so that a Member State determines whether or not, under its domestic law, there is a special legal regime under which the public law body is operating, it [does not] follow[s] that Article 13 requires the Member State to determine what is a body governed by public law by reference to its domestic law: the two issues are distinct, the one looking to the bodies which are within Article 13, and the other to the way those bodies carry out functions within the domestic law." [79]

16. The Tribunal then recorded a submission of counsel for HMRC to the effect that it was for the member state to identify "a body by its attributes or its conformity to a concept" derived from Community law so as to ensure consistent and uniform application in all member states "in compliance with the principle of fiscal neutrality". It described the case of JP Morgan Fleming Claverhouse Investment Trust plc v HMRC [2007] ECR I-5517 as a recent example of the application of that principle. The Tribunal accepted the submission of counsel for HMRC as

> "...self-evidently correct in applying a Community law provision such as Article 13 of the 2006 VAT Directive, as it ensures a uniformity of treatment within each Member State and across all Member States. It results in all bodies which have the same broad function and attributes (in this case, in the domestic context, English universities) having equal standing and treatment in relation to the application of Article 13..." [81]

17. The Tribunal noted in paragraphs 82 to 84 that such an approach also avoided difficulties arising from the fact that under English law some bodies are governed by public law and susceptible to judicial review in relation to only some of their activities and that in the case of universities only some are incorporated. In paragraph 85 the Tribunal considered what the relevant concept for identifying a body governed by public law is. In that context the Tribunal considered the decisions of the European Court of Justice in The European Commission v The Netherlands [1987] ECR 1471; Ayuntamiento de Sevilla v Recaudadores de Tributos de los Zonas primera y segunda [1991] ECR I-4135; European Commission v UK [2000] ECR I-6355 and CO.GE.P Srl v Ministero delle Finanze-Ufficio IVA di Milano (2007) C-174/06. The Tribunal concluded:

> "We take from these cases the principle that, for Article 13 purposes, an entity, to be a body governed by public law, must be "part of the public administration", in the phrase used in the Netherlands case. It is not sufficient that it is carrying out by delegation a public function which could be, and sometimes is, carried out by the State itself. It is not sufficient that it is entrusted with powers and duties of a public nature in the performance of which it is amenable to judicial review in the English law context..... It is not sufficient that it is highly regulated by the State and operates within a comprehensive statutory regime. If it is a body which is inherently and by its nature not a creature or extension of the State it is not part of the public administration and is not a body governed by public law for these purposes." [86]

The Tribunal agreed with counsel for HMRC that this conclusion is consistent with the language of Article 13 itself, and the Explanatory Memorandum on the Sixth Directive issued by the European Commission.

18. In paragraphs 87 to 91 the Tribunal applied that test and concluded that the University is not part of the public administration and therefore not a body governed by public law for the purposes of Article 13. Its reasons were that the University is a legally independent and autonomous institution; it is self-governing and independent in its management of its affairs. The Tribunal did not consider that the receipt of public funds through HEFCE on conditions designed to ensure the implementation of certain government policies could result in the University being part of the public administration.

19. Counsel for the University contends that the Tribunal was wrong in both its reasoning and its conclusion. He submits that it is illogical to justify the conclusion that a body governed by public law is a concept of European law by reference to the principle of fiscal neutrality when Article 13 is itself a departure, and a deliberate departure, from that principle. He submits that the authorities relied on by the Tribunal, which he subjected to detailed analysis, do not justify its conclusion either. He contends that other authorities on which he relies support his case. I propose to consider first the principle of fiscal neutrality, its application to Article 13 and whether it necessitates a European concept of a body governed by public law.

20. The principle of fiscal neutrality precludes economic operators carrying out the same or similar transactions from being treated differently for the purposes of VAT. It is designed to eliminate the distortion which will arise if supplies of goods or services in competition with each other are treated unequally for the purposes of VAT. It is a principle fundamental to the system of VAT imposed on member states and their nationals throughout the European Union by EU Principal VAT Directive (2006/112/EC) and, formerly, The Sixth VAT Directive. See generally JPMorgan Fleming Claverhouse Investment Trust plc v HMRC [2007] ECR I-5517, 5550 paras 45-47 and HMRC v Isle of Wight Council (2008) C-288/07 para 42.

21. Counsel for the University submits that any exemption from VAT is to that extent a departure from the principle of fiscal neutrality, as recognised by Rimer J in HMRC v Isle of Wight Council [2007] EWHC 219 (Ch) para 15. Further, he submits that, given the terms of Article 13(1) second sub-paragraph, there is no need, by reference to the principle of fiscal neutrality, to interpret the first sub-paragraph by reference to it because the necessary corrective is introduced by the second sub-paragraph. He submits that this effect was recognised by the European Court of Justice in Fiorenzuola d'Arda District Tax Office v Commune di Carpaneto Piacentino [1989] ECR 3323, 3275 paras 15 and 16 and Fazenda Publica v Camara Municipal do Porto [2000] ECR I-11435, 11470 para 16.

22. In my view this issue was authoritatively determined by the European Court of Justice in HMRC v Isle of Wight Council (2008) C-288/07. That case concerned the provision of off-street parking by local authorities. Historically local authorities had charged VAT on parking charges at the standard rate and accounted for it as output tax. Following the decision of the European Court of Justice in Fazenda Publica v Camara Municipal do Porto [2000] ECR I-11435 various local authorities reclaimed VAT so accounted for on the basis that Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive, the predecessor of Article 13, applied so as to exempt the parking charges from VAT. These claims first came before Pumfrey J in 2004, see Customs & Excise v Isle of Wight Council [2005] STC 257, on the question whether the provisions of Article 4(5) second sub-paragraph had been incorporated into English law as well as the first sub-paragraph. He concluded that the second sub-paragraph was of direct effect and the matter was remitted to the VAT and Duties Tribunal.

23. The matter returned to the High Court, Rimer J, in 2007 in relation to the meaning of the phrase in Article 4(5) second sub-paragraph "would lead to significant distortions of competition". For the reasons given in his judgment ([2007] EWHC 219 Ch) Rimer J referred three questions to the European Court of Justice. In his judgment giving his reasons for making that reference Rimer J observed in paragraphs 14 and 15

> "14. As to the correct interpretation of article 4.5, [counsel for HMRC] emphasised that this depends not just on an interpretation of its text but on its consideration against the relevant principles of Community law. He said the most relevant principle is that of fiscal neutrality, one which "precludes, inter alia, economic operators carrying on the same activities from being treated differently as far as the levying of VAT is concerned" (paragraph 20 of the ECJ's judgment in Gregg and another v Commissioners of Customs and Excise [1990] STC 934).

> 15. The importance of that principle in VAT law is not in dispute although it is unclear to me how it can be relevant to the interpretation of article 4.5. The scheme of article 4.5 is that article 4.5(1) confers an exemption from taxability on public bodies in relation to their activities as such; but that article 4.5(2) cancels it in relation to any activity where its conferring would significantly distort competition. It does not, however, cancel it in cases in which an exemption would only distort competition insignificantly, a situation in which those carrying on the same activities are intended to be treated differently as regards the levying of VAT. If fiscal neutrality is the sacred watchword, there would be no scope for the article 4.5(1) exemption in such a case; and the only case in which any exemption might harmonise with the principle would or might be one in which the local authority is performing an activity which is not carried on in competition with others at all."

24. The three questions Rimer J referred were:

> "1. Is the expression 'distortions of competition' to be ascertained on a public body by public body basis such that, in the context of the present case, it should be determined by reference to the area or areas where the particular body in question provides off-street parking or by reference to the totality of the national territory of the Member State?
> 2. What is meant by the expression 'would lead to'? In particular, what degree of probability or level of certainty is required for that condition to be satisfied?
> 3. What is meant by the word 'significant'? In particular, does 'significant' mean an effect on competition that is more than trivial or de minimis, a 'material' effect or an 'exceptional' effect?'"

25. In its judgment in HMRC v Isle of Wight Council (2008) C-288/07 the European Court of Justice explained the interrelationship of the various subparagraphs of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive. In paragraphs 40 to 43 it added:

> "40. It follows that the treatment of bodies governed by public law as taxable persons, either on the basis of the second subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive, or on that of the third subparagraph of that provision, > results from the carrying-on, as such, of a given activity, irrespective of whether or not those bodies face competition at the level of the local market on which they engage in that activity.

> 41. That conclusion is supported by the general principles of Community law applicable to fiscal matters, such as the principles of fiscal neutrality and legal certainty.
> Thus, the principle of fiscal neutrality, a fundamental principle of the common system of VAT (see, particularly, Case
> C-255/02 Halifax and Others [2006] ECR I-1609, paragraph 92), precludes economic operators carrying on the same activities from being treated differently as far as the levying of VAT is concerned (see, particularly, Case C-216/97 Gregg [1999] ECR I-4947, paragraph 20).
> 42. In that regard, it must be recalled that the second subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive is intended to ensure compliance with the principle of fiscal neutrality (Case C-430/04 Feuerbestattungsverein Halle [2006] ECR I-4999, paragraph 24).
> 43. Whilst it is true that the Sixth Directive provides for certain derogations which may interfere to some extent with the application of the principle of fiscal neutrality, like the derogation under the second subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive (see, to that effect, Case C-378/02 Waterschap Zeeuws Vlaanderen [2005] ECR I-4685, paragraph 43), since that provision permits the treatment of bodies governed by public law as non-taxable persons provided that such treatment would only distort competition insignificantly, the fact remains that that derogation must be interpreted in such a way that the least possible damage is done to that principle."

26. Counsel for the University submits that these observations only go to the second and third sub-paragraphs of Article 13.1 and not the first. The response of counsel for HMRC is to point to a later passage in the judgment of the court in which it deals with observations made by some member states in relation to the second question referred to it by Rimer J. In that context the European Court of Justice added in paragraphs 60 and 61:

> "60. It is important to record, as is clear from paragraph 30 of the present judgment, that the treatment of bodies governed by public law as non-taxable persons under the first subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive > constitutes a derogation from the general rule that any activity of an economic nature be subjected to VAT, and that this provision must, therefore, be interpreted strictly. But the second subparagraph of Article 4(5) restores that general rule in order to avoid such treatment of those bodies leading to significant distortions of competition. The latter provision cannot therefore be construed narrowly.

> 61. The scope of the first subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive would be enlarged unduly if the treatment, under the second subparagraph of Article 4(5), of those bodies as taxable persons had to be confined to cases of distortion of actual competition, which would, were they confronted only with potential competition, permit their treatment as non-taxable persons."

27. In my view it is not possible, when reading the judgment of the court as a whole, to conclude that the principle of fiscal neutrality does not apply to all the subparagraphs of Article 13.1. If the second sub-paragraph is to be narrowly construed, as the court considered in paragraph 43, so as to minimise the effect of the derogation then so must the first because that is the primary derogation. That, albeit in a different context, is what the court said in paragraph 60. It follows that, in my judgment, the Tribunal was right when, in paragraph 16, it tested the submissions of counsel for the University by reference to the principle of fiscal neutrality.

28. I turn now to the second limb of the attack on the decision of the Tribunal mounted by counsel for the University, namely that the cases relied on by the Tribunal did not justify their conclusion that the concept of 'a body governed by public law' is one of Community law. They are those to which I have referred in paragraph 17 above. I will consider them in chronological order. The first is The European Commission v The Netherlands [1987] ECR 1471. That case concerned the supply of services in the Netherlands by notaries and bailiffs. The European Commission considered that notaries and bailiffs carried on an economic activity in the Netherlands and that the Kingdom of the Netherlands had infringed the Sixth Directive in failing to levy VAT on such activities. In a direct action the Commission sought a declaration as to the alleged default of that member state. The Kingdom of the Netherlands defended the action on two bases, first that in view of the statutory organisation of the profession of notary and bailiff their activities were not economic; second, that Article 4(5) Sixth Directive applied to their official acts.

29. The Court concluded that the activities of the notaries and bailiffs were independent of the state and economic in nature. In relation to the second point the court stated:

> "20.....it should be observed that article 4(5) provides an exemption only for bodies governed by public law, and > even then only for the activities or transactions in which they engage as public authorities.

> 21. It is clear from that provision, when examined in the light of the aims of the directive, that two conditions must be fulfilled in order for the exemption to apply; the activities must be carried out by a body governed by public law and they must be carried out by that body acting as a public authority. This means that bodies governed by public law are not automatically exempted in respect of all the activities in which they engage but only in respect of those which form part of their specific duties as public authorities.... and, secondly, that an activity carried on by a private individual is not exempted from VAT merely because it consists in carrying out acts falling within the prerogatives of the public authority.
> 22. Consequently, even assuming that in performing their official services notaries and bailiffs exercise the powers of a public authority by virtue of their appointment to public office, it does not follow that they may enjoy the exemption provided for in article 4(5). The reason is that they pursue those activities, not in the form of a body governed by public law, since they are not part of the public administration, but in the form of an independent economic activity carried out in the exercise of a liberal profession."

30. Counsel for the University submits that the last sentence of paragraph 22 is a mere reprise of the court's conclusion on the first issue. Counsel for HMRC contends that it is an explicit recognition of its submission that the concept of 'a body governed by public law' is one to be determined in accordance with Community law and not by reference to the domestic law of member states. Further, he submits, it is indicative of the content of that concept, namely that a body governed by public law is one which forms "part of the public administration". Before expressing my conclusion on those submissions I should refer to the other cases on which the Tribunal relied.

31. The second was Ayuntamiento de Sevilla v Recaudadores de Tributos de los Zonas primera y segunda [1991] ECR I-4135. That case concerned the addition of VAT to the premiums (being a proportion of the tax collected) paid to tax collectors appointed by local authorities in Spain. Such tax collectors were regulated by statute. The local authority refused to pay the VAT added to the premiums on the ground amongst others that Article 4(5) applied to exempt the activities of the tax collectors. The court in Spain referred to the European Court of Justice the question whether the activity of the tax collector must be considered to be non-taxable because it comprised activities or transactions in which those concerned engaged as public authorities in accordance with Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive. The conclusion of the Court is tersely given in paragraphs 17 to 20 of its judgment in these terms:

> "17. The second question concerns the interpretation of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive, the first subparagraph of which provides as follows:
> "States, regional and local government authorities and other bodies governed by public law shall not be considered taxable persons in respect of the activities or transactions in which they engage as public authorities, even where they collect dues, fees, contributions or payments in connection with these activities or transactions."
> 18. As the Court has held on numerous occasions, it is clear from that provision, when examined in the light of the aims of the directive, that two conditions must be fulfilled in order for the exemption to apply: the activities must be carried out by a body governed by public law and they must be carried out by that body acting as a public authority (judgments in Case 107/84 Commission v Germany [1985] ECR 2655, paragraph 11; Case 235/85 Commission v Netherlands, cited above, paragraph 21; Joined Cases 231/87 and 129/88 Comune de Carpaneto Piacentino and Others [1989] ECR 3233, paragraph 12).
> 19. With regard to the first of those two conditions, the Court has already held in its judgment in Commission v Netherlands (at paragraph 21) that an activity carried on by a private individual is not excluded from the scope of VAT merely because it consists in the performance of acts falling within the prerogatives of the public authority.
> 20 It follows that, if a commune entrusts the activity of collecting taxes to an independent third party, the exclusion from VAT provided for by the abovementioned provision is not applicable."

32. Counsel for the University points out that the court did not in that case refer to the need for the activity in question to form part of the public administration. In contrast counsel for HMRC points out that the final sentence in paragraph 19 points to a concept which is at least similar.

33. The third case on which the Tribunal relied is European Commission v UK [2000] ECR I-6355. That case was concerned with whether VAT should be levied on tolls charged for the use of roads and bridges in the UK. They fell into three categories. The first category included bridges owned and operated by central government, the second related to bridges and tunnels owned and operated by local passenger authorities and the third comprised what are known as PFIs, namely Private Finance Initiatives. These are concessionaires of central government which operated certain crossings and bridges. The UK did not levy VAT on the toll charges. By this direct action the Commission sought to compel the UK to do so. The UK relied on Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive as a defence to the claim.

34. The defence failed. The Court considered that the various operators were carrying out an economic activity (paragraph 42). The fact that the facilities provided were in the public interest was irrelevant (paragraph 43). There being a direct link between the services provided and the consideration paid for them entailed a relevant supply of services (paragraph 46). The Court then considered the defence under Article 4(5). The court noted that there were two conditions for the application of that Article. In relation to the first it said:

> "54. However, as also noted in paragraph 49 of this judgment, the non-taxable status provided for in Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive requires that the activities be carried out not only as a public authority but also by a body governed by public law.
> 55. In that regard the Court has held that an activity carried on by a private individual is not excluded from the scope of VAT merely because it consists in the performance of acts falling within the prerogatives of the public authority (Case 235/85 Commission v Netherlands, cited above, paragraph 21, and Ayuntamiento de Sevilla, cited above, paragraph 19). The Court held, in paragraph 20 of the latter judgment, that it follows that if a commune entrusts the activity of collecting taxes to an independent third party the exclusion from VAT provided for by Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive is not applicable. Similarly, the Court held in paragraph 22 of the judgment in Case 235/85 Commission v Netherlands, cited above, that even assuming that in performing their official services notaries and bailiffs in the Netherlands exercise the powers of a public authority by virtue of their appointment to public office, they cannot enjoy the exemption provided for in Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive because they pursue those activities, not in the form of a body governed by public law, since they are not part of the public administration, but in the form of an independent economic activity carried out in the exercise of a liberal profession.
> 56. In the present case it is common ground that, in the United Kingdom, the activity of providing access to roads on payment of a toll is carried out in certain cases not by a body governed by public law but by traders governed by private law. In such cases the exemption provided for by Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive is not applicable."

This conclusion related to tolls levied by operators in the third category of PFI.

35. Counsel for the University submits that this case shows that the PFI operators were not public bodies under the domestic law of the UK but does not enunciate any proposition of Community law. But, as counsel for HMRC points out by reference to paragraphs 40 to 44, the PFI concessionaires were not operating under the aegis of private domestic law but were bound by the same statutes as the public bodies.

36. The last case relied on by the Tribunal under this heading is CO.GE.P Srl v Ministero delle Finanze-Ufficio IVA di Milano (2007) C-174/06. In that case the Consortium of the Port of Genoa let areas of state-owned maritime property for the storage, manufacture and handling of mineral oils. The issue was whether VAT was payable on the consideration for those lettings. The basis on which the court approached that question is clearly set out in paragraphs 24 and 25 of the Court's decision in these terms:

> "24. It should be noted at the outset that it is apparent from the order for reference that the Consortium is a public economic entity which, as regards the management of the State property entrusted to it, acts not in the name of and on behalf of the State, which remains the owner of that property, but on its own account, in so far as it administers that property, inter alia by making independent decisions.
> 25. Thus, so far as the Consortium is concerned, the cumulative conditions required to apply the rule of treatment as a non-taxable person under the first subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive, namely, that the activities must be carried out by a body governed by public law and they must be carried out by that body acting as a public authority, are not fulfilled (see, to that effect, Case C-446/98*Fazenda Pública* [2000] ECR I-11435, paragraph 15)."

37. Counsel for the University suggests that no conclusions can be drawn from this judgment. What, he asks, is meant by the apparently new concept of a 'public economic entity'. He submits that the form of reference dictated the result, not a decision of the Court. By contrast Counsel for HMRC contends that paragraph 24 shows clearly that the relevant concept is one of Community, not domestic, law.

38. I can express my conclusions on this part of the appeal quite shortly. In each of the four cases the European Court of Justice went out of its way to consider the content of the concept of a body governed by public law and some of the attributes such a body must possess. If that content and those attributes were matters for the domestic law of each member state then the European Court of Justice was exceeding its jurisdiction in considering them. Thus paragraph 21 of The European Commission v The Netherlands [1987] ECR 1471, paragraph 19 of Ayuntamiento de Sevilla v Recaudadores de Tributos de los Zonas primera y segunda [1991] ECR I-4135, paragraph 55 of European Commission v UK [2000] ECR I-6355, paragraph 24 of CO.GE.P Srl v Ministero delle Finanze-

Ufficio IVA di Milano (2007) C-174/06 and paragraph 60 of HMRC v Isle of Wight Council (2008) C-288/07 could not have been properly included in the judgment of the European Court of Justice if the issue of what is a body governed by public law is to be determined in accordance with the domestic law of each member state.

39. Counsel for the University also criticised the conclusion of the Tribunal in paragraph 86 of its decision that its construction of the relevant phrase was consistent with the Explanatory Memorandum on the Sixth Directive issued by the European Commission. Counsel contends that the Memorandum is of no assistance on the issue of whether a body governed by public law is a concept of Community law and if so what its content is. Further, he submits that in so far as it deals with the second condition imposed by Article 13.1 it was not achieved. There is substance in both those observations but the terms of the Explanatory Memorandum, whatever they are, cannot nullify the effect of decisions of the European Court. Further, as the Tribunal noted, there is nothing in the Explanatory Memorandum inconsistent with its conclusion.

40. I should now refer to various cases which Counsel for the University submitted supported his proposition that it was a matter for the domestic law of each member state to determine the conditions to be possessed by 'a body governed by public law'. They are Fiorenzuola d'Arda District Tax Office v Commune di Carpaneto Piacentino [1989] ECR 3323; Commune di Carpaneto Piacentino v Piacenza District Tax Office [1990] ECR I-1869; Waterschap Zeeuws Vlaanderen v Staatssecretaris van Financien [2005] ECR I-4685 and T-Mobile Austria GmbH v Republic of Austria [2008] STC 184. Each of them was primarily concerned with the second condition imposed by Article 13.1 namely that the body should have engaged in the relevant activities "as public authorities".

41. In Fiorenzuola d'Arda District Tax Office v Commune di Carpaneto Piacentino [1989] ECR 3323 the European Court of Justice was concerned with transactions entered into by local authorities in relation to graves, vaults, cemeteries and other facilities. The questions referred related to the application of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive in the absence of any implementing domestic legislation. In paragraphs 15 and 16 the Court said:

> "15. An analysis of the first subparagraph of Article 4(5) in the light of the scheme of the directive shows that it is the way in which the activities are carried out that determines the scope of the treatment of public bodies as non-taxable persons. In so far as that provision makes such treatment of bodies governed by public law conditional upon their acting "as public authorities", it excludes therefrom activities engaged in by them not as bodies governed by public law but as persons subject to private law. Consequently, the only criterion making it possible to distinguish with certainty between those two categories of activity is the legal regime applicable under national law.

> 16. It follows that the bodies governed by public law referred to in the first subparagraph of Article 4(5) of the Sixth Directive engage in activities "as public authorities" within the meaning of that provision when they do so under the special legal regime applicable to them. On the other hand, when they act under the same legal conditions as those that apply to private traders, they cannot be regarded as acting "as public authorities". It is for the national court to classify the activity at issue in the light of that criterion."

This passage was repeated more or less verbatim in the second of these cases, namely, Commune di Carpaneto Piacentino v Piacenza District Tax Office [1990] ECR I-1869. Counsel for the University fastens on the last sentence of paragraph 16 in the first case and submits that it must also be for the national court to classify 'a body governed by public law'. I do not accept that submission. The application of Article 4(5) depended on satisfaction of both conditions. The court's reference to the national court related only to the second. I can understand and accept that in the case of a body governed by public law which satisfies the criteria for such a body laid down by Community law then the test in relation to the second condition to be applied by the national court will involve ascertaining whether or not the activities in question were undertaken under the special legal regime applicable to that body under its national law. But the converse is not the case. The fact that under the national law a particular body carries on its operations under a legal regime special to itself, which might be described in that member state as public, does not, of itself, constitute that body a body governed by public law for the purposes of Article 13.1.

42. Waterschap Zeeuws Vlaanderen v Staatssecretaris van Financien [2005] ECR I-4685 concerned the construction of sewage works by Waterschap, which under its national legislation was governed by public law. It sought to recover the VAT paid in respect of capital items used in its construction so far as they had been used for the activities in which it engaged as a public authority. Counsel for the University points out that Advocate-General Jacobs in paragraph 11 of his opinion appears to have accepted that Waterschap was a body governed by public law because that is what it was under the relevant national legislation. But there was no issue in that case whether the body was one governed by public law in the Community sense.

43. In T-Mobile Austria GmbH v Republic of Austria [2008] STC 184 the control commission, TCK, was responsible to authorising the use of frequencies for mobile telecommunications in return for a fee. T-Mobile had paid such fees and sought the issue of VAT invoices so that it might deduct the amount of VAT as input tax. TCK refused to do so. The European Court of Justice concluded that Article 4(5) did not enter into the argument as the activities of TCK were not economic activities at all. But the Advocate-General in paragraphs 105 to 107 of her opinion said:

> "105. Under the first subparagraph of art 4(5) of the Sixth Directive two conditions must be fulfilled in order for there > to be no liability to tax: the activities must be carried out by a body governed by public law and they must be carried out by that body acting as a public authority.

> 106. The court has ruled with regard to the first condition that an activity carried on by a private individual is not exempted from VAT merely because it consists in carrying out acts falling within the prerogatives of the public authority. There, however, the court was particularly concerned with persons pursuing an independent economic activity who were not part of the public administration.
> 107. The Telekom-Control-Kommission is located at Telekom-Control GmbH. Although its form is that of a company governed by private law none of the parties involved in this case have expressed any doubt as to whether the Telekom-Control-Kommission should be considered part of the public administration. It is for the national court to examine whether this categorisation is correct under national law."

44. Counsel for the University relies on the last sentence in paragraph 107 as support for his proposition that it is for the national court to determine what criteria are required by 'a body governed by public law". I do not agree. In the final sentence of paragraph 106 the Advocate-General recognised, in terms, the Community law concept requiring the body to be part of the public administration. In the second sentence of paragraph 107 she recorded that it was common ground that TCK should be considered to be part of the public administration. The third sentence points out, as is uncontroversial, that it is for the national court to determine in any given case whether the Community concept is satisfied.

45. For all these reasons I do not accept that any of the cases relied on by the University is support for the proposition that it is for the national courts to determine what are the content and attributes of a body governed by public law as opposed to the different question whether any particular body has the attributes required of such a body by Community law.

46. Finally I should refer to the principles by which, in the submission of counsel for the University, a body governed by public law is to be ascertained in accordance with the law of the UK. He submits that the University is such a body because it is a creature of statute, its powers or duties are derived from legislation primary or secondary. These features distinguish it from private traders. Accordingly it is by its very nature a public body governed by public law. He suggests that this approach mirrors the principles to be applied to determine whether any particular body is amenable to judicial review. Alternatively he draws an analogy with the tests for determining whether any particular body is a public authority for the purposes of the Human Rights Act 1998.

47. In my view it is this submission which demonstrates most clearly that the proposition in support of which it is advanced cannot be right. Not all universities are incorporated or governed by statute. Not all universities are amenable to judicial review. R v University of Nottingham, ex parte K [1998] ELR 184. Even those which are, such as the University, are not amenable to judicial review in respect of all their activities, compare R v Cambridge University, ex parte Persaud [2001] EWCA Civ. 534 and Evans v University of Cambridge [2002] EWHC 1382. Further, it is well recognised that concepts of EU law do not provide a reliable guide to the application of the Human Rights Act 1998 or vice versa, see R v Quadrant Housing Trust, ex parte Weaver [2008] EWHC Admin 1377, para 47. The recognition of any such proposition as counsel for the University advances would introduce anomalies and uncertainties into this field which no legislature could possibly have intended.

48. I would reject the first proposition on which the University relies. Article 13.1 is part of a directive having direct effect in all member states, see Fiorenzuola d'Arda District Tax Office v Commune di Carpaneto Piacentino [1989] ECR 3323. It would be inconsistent for such a directive to have as one of its central concepts a term the meaning of which is to be determined by the national law of member states. It would also be wholly at variance with the principle of fiscal neutrality for the ambit of an exemption to depend on the manner in which each national court interprets that concept. The decisions of the European Court of Justice on which the Tribunal relied contradict the proposition for which counsel for the University contends and the decisions on which he relied to do not support it. They establish that "a body governed by public law" must, as a matter of Community law, be identified as part of the public administration of the relevant member state. Whether or not any particular institution can be so identified is a matter for the national court. The Tribunal considered that the University could not be so identified. In my judgment they were right for the reasons they gave.

Does the University engage in its activities or transactions "as [a] public authorit[y]"?

49. This is the second proposition on which counsel for the University relied. Given my conclusion on the first, the answer must be in the negative.

Does the proper application of Article 13 require that the activities and transactions of the University do not constitute the carrying on an economic activity?

50. In the light of my conclusions on the first and second propositions this issue does not arise. But having heard full argument on it from counsel for the University it may be helpful if I indicate shortly my conclusion.

51. Counsel for the University submits that the effect of Article 13 in cases to which it applies is to remove the activity in question from the ambit of VAT altogether. He relies on what he describes as the scheme of the Directive, the observations of the Advocates-General in Waterschap Zeeuws Vlaanderen v Staatssecretaris van Financien [2005] ECR I-4685, 4694 para 41 and T-Mobile Austria GmbH

v Republic of Austria [2008] STC 184, 199 para 78 and various anonomalies he suggests would otherwise arise.

52. The object of this argument is to persuade the court to go beyond the consequence of the application of Article 13 for which it provides. The Article states in terms that in cases to which it applies the 'body governed by public law' 'shall not be regarded as [a] taxable person in respect of the activities or transactions in which [it] engage[s] as [a] public authorit[y]'. A taxable person is defined in Article 9.1 of EU Principal VAT Directive (2006/112/EC) as:

> "...any person who, independently, carries out in any place any economic activity, whatever the purpose or results of that activity."

Had it been intended that the effect of Article 13 should be, as counsel for the University contends, then it would have been a simple matter for the Directive so to have provided.

53. I agree with the Tribunal's view expressed in paragraph 45 that it requires a convincing case to establish that in promulgating Article 13 the Council of the European Union intended that the activities of the public body should be treated as not economic rather than that the public body should not be regarded as a taxable person. I do not consider that all or any of the arguments advanced by counsel for the University are sufficient.

Conclusion

54. For all these reasons I consider that the Tribunal was right in point of law to have concluded that the University is not a body governed by public law. Consequently Article 13 cannot have the effect of deeming the activities of the University for which the electricity is to be supplied to be undertaken otherwise than in the course of furtherance of a business. It follows that the lower rate of VAT for which s.29A of and Note 3 of Group 1 to Schedule 7A to the VAT Act 1994 provides is not applicable to the supplies of electricity to the Faculty of Education.

55. I dismiss this appeal.

R. (ON THE APPLICATION OF WEAVER) v LONDON & QUADRANT HOUSING TRUST

COURT OF APPEAL (CIVIL DIVISION)

Rix L.J., Lord Collins of Mapesbury and Elias L.J.: June 18, 2009

[2009] EWCA Civ 587; [2009] H.L.R. 40

Housing management; Housing trusts; Human rights; Public authorities; Public functions; Social housing; Social landlords; Tenancies; Termination

Introduction

Registered social landlords

H1 Part 1 of the Housing Act 1996 (Encyclopedia, para.1-3218) governs the registration of social landlords in England, initially by the Housing Corporation, the powers of which passed to the Tenant Services Authority (TSA), established under the Housing and Regeneration Act 2008. The provisions replaced those of Pt 1 of the Housing Associations Act 1984, in which similar bodies were referred to as registered housing associations.

H2 To be eligible for registration, a landlord either has to be a registered charity which is a housing association or, subject to conditions, an industrial and provident society or a company: s.2(1).

H3 Registered social landlords are eligible for social housing grants to assist them in performing their housing activities: s.18.

H4 The TSA has a number of regulatory powers in relation to registered social landlords. In particular, it has power to issue guidance to registered social landlords on various matters, including terms of tenancies and the principles on which levels of rent should be determined: s.36.

H5 If requested, registered social landlords must co-operate with local housing authorities in offering accommodation to persons under an authority's allocation scheme: s.170 of the 1996 Act.

Human Rights Act 1998

H6 By s.6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998, it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. By s.6(3) and (5):

> "(3) In this section, 'public authority' includes–
> (a) a court or tribunal, and
> (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature,

[2009] H.L.R., Part 6 © 2009 THOMSON REUTERS (LEGAL) LIMITED

(5) In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private."

H7 In Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] UKHL 37; [2004] 1 A.C. 546, the House of Lords considered the meaning of s.6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act. Lord Nicholls said, at [12]:

> "What then is the touchstone to be used in deciding whether a function is public for this purpose? Clearly, there is no single test of universal application. There cannot be, given the diverse nature of governmental functions and the variety of means by which these functions are discharged today. Factors to be taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service."

H8 In YL v Birmingham City Council [2007] UKHL 27; [2008] 1 A.C. 95; [2007] H.L.R. 44, the defendant authority arranged for the claimant to be accommodated in a nursing home, which was owned and run by a private company. The company decided to terminate the claimant's placement at the home. The House of Lords held that the company was not acting as a public authority for the purposes of s.6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act, in providing residential accommodation under arrangements with a local authority. (The effect of this decision was reversed by statute: see s.145 of the Health and Social Care Act 2008.)

H9 In Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595; [2002] Q.B. 48; [2001] 33 H.L.R. 73, the Court of Appeal held that a registered social landlord which had acquired a substantial part of a local authority's housing stock was acting as a public authority within s.6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act in providing rented accommodation to the defendant and in seeking possession against her. The court identified a number of significant factors, including, at [65], the closeness of the relationship between the authority and the landlord, including that the landlord had been created by the authority to take a transfer of part of the authority's housing stock and that five of the landlord's board members were also members of the authority.

H10 In YL, however, it was said that the Court of Appeal in Donoghue had placed too much emphasis on the close historical links between the landlord and the authority in deciding that it was exercising a function of a public nature (per Baroness Hale at [61]; see also Lord Mance at [105]). The court should have concentrated on the nature of the function of providing social housing.

Assured tenancies

H11 Part 1 of the Housing Act 1988 (Encylcopedia, para.1-2363 et seq.) makes provision for assured tenancies.

H12 In order to obtain possession of premises let under an assured tenancy, a landlord must first serve notice of proceedings for possession, informing the tenant that he intends to seek possession of the property and identifying the grounds on which he intends to rely (providing the tenant with particulars): s.8 of the 1988 Act.

H13 By s.7(1), a court may not make an order for possession against an assured tenant except on one of the grounds set out in Sch.2 Pt 1 of which contains mandatory grounds (grounds 1–8); Pt 2 contains discretionary grounds (grounds 9–17).

H14 There are three grounds which are concerned with rent arrears. Two of these—grounds 10 (rent lawfully due from the tenant) and 11 (persistent delay in paying rent)—are discretionary. Ground 8, however, affords a mandatory ground where, both at the date of service of the notice of proceedings for possession and at the date of the hearing, a specified minimum amount of rent is unpaid. In the case of a tenancy under which the rent is payable weekly or fortnightly, that amount is at least eight weeks rent.

H15 The Housing Corporation Regulatory Circular 07/04 (issued under s.36 of the Housing Act 1996, subsequently replaced by Circular 02/07 in similar terms), provided:

> "Before using ground 8, associations should first pursue all other reasonable alternatives to recover the debt."

Judicial Review

H16 In Peabody Housing Association Ltd v Green (1979) 38 P. & C.R. 644, it was held that a registered housing association, and in R. v Servite Houses Ex p. Goldsmith (2001) 33 H.L.R. 35 QBD, that a registered social landlord, was not a body susceptible to judicial review in domestic law. That proposition was accepted in Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue, above (at [63]–[64]). Servite Houses was cited with approval in YL (at [120]).

Legitimate expectation

H17 Where an authority publish a policy or give an undertaking as to how they will decide a particular matter, the policy or undertaking may give rise to a legitimate expectation that a decision will be reached in that way. See, e.g. R. (on the application of Bibi) v Newham LBC (No.1) [2001] EWCA Civ 607; (2001) 33 H.L.R. 84; R. v Newham LBC Ex p. Miah (Suitable Accommodation) (1998) 30 H.L.R. 691 QBD; R. v Lambeth LBC Ex p. Trabi (1998) 30 H.L.R. 975 QBD; R. (on the application of Giles) v Fareham BC [2002] EWHC 2951; [2003] H.L.R. 36; and, R. (on the application of Bath) v North Somerset Council [2008] EWHC 630 (Admin); [2009] H.L.R. 1.

H18 In R. v North and East Devon HA Ex p. Coughlan [2001] Q.B. 213, the Court of Appeal held that, if a public body exercising a statutory function has made a promise as to how it would behave in the future, which promise has induced a legitimate expectation of a benefit which was substantive rather than merely procedural, to frustrate that expectation could be so unfair that it would amount to an abuse of power. In such circumstances, the court has to determine whether there is a sufficient overriding interest to justify a departure from what had previously been promised.

Facts

H19 The defendant housing association was an industrial and provident society and a charity, registered by the Housing Corporation as a registered social landlord. The association was the parent body of a group of bodies, some of which were also charities and/or registered social landlords. The association's activities included arranging and managing lettings, acquisition of land, building homes for sale, managing leasehold properties and managing accommodation let at a market rent.

H20 Most of the association's housing stock had been purchased on the open market, although about 10 per cent of it had been acquired by transfer from a local authority.

H21 In the financial years 2004–2006, the association's group of companies received £268,700,000 by way of grants from the Housing Corporation. This sum reflected less than half of the group's capital finance.

H22 The association had agreements with a number of local authorities under which those authorities were able to nominate tenants for the association's properties. In the financial year ending March 2006, 64 per cent of new tenancies granted by the association resulted from such nominations.

H23 The claimant was the assured tenant of a property owned by the association. It was a term of her tenancy agreement that:

> "In providing a housing service [the association] will comply with the regulatory framework and guidance issued by the Housing Corporation."

H24 The claimant fell into arrears of rent. The association decided to seek possession and served notice of proceedings relying on the Housing Act 1988 Sch.2 ground 8. The claimant sought judicial review of the association's decision, contending that she had a legitimate expectation that the association would not use ground 8 because the association had agreed to comply with guidance issued by the Housing Corporation and that the Corporation's Circular 07/04 provided, inter alia, that:

> "Before using ground 8, associations should first pursue all other reasonable alternatives to recover the debt."

H25 In the Divisional Court, the claimant argued that the association was a public authority within Human Rights Act 1998 s.6(3)(b), because in managing social housing it was performing a public function. It was contended that this rendered the association susceptible to challenge both on human rights grounds and on domestic public law grounds. The association responded that management of its own housing stock was not a public function and that, in any event, termination of a tenancy was not a public function but a private act governed by the terms of the tenancy agreement, which therefore fell within s.6(5) of the 1998 Act. It also argued that—even if a public authority for the purposes of the 1998 Act—it was not susceptible to domestic public law grounds.

H25 The claim for judicial review was dismissed: [2008] EWHC 1377 (Admin). It was held that the claimant had no legitimate expectation that the association would not use ground 8 and that, even if she had such an expectation, the association had not breached it. The court did, however, grant a declaration that in managing its accommodation, the association was exercising a public function and that the act of terminating a tenancy was part of that public function; the association's decision to terminate the tenancy had accordingly been susceptible to judicial review both on human rights and domestic public law grounds.

H27 The association appealed to the Court of Appeal, conceding that if a public authority for the purposes of the 1998 Act, the association would also be susceptible to domestic public law.

Held (dismissing the appeal, Rix L.J. dissenting):

H28 (1) (per Elias L.J. and Lord Collins) When considered cumulatively, the following factors were sufficient to establish that in providing social housing the defendant housing association was exercising a public function for the purposes of s.6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998 [72], [101]:

(i) the Housing Corporation provided the association with substantial public subsidy which enabled the association to achieve its objectives [68], [101];

(ii) the association's freedom to allocate its properties was severely circumscribed by nomination agreements made with local housing authorities under its duty to co-operate under s.170 of the Housing Act 1996; this factor was reinforced by the fact that the association had taken a transfer of local authority housing stock [69], [101];

(iii) the provision of subsidised housing, as opposed to the provision of housing per se, is a governmental function and not a commercial activity; as one of the larger registered social landlords, the association made a valuable contribution to achieving the government's objective of providing subsidised housing [70];

(iv) the association was acting in the public interest and had charitable objectives [71]; and,

(v) the Housing Corporation's regulation of the association was not designed simply to render its activities more transparent nor to ensure proper standards of performance in the public interest; rather, regulation of matters such as levels of rent and eviction were designed to ensure that government objectives with respect to a vulnerable group in society were achieved and that low cost housing was effectively provided to those in need of it [71], [101].

H29 (2) (per Elias L.J. and Lord Collins) As provision of social housing by the association was a public function, it followed that acts which were necessarily involved in the regulation of that function must also be public acts; the grant of a tenancy and its subsequent termination are part and parcel of determining who should be allowed to take advantage of a public benefit; accordingly, termination of the claimant's tenancy was not a private act for the purposes of s.6(5) of the 1998 Act [76], [102].

H30 (3) (per Elias L.J.) The protection afforded by the 1998 Act will apply to all of those tenants of the association who are in social housing and not just those whose homes were acquired as a result of grant assistance; the 1998 Act will not apply, however, to those tenants who do not occupy social housing and who are paying a market rent [80].

H31 (4) (per Elias L.J.) Not every registered social landlord will necessarily be in the same position as the defendant association; determination of the public status of a body is fact sensitive [84].

H32 (5) (per Rix L.J., dissenting) The association's decision to terminate the claimant's tenancy was not the exercise of a function of a public nature but was a private act arising out of the contract between the parties which fell within s.6(5) of the 1998 Act [147].

H33 Richard Drabble Q.C. and Matthew Hutchings (instructed by Brian McKenna & Co) for the claimant.
Andrew Arden Q.C. and Christopher Baker (instructed by the Devonshires for Disability Rights Commission) for the defendant.
Jan Luba Q.C. (instructed by Louise Curtis, Solicitor, Equality and Human Rights Commission) for the intervener.

JUDGMENT

1 ELIAS L.J.: The appellant in this case, the London and Quadrant Housing Trust (the Trust), provides social housing, which means housing at less than the market rate, to those in need. The Trust is a registered social landlord (RSL), being registered under the Housing Act 1996. The principal question in issue is whether, when terminating the tenancy of someone in social housing, the Trust is subject to human rights principles. The Divisional Court (Richards L.J. and Swift J.) held that it was. The Trust appeals that ruling and contends that it was not.

2 The case comes before the court in somewhat unusual and not altogether satisfactory circumstances. The respondent Mrs Susan Weaver, who was the claimant before the Divisional Court, is an assured tenant of the Trust. She was served with an Order for Possession for rent arrears. She wished to challenge that Order on the basis that the Trust had acted in breach of a legitimate expectation arising out of guidance issued by the Housing Corporation. She also contended that to evict her from her home would interfere with her rights under art.8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. However, that argument was advanced in a way which also depended upon her being able to establish the legitimate expectation.

3 Even if a legitimate expectation could be established on the facts, the argument could successfully be advanced only if the Trust, in the exercise of its eviction powers, was a public body attracting the operation of judicial review principles.

The art.8 argument depended upon establishing that the Trust was a public authority within the meaning of s.6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998 and that the act of termination was not a private act within the meaning of s.6(5). The Trust contended that no legitimate expectation was created, and that in any event it was exercising purely private functions when it dealt with issues relating to the allocation and management of housing, and that all its acts in performance of those functions, including the termination of the tenancy, were private acts. Accordingly, it was subject to neither human rights nor judicial review principles.

4 The Divisional Court found that there had been no legitimate expectation created and therefore the case failed on the facts on both grounds. Strictly it was unnecessary for the court to determine the wider question raising the public law status of the Trust. However, the court did so. It held, contrary to the submissions of the Trust, that the Trust was a public authority under s.6(3)(b) arising from the exercise of its function of allocating and managing its housing, and that the act of terminating the tenancy was not a private act under s.6(5). The court also held that it was susceptible to judicial review principles in the exercise of that function.

5 Notwithstanding that they had succeeded in defending the particular application, the Trust wished to appeal that finding in relation to its status in public law. The Divisional Court granted permission to appeal and facilitated this by making a formal declaration, which could be the subject of challenge, in the following terms,

> "(a) that the management and allocation of housing stock by the defendant (including decisions concerning the termination of a tenancy) is a function of a public nature, with the effect that the defendant is to be regarded as a public authority in that respect for the purposes of the Human Rights Act 1998, section 6(3)(b);
> (b) that the defendant is accordingly amenable to judicial review on conventional public law grounds in respect of its performance of the above function".

6 I make two observations about the way the appeal has come before us. The first is that as Lord Collins of Mapesbury and Rix L.J. note, the applicant no longer has any interest in the appeal, and as a consequence the issue has come before the court in a somewhat abstract and academic form. We have, however, had the benefit of argument from the Mr Drabble Q.C. on behalf of the applicant (who has the benefit of a protected costs order) as well as some very helpful written submissions from Mr Luba Q.C. on behalf of the intervener, the Equality and Human Rights Commission. The second observation relates to the form of the declaration. It focuses on whether the Trust is a public body falling within s.6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act by virtue of its housing and allocation management functions. This reflects the way in which the issue was argued before the Divisional Court. It does not, however, satisfactorily encapsulate the real issue in the case which is whether the termination of this tenancy was a private act within s.6(5). I return to this point later in the judgment.

Social housing and registered social landlords

7 In order to understand the background of this case I shall first consider the role of RSLs in the provision of social housing, and then consider the particular features of the Trust.

8 Social housing providers seek to provide affordable housing to those who cannot secure their housing needs in the market. It is government policy to provide such housing. Those on lower incomes are able to rent properties at below market value. RSLs provide about one half of the social housing in England and Wales.

9 RSLs were at all material times regulated in various ways by the Housing Corporation. This is an executive non-departmental public body responsible to the Secretary of State. It can determine standards of performance with respect to the provision of housing by RSLs; collect information as to the levels of performance achieved by them; and lay down guidance with respect, inter alia, to the management of housing accommodation. Although there is no specific obligation to follow the guidance, one of the functions of the Housing Corporation is to ensure that an RSL is properly managed, and in that context it may have regard to the extent to which guidance is followed.

10 Housing management guidance is the subject of consultation and approval by the Secretary of State. RSLs are subject to detailed guidance on a number of matters, including the terms of tenancies, the principles upon which the level of rents should be determined, and the way in which the power of eviction should be exercised. It was the guidance on evictions which was said to give rise to the legitimate expectation relied upon by the claimant in this case.

11 There is also statutory regulation through ss.8–10 of the 1996 Act restricting the power of RSLs to dispose of land or housing (although there is a wide range of exceptions); in general the consent of the Housing Corporation is required to any disposal.

12 RSLs also typically receive grants from the Housing Corporation in respect of expenditure incurred in connection with their housing functions. Generally grants are made to assist in the acquisition of specific housing stock. There is a bidding process in which interested RSLs submit bids, and the Housing Corporation assesses value for money and financial viability. Once the grant is made, the money has to be kept in the public domain. If the properties acquired with the grant are disposed of, the moneys received must be repaid, unless they are reinvested in further new homes available for social housing. A review of social housing legislation in 2007 found that the ratio of private finance to public funding was in the region of 2:1.

13 RSLs also have an important role in assisting local authorities to carry out their statutory housing policies. This is not simply a matter of choice but is the subject of legislation. A local authority must allocate houses in accordance with certain priorities. They are required by law to make an allocation scheme, and RSLs are the only body which they are statutorily obliged to consult before adopting a scheme. s.170 of the 1996 Act requires RSLs to co-operate with local authorities if requested ‘‘to such extent as is reasonable in the circumstances’’ by offering accommodation to those with priority under the local authority’s allocation scheme. Typically this co-operation is achieved by nomination agreements made between the authority and the RSL. In this way the RSL is deeply involved in assisting the local authorities in their obligations towards the homeless. Over half (some 54 per cent) of RSL lettings in England are made to local authority nominees. A further 10 per cent are made through allocations made pursuant to a common scheme in which the RSL and local authority are partners.

14 This relationship between RSLs and local authorities is reinforced by the fact that ownership of many local authority houses are being voluntarily transferred to RSLs, subject to the tenant's consent. Some 10 per cent of the Trust's housing has been acquired in that way.

15 Mr Luba referred us to the following passage in annex 5 of the statutory Code of Guidance on Homelessness (July 2006) which succinctly summarises the increasingly important role which RSLs play in the field of social housing in the following terms:

> "Virtually all provision of new social housing is delivered through RSLs and, under the transfer programme, ownership of a significant proportion of housing authority stock is being transferred from housing authorities to RSLs, subject to tenants' agreement. This means that, increasingly, RSLs will become the main providers of social housing. Consequently, it is essential that housing authorities work closely with RSLs, as well as all other housing providers, in order to meet the housing needs in their district and ensure that the aims and objectives of their homelessness strategy are achieved."

16 RSLs also have certain statutory powers, identical to those enjoyed by local authorities but not private landlords, empowering them to take action in respect of the conduct of their tenants. For example, they may apply for antisocial behaviour orders under Pt 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, or for a parenting order under the Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003 in respect of the parents of children causing a nuisance.

The Housing and Regeneration Act 2008

17 Parts 1 and 2 of the Housing and Regeneration Act 2008 have restructured the system for providing social housing as from December 1, 2008. That Act has also for the first time provided a statutory definition of social housing and it is now a statutory prerequisite of registration as an RSL under s.112 of the 2008 Act that the body demonstrates that it provides accommodation at rents below market rates to those in housing need. The Act has split the roles of funding and regulation which were both formerly carried out by the Housing Corporation. Funding is now the province of the Homes and Communities Agency (HCA) and regulation is by the Regulator of Social Housing (RSH). However, the essential elements of the scheme remain the same as in the 1996 Act. The Secretary of State retains ultimate control since both bodies are funded by her and subject to guidance and specific directions from her (see ss.46–47 and 197).

[2009] H.L.R., Part 6 © 2009 THOMSON REUTERS (LEGAL) LIMITED

18 It is not necessary to set out the effects of the 2008 Act in any detail. We are not directly concerned with it; this case must be determined by considering the position of the Trust under the 1996 Act. However, it is potentially significant to this extent: Mr Arden realistically accepts that if the termination of a tenancy is not a private act under the 1996 Act, then inevitably it will not be under the tighter regulatory regime of the 2008 Act.

The Trust

19 The Trust was founded in 1973. It is a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965, and thereby has corporate status. It is also a charity and is a housing association within the meaning of s.1 of the Housing Associations Act 1985. It is the parent body of a large group of companies some, but not all, of which are themselves either charitable bodies and/or registered social landlords.

20 The rules of the Trust set out its powers and objects and provide for its business to be conducted by its Board and its shareholders. None of the Board members is a representative of a local authority or other public body, and no such authority or body has any controlling influence over the Board.

21 The Trust carries out a wide range of activities which include arranging and managing lettings, the acquisition of land, building homes for sale (either outright or with shared ownership), managing leasehold accommodation and managing market-level rented accommodation.

22 The Trust provides a number of different types of accommodation and services, under different tenures (including long leasehold), to various different groups. Most of its housing stock (including the accommodation provided to Mrs Weaver) was purchased in the open market. About 10 per cent of its housing stock has been transferred from local authority ownership by way of large scale voluntary transfer.

23 The Trust is funded by the income it receives from rents, private borrowing and grants. The grants are principally social housing grants allocated by the Housing Corporation under s.18 of the Housing Act. In the two financial years 2004–2006 the Group, of which the Trust is the parent, borrowed £268.7 million by way of grants. This, however, accounts for less than half of the Group's capital finance, and the proportion of public finance is expected to drop to around 30 per cent over the next five financial years, which would be fairly typical of the RSL sector as a whole. Private sources of finance include commercial loans and the proceeds of housing sales.

24 Control over the housing stock rests with the Trust but this is subject to allocation arrangements it makes with the local authorities. It has a number of nomination agreements. In the year ending March 2006 some 64 per cent of its new lettings were the result of nominations from local authorities.

25 The legal relationship between the tenant and the Trust is typically defined by the tenancy agreement and the standard tenancy conditions. In general the tenants hold their tenancy under a weekly agreement although there are some longer leases. The standard conditions set out the tenant's responsibilities in relation to paying the rent, and include a warning that if the rent is not paid, the Trust may apply to the court and seek eviction. That was the reason the Trust sought to evict Mrs Weaver in this case. She was more than eight weeks in arrears.

The statutory provisions

26 Section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 provides that it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. By subs.(3),

> ". . .'public authority' includes -
> (b) any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature".

This is subject to subs.(5),

> "in relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private".

27 The effect of these provisions is that some bodies, conventionally referred to as "core authorities", are public authorities for all purposes. They must at all times act in accordance with Convention rights; subs.(5) is inapplicable to such bodies. By contrast, subs.(3)(b) identifies and brings within the scope of the Act what is termed a "hybrid authority" i.e. one which exercises both public and private functions. Where its acts are in issue, the relevant question is whether the nature of the act is private. If it is then subs.(5) provides that it will not be deemed to be a public authority with respect to that particular act.

28 Accordingly, once it is determined that the body concerned is a hybrid authority—in other words that it exercises functions at least some of which are of a public nature—the only relevant question is whether the act in issue is a private act. Even if the particular act under consideration is connected in some way with the exercise of a public function, it may nonetheless be a private one. Not all acts concerned with carrying out a public function will be public acts. Conversely, it is also logically possible for an act not to be a private act notwithstanding that the function with which it is most closely connected is a private function, although it is difficult to envisage such a case. Such situations are likely to be extremely rare.

29 The concept of "functions" is not altogether straightforward, nor is the distinction between functions and acts. The difficulty was adverted to by Lord Neuberger in YL v Birmingham City Council [2007] UKHL 27; [2008] 1 A.C. 95 at [130]. He expressed the view that the former was more conceptual and noted that a number of acts may be involved in the performance of a function. In Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham LBC [1992] 2 A.C. 1 at 29F, Lord Templeman said that the word "functions", at least as to be construed in s.111 of the Local Government Act 1972, embraced,

> "all the duties and powers of a local authority; the sum total of the activities Parliament has entrusted to it".

 © 2009 THOMSON REUTERS (LEGAL) LIMITED

This would suggest that a function is a sub-species of those duties and powers; although whether and when a specific power or duty can be equated with a function is more problematic. The Divisional Court, in its declaration, referred to the act of termination of a tenancy as a ‘‘function’’.

The authorities

30 There are two decisions of the House of Lords which inform the approach which courts should take when determining whether a body is a public body within the meaning of the Human Rights Act, namely Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billisley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] UKHL 37; [2004] 1 A.C. 546 and YL, to which I have just referred. These decisions also deal with what is in my view the clearly related question whether a particular act is a private act within the meaning of s.6(5).

31 Aston Cantlow raised the question whether a parochial church council was a core public authority. The church council sought to compel the freehold owners of former rectorial land to pay for repairing the chancel of the local parish church. There was no doubt that under domestic law there was a civil obligation on the owners to meet this liability, and the only question was whether it could be said to infringe their human rights. The church council sought to enforce payment by exercising powers conferred upon them by s.2(2) of the Chancel Repairs Act 1932. The owners alleged that that the obligation involved an infringement of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their property and constituted a breach of art.1 of Protocol 1 of the Convention. This submission depended upon establishing that the parochial church council was a public authority under the Human Rights Act. Their Lordships concluded by a majority (Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry; Lord Scott of Foscote dissenting) that it was not. It was neither a core nor a hybrid authority because it exercised no public functions, and therefore no human rights issue arose.

32 In the YL case the issue was whether a private company operating a care home for profit, Southern Cross Healthcare Ltd, was a hybrid public authority (it being accepted that it was not a core public authority.) As in this case, the actual decision in issue was whether a decision to evict a tenant from the care home was subject to the principles of human rights law. The claimant was 84 years old and suffered from Alzheimer’s Disease. Southern Cross wished to remove her from the care home because of the inappropriate behaviour of her relatives. She had been placed in the care home by the local authority in accordance with their statutory duty to arrange for her care under s.21 of the National Assistance Act 1948. The authority paid her rent. If Southern Cross were a hybrid authority, then the claimant could seek to rely upon art.8 rights unless the act of eviction was deemed to be a private one falling within s.6(5). The House of Lords held by a bare majority (Lord Scott of Foscote, Lord Mance and Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury; Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Baroness Hale of Richmond dissenting) that it was not a hybrid authority and that the art.8 argument could not be relied upon. It is to be noted that each of the judges in the majority agreed with each other's decision. (The actual decision in that case has now been reversed by statute: see the Health and Social Care Act 2008, s.145(1). However, plainly this does not in any way affect the binding nature of the reasoning of the majority of their Lordships.)

33 It is pertinent to note that it seems to have been assumed in YL that the issue whether it was a hybrid public authority rested upon whether its function of providing a place at the care home for applicants paid for by the local authority was a public function.

34 It is not necessary to analyse in detail the individual speeches of their Lordships in these two cases, not least because the principles which they establish are relatively clear and were not in dispute before us. The real issue lies not in identifying the principles, but rather in determining the result of their application to the particular circumstances of this case.

35 In my judgement, the following principles can be gleaned from these cases.

(1) The purpose of s.6 is to identify those bodies which are carrying out functions which will engage the responsibility of the United Kingdom before the European Court of Human Rights. As Lord Nicholls put it in the Aston Cantlow case at [6],

> ''the purpose is that those bodies for whose acts the state is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights shall in future be subject to a domestic law obligation not to act incompatibly with Convention rights''.

Lord Rodger at [160], Lord Hope at [52], Lord Hobhouse at [87] and Lord Scott at [129] were to the same effect. (Unfortunately, as Lord Mance pointed out in YL after analysing the Strasbourg jurisprudence, the case law from the European Court of Human Rights provides no clear guidance for gleaning how that test should be applied in a case such as this, where there is no formal delegation of public powers.)

(2) In conformity with that purpose, a public body is one whose nature is, in a broad sense, governmental. However, it does not follow that all bodies exercising such functions are necessarily public bodies; many functions of a kind historically performed by government are also exercised by private bodies, and increasingly so with the growth of privatisation: see Lord Nicholls in Aston Cantlow at [7]–[8]. Moreover, this is only a guide since the phrase used in the Act is public function and not governmental function.

(3) In determining whether a body is a public authority, the courts should adopt what Lord Mance in YL described as a ''factor-based approach'' ([91]). This requires the court to have regard to all the features or factors which may cast light on whether the particular function under consideration is a public function or not, and weigh them in the round. There is, as Lord Nicholls put it in Aston Cantlow ([12]) ''no single test of universal application''. Lord Bingham in YL observed ([5]) that,

> "a number of factors may be relevant, but none is likely to be determinative on its own and the weight of different factors will vary from case to case".

(4) In applying this test, a broad or generous application of s.6(3)(b) should be adopted: per Lord Nicholls in Aston Cantlow [11] cited by Lord Bingham in YL at [4] and by Lord Mance at [91].

(5) In Aston Cantlow Lord Nicholls said ([12]) that the factors to be taken into account,

> "include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service".

Some of these factors were the subject of more detailed analysis in YL. I shall briefly deal with them.

(6) As to public funding, it was pointed out that it is misleading to say that a body is publicly subsidised merely because it enters into a commercial contract with a public body (Lord Scott at [27]; Lord Neuberger at [141]). As Lord Mance observed ([105]):

> "Public funding takes various forms. The injection of capital or subsidy into an organisation in return for undertaking a non-commercial role or activity of general public interest may be one thing; payment for services under a contractual arrangement with a company aiming to profit commercially thereby is potentially quite another."

To similar effect, Lord Neuberger opined that ([165]),

> "it seems to me much easier to invoke public funding to support the notion that a service is a function of 'a public nature' where the funding effectively subsidises, in whole or in part, the cost of the service as a whole, rather than consisting of paying for the provision of that service to a specific person".

(7) As to the second matter, the exercise of statutory powers, or the conferment of special powers, may be a factor supporting the conclusion that the body is exercising public functions, but it depends why they have been conferred. If it is for private, religious or purely commercial purposes, it will not support the conclusion that the functions are of a public nature: see Lord Mance in YL at [101]. However, Lord Neuberger thought that the "existence of wide ranging and intrusive set of statutory powers . . . is a very powerful factor in favour of the function falling within section 6(3)(b)" and he added that it will often be determinative ([167]).

(8) The third factor, where a body is to some extent taking the place of central government or local authorities, chimes with Lord Nicholls' observation that generally a public function will be governmental in nature. This was a theme running through the Aston Cantlow speeches, as Lord Neuberger pointed out in YL at [159]. That principle will be easy to apply where their powers are formally delegated to the body concerned.

(9) The fourth factor is whether the body is providing a public service. This should not be confused with performing functions which are in the public interest or for the public benefit. As Lord Mance pointed out in YL ([105]), the self-interested endeavour of individuals generally works to the benefit of society, but that is plainly not enough to constitute such activities public functions. Furthermore, as Lord Neuberger observed ([135]), many private bodies, such as private schools, private hospitals, private landlords, and food retailers, provide goods or services which it is in the public interest to provide. This does not render them public bodies, nor their functions public functions. Usually the public service will be of a governmental nature.

36 Their Lordships also identified certain factors which will generally have little, if any, weight when determining the public status. First, the fact that the function is one which is carried out by a public body does not mean that it is a public function when carried out by a potentially hybrid body. The point was powerfully and cogently made by Lord Scott in YL at [30]–[31]. He highlighted the anomalies and absurdities that would result if this were the case. Secondly, it will often be of no real relevance that the functions are subject to detailed statutory regulation. Again, as Lord Neuberger pointed out in YL ([134]),

> "the mere fact that the public interest required a service to be closely regulated and supervised pursuant to statutory rules, cannot mean the provision of a service, as opposed to its regulation and supervision, is a function of a public nature. Otherwise, for example, companies providing financial services, running restaurants, or manufacturing hazardous materials, would ipso facto be susceptible to be within the ambit of section 6(1)."

37 Thirdly, it is only of limited significance that the function will be subject to the principles of judicial review. The purpose of attaching liability under s.6 is different to the purpose of subjecting a body to administrative law principles, and it cannot be assumed that because a body is subject to one set of rules it will therefore automatically be subject to the other. So although the case law on judicial review may be helpful, it is certainly not determinative: see Lord Hope in Aston Cantlow ([52]) cited with approval by Lord Mance in YL ([87]).

38 It is also necessary to mention a Court of Appeal decision, Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2002] Q.B. 48 in which the court held that the RSL under consideration in that case was a public authority with respect to the exercise of its functions. This was, however, principally because the body was set up at the behest of a local authority which exercised considerable control over its activities. In YL both Lord Mance ([87]) and Baroness Hale ([61]) observed that this was not a proper basis for reaching that conclusion since the court focused on the historical ties and did not apply a functional test. However, they did not indicate whether the decision itself was correct notwithstanding the defective reasoning. Accordingly, I do not gain any assistance from that case.

What is a private act?

39 In both Aston Cantlow and YL there was some discussion whether, even if the relevant functions were public functions, the particular acts in issue were private acts. In Aston, all of their Lordships except Lord Scott expressed the view that the act of enforcing liability by the parish council was a private act. Lord Nicholls observed that the acts taken by the church council to compel the repair of the church was no more a public act than would be the enforcement of a restrictive covenant ([16]). Lord Hope held that the liability to repair the chancel arose as a matter of private law from the ownership of glebe land. He said that the "nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce. It is seeking to enforce a civil debt" ([64]). Lord Hobhouse's judgment was to the same effect on this point: [90]. Lord Rodger also considered that enforcing the liability was not a public function. He appears to have treated the act and the function as the same. Lord Scott dissented on this point. He held that the parochial church council was a hybrid public authority because the act of enforcing the liability to pay was a public function. Again, he did not draw any distinction between the concepts of function and act in this context.

40 In YL the majority held that the act of moving the claimant out of the home was a private act. Again, emphasis was placed on the private source of power in issue. Lord Scott, with whose judgment Lords Mance and Neuberger agreed, commented that the notice to terminate the tenancy agreement was a "contractual provision in a private law agreement" which in his view "could not be thought to be anything other than private". Lord Mance, although not expressly referring to s.6(5), likewise held that the "source and nature of Southern Cross' activities differentiates them from any function of a public nature" ([120]). Lord Neuberger did not address this issue directly.

41 I would draw these tentative propositions from this analysis. First, the source of the power will be a relevant factor in determining whether the act in question is in the nature of a private act or not. Secondly, that will not be decisive, however, since the nature of the activities in issue in the proceedings is also important. This leads on to the third and related proposition, which is that the character of an act is likely to take its colour from the character of the function of which it forms part.

The decision of the Divisional Court

42 It was conceded before the Divisional Court that the Trust is a hybrid authority on the basis that certain of its functions, in particular the power to obtain parenting orders and antisocial behaviour orders, are public functions. Nonetheless the argument developed before the court (and which is reflected in the form of declaration granted) focused on whether the Trust was a public authority by virtue of its housing and management functions. The key issue was perceived to be whether those functions constituted the exercise of a function or functions of a public nature. There was relatively little focus on s.6(5) and the question whether the termination of the tenancy was a private act.

43 In determining whether the allocation and management of housing was a public function, Richards L.J., with whose judgment Swift J. agreed, first analysed the decision of the House of Lords in YL, focusing solely on the speeches of their Lordships in the majority. In the light of that analysis, he identified certain features of the way in which the RSL carries out its functions which he considered to be germane to the decision he had to reach.

44 He accepted that the management and allocation of housing stock is not itself an inherently governmental activity, as indeed Mr Drabble had conceded. Plainly, this is something that private landlords also do. However, he considered that the context in which the RSL operates makes it different from the ordinary commercial provider; its non-profit making and charitable objects, whilst not indicative of being a public authority, at least placed the organisation outside the commercial sphere.

45 Furthermore, he thought it relevant that it operates in a particular public sector of social rented housing where there is extensive state regulation and where the RSL operates in close harmony with the local authority. RSLs make a significant contribution to meeting the Government's objectives with regard to affordable housing.

46 Richards L.J. recognised that their Lordships in YL had said that merely because a body was subject to detailed regulation that did not mean that it operated in the public sector. However, the regulation of the level of rents and the fact—which the Divisional Court said was particularly important—that there was a very significant public subsidy of RSLs, and more specifically of this Trust, designed to contribute towards Government policy of providing low cost housing, were powerful factors in favour of treating the allocation and management functions as public functions.

47 Again, from time to time there is the voluntary transfer of housing stock to RSLs from the public sector. In this case some 10 per cent or so of the Trust's housing stock fell into that category. There is also the duty of co-operation imposed by s.170 which in practice limited the freedom to allocate and gave effect to the public interest.

48 The Divisional Court considered that as a consequence of these factors taken in the round, the function of management and allocation of housing stock should be subject to the principles of the European Convention.

49 Finally, the Divisional Court considered whether it might be said that the termination of the particular tenancy should be treated as an act of a purely private nature even if the general functions of management and allocation were of a public nature. This was dealt with very briefly. Richards L.J. considered that it would be,

> "artificial to separate out the act of terminating a tenancy or indeed other acts in the course of management of a property from the act of granting a tenancy".

50 It was for these reasons that the court granted the declaration in the terms which it did.

Discussion

51 As I have indicated, the general scheme of the legislation is clear. If the authority is a core public authority, all its functions are public functions, as are all acts pursuant to those functions. It is a hybrid authority if only some of its functions are public functions. Even then, the particular act will not be subject to Convention principles if it is a private act.

52 Once the point was conceded and that concession was accepted by the court, the only relevant question is whether the relevant act—in this case the termination of the tenancy—is a private act. (It could, perhaps, have been suggested that the powers to obtain parenting orders or antisocial behaviour orders were simply powers and not functions, but that argument was never advanced.)

53 In my judgement, therefore, strictly the Divisional Court focused on the wrong question when it posed the issue whether the act of management and allocation of housing was a public function such as to render the Trust a hybrid public authority. In view of the concession, this point was not in issue and para.(a) of the declaration is to that extent misleading. It suggests that it is the exercise of the housing and management functions which renders the Trust a hybrid public body whereas it was one in any event; and it fails directly to address the key question, and strictly the only question which had to be answered in order to determine whether the claimant's human rights were engaged, namely whether the act of termination was a private act (although the declaration does state that acts of termination are public functions).

54 Mr Drabble submitted that the approach adopted by the Divisional Court was the proper one because it has not been accepted by the Trust that it was a hybrid body with respect to its housing allocation and management functions. However, s.6 is not structured so as to ask whether the particular function in the context of which the disputed act takes place is a public function. Moreover, it may sometimes be an irrelevant question. For example, there may be cases where the court is persuaded that whether a particular function of a hybrid body is public or not is immaterial, since it is satisfied that the particular act in dispute is a private act in any event. In those circumstances, the function question does not strictly arise and need not be resolved.

55 However, I do not thereby suggest that the analysis of the Divisional Court was to no purpose. I accept that in order to determine whether the act of termination is a private act or not, it is necessary to focus on the nature of the act in the context of the body's activities as a whole. In most, if not all, cases that is likely to require a consideration of the nature of the function or functions to which the act is contributing. Plainly the power to seek an ASBO was of no assistance in answering whether the termination of the tenancy was a private act or not.

56 By contrast, the question whether the provision by the Trust involved the exercise of a function of a public nature was in my view, highly material to that question. In short, in my judgement the scrutiny which the Divisional Court gave to the housing functions of the Trust was relevant to the question whether the act of termination was private or not, but not to the question whether the Trust was a hybrid public authority.

57 It is plain that the Divisional Court did in fact in this case focus on the function of allocating and managing housing at least in part in order to assist it to reach a conclusion on the proper characterisation of the act of termination. I consider that it was right to do so. It may be that to describe that context by reference to allocation and management was not wholly apt: perhaps allocation alone would have sufficed. But I do not think anything significant turns on that. The important point, in my view, is to consider the act of termination in the wider context of the housing function being carried on by the Trust, whatever shorthand is used to describe that context.

The contending arguments

58 The contending arguments can be relatively shortly stated. Mr Drabble submits that the analysis of the relevant facts demonstrates that most RSLs are in significant part publicly funded in order to fulfil an important function of government. It is an essential policy of government to provide social or subsidised housing, and RSLs are a vital instrument through which that policy is achieved. They are closely regulated and controlled in what rents they can fix and even the way in which they should carry out terminating tenancies. Whilst they do not stand in the shoes of local authorities, they work in very close harmony with them.

59 The obligation to co-operate results in significant limitations on the decision to allocate. Even absent any such duty, the decision who should be allocated the benefit of social housing, the terms on which he is offered it, and the decision to remove someone from it by terminating his tenancy, all involve the exercise of rights which, although private in form, are public in substance. They determine which particular individuals can benefit from the allocation of public funds. All these factors are in play with respect to this particular Trust.

60 Furthermore, the act of termination is closely and inextricably linked to the function of allocation. It would be highly artificial to separate it out and treat it as a private act merely because the tenancy itself was a contract. The Divisional Court was correct to say that the character of the function effectively defined the character of the act.

61 Mr Arden Q.C., counsel for the Trust, says that this argument is misconceived. The fundamental and elementary point, which the respondent does not challenge, is that the provision of housing is not a governmental function. That has very recently been confirmed by Baroness Hale of Richmond. In R. (on the application of Ahmad) v Newham LBC [2009] UKHL 14 in which she pointed out that no-one has a right to a house, and a local housing authority is under no general duty to provide housing accommodation. Many private and public bodies fulfil the function of providing housing.

62 Nor, says Mr Arden, is the case advanced by the fact that there is regulation of certain aspects of the way in which the Trust allocates and manages its housing functions. There has long been detailed regulation of tenancies both in the private and public sectors. Until 1988 rent officers would fix rents at levels which were often below what the market would bear, even in the private sphere. That would not have converted private landlords into bodies exercising public functions. Similarly, control over evictions has been exercised for decades. YL has emphasised that the mere fact of regulation tells us very little, if anything, of a body's status under s.6. It depends upon the nature and purpose of the regulation. This is not a case where the local authority has delegated its statutory powers to the Trust. The fact that both happen to be providing social housing is not enough to render the Trust's functions public.

63 In order to constitute a public body it is necessary for the state to have control over the exercise of the body's powers. Here it does not; it is for the Trust to determine who it shall house and on what terms. It may reach an agreement with the local authority about allocations, but this does not alter the fundamental point that it controls its own affairs and enters into its own contracts.

64 The tenant has no public law rights as against the Trust. Termination of the tenancy may confer fresh duties on the local authority, such as a duty to house a homeless person, and there may be claims against central government for housing benefit. But the relationship between the tenant and the Trust is entirely located in private law. It is governed by the terms of the tenancy (with such statutory overlay to confer security as Parliament has afforded) and these terms are not affected either by the nature of the Trust or the functions it performs.

65 For this reason, even if it can be said that the Trust is performing public functions with respect to the allocation and management of property generally, it is not doing so when it terminates a tenancy. This is par excellence the exercise of a private power in precisely the same way as the termination of the tenancy in YL was so characterised by Lord Scott.

Discussion and conclusions

66 The essential question is whether the act of terminating the tenancy is a private act. When considering how to characterise the nature of the act, it is in my view important to focus on the context in which the act occurs; the act cannot be considered in isolation simply asking whether it involves the exercise of a private law power or not. As Lord Mance observed in YL, both the source and nature of the activities need to be considered when deciding whether a function is public or not, and in my view the same approach is required when determining whether an act is a private act or not within the meaning of s.6(5). Indeed, the difficulty of distinguishing between acts and functions reinforces that conclusion.

67 In this case there are a number of features which in my judgement bring the act of terminating a social tenancy within the purview of the Human Rights Act.

68 A useful starting point is to analyse the Trust's function of allocating and managing housing with respect to the four criteria identified by Lord Nicholls at [12] in the Aston Cantlow case, reproduced above. First, there is a significant reliance on public finance; there is a substantial public subsidy which enables the Trust to achieve its objectives. This does not involve, as in YL, the payment of money by reference to specific services provided but significant capital payments designed to enable the Trust to meet its publicly desirable objectives.

69 Secondly, although not directly taking the place of local government, the Trust in its allocation of social housing operates in very close harmony with it, assisting it to achieve the authority's statutory duties and objectives. In this context the allocation agreements play a particularly important role and in practice severely circumscribe the freedom of the Trust to allocate properties. This is not simply the exercise of choice by the RSL but is the result of a statutory duty to co-operate. That link is reinforced by the extent to which there has been a voluntary transfer of housing stock from local authorities to RSLs.

70 Thirdly, the provision of subsidised housing, as opposed to the provision of housing itself, is, in my opinion a function which can properly be described as governmental. Almost by definition it is the antithesis of a private commercial activity. The provision of subsidy to meet the needs of the poorer section of the community is typically, although not necessarily, a function which government provides. The Trust, as one of the larger RSLs, makes a valuable contribution to achieving the government's objectives of providing subsidised housing. For similar reasons it seems to me that it can properly be described as providing a public service of a nature described in the Lord Nicholls' fourth factor.

71 Furthermore, these factors, which point in favour of treating its housing functions as public functions, are reinforced by the following considerations. First, the Trust is acting in the public interest and has charitable objectives. I agree with the Divisional Court that this at least places it outside the traditional area of private commercial activity. Secondly, the regulation to which it is subjected is not designed simply to render its activities more transparent, or to ensure proper standards of performance in the public interest. Rather the regulations over such matters as rent and eviction are designed, at least in part, to ensure that the objectives of government policy with respect to this vulnerable group in society are achieved and that low cost housing is effectively provided to those in need of it. Moreover, it is intrusive regulation on various aspects of allocation and management, and even restricts the power to dispose of land and property.

72 None of these factors taken in isolation would suffice to make the functions of the provision of housing public functions, but I am satisfied that when considered cumulatively, they establish sufficient public flavour to bring the provision of social housing by this particular RSL within that concept. That is particularly so given that their Lordships have emphasised the need to give a broad and generous construction to the concept of a hybrid authority.

Is termination of a tenancy a private act?

73 That still leaves the central question whether the act of termination itself can nonetheless be treated as a private act. Can it be said that since it involves the exercise of a contractual power, it is therefore to be characterised solely as a private act? It is true that in both Aston Cantlow and YL it is possible to find observations which appear to support an affirmative answer to that question. As I have said, in the YL case Lord Scott considered that the termination of the tenancy in that case was a private act, essentially because it involved the exercise of private rights. And in the Aston Cantlow case their Lordships focused on the private law source of the right being exercised in concluding that it was a private act.

74 Those decisions certainly lend force to the argument that the character of the act is related to and may be defined by the source of the power being exercised. Where it is essentially contractual, so the argument goes, it necessarily involves the exercise of private rights.

75 In my judgement, that would be a misreading of those decisions. The observations about private acts in Aston Cantlow and YL were in a context where it had already been determined that the function being exercised was not a public function. I do not consider that their Lordships would have reached the same conclusion if they had found that the nature of the functions in issue in those cases were public functions.

76 In my judgement, the act of termination is so bound up with the provision of social housing that once the latter is seen, in the context of this particular body, as the exercise of a public function, then acts which are necessarily involved in the regulation of the function must also be public acts. The grant of a tenancy and its subsequent termination are part and parcel of determining who should be allowed to take advantage of this public benefit. This is not an act which is purely incidental or supplementary to the principal function, such as contracting out the cleaning of the windows of the Trust's properties. That could readily be seen as a private function of a kind carried on by both public and private bodies. No doubt the termination of such a contract would be a private act (unless the body were a core public authority).

77 In my opinion, if an act were necessarily a private act because it involved the exercise of rights conferred by private law, that would significantly undermine the protection which Parliament intended to afford to potential victims of hybrid authorities. Public bodies necessarily fulfil their functions by entering into contractual arrangements. It would severely limit the significance of identifying certain bodies as hybrid authorities if the fact that the act under consideration was a contractual act meant that it was a private act falling within s.6(5).

78 Assume, for example, that a local authority delegated some of its statutory functions to a private organisation, such as allocating housing to the homeless. As Lord Mance pointed out in YL, the express delegation of public functions in this way would certainly bring the delegatee within the range of bodies for whom the government would be liable under Strasbourg jurisprudence. It surely could not be said that the exercise of contractual powers necessarily involved in the performance of those functions and central to the concerns of the tenant, such as the termination of a tenancy, involved the exercise of private rights which thus escaped the purview of the Human Rights Act. In my judgement that would plainly be in breach of Convention principles.

79 It follows that in my view the act of terminating the tenancy of Mrs Weaver did not constitute an act of a private nature, and was in principle subject to human rights considerations. That may provide relatively limited protection in view of the decision of the House of Lords in Doherty v Birmingham City Council [2008] UKHL 57; [2008] 3 W.L.R. 636, following Kay v Lambeth LBC [2006] UKHL 10; [2006] 2 A.C. 465. But the claimant and others in a like situation are entitled to such protection as is available to them applying human rights principles.

80 A point which then arises is whether the protection afforded by the Human Rights Act will extend to all tenants of the Trust who are in social housing or only those in properties which were acquired as a result of state grants. I agree with the Divisional Court that it should be all those in social housing. The effect of the grant is not merely to assist the Trust (and other RSLs similarly placed) in being able to provide low cost housing to the tenants in the properties acquired by the grant; it necessarily has a wider impact, and bears upon its ability to provide social housing generally. Furthermore, it would be highly unsatisfactory if the protection of human rights' law depended upon the fortuitous fact whether a tenant happened to be allocated to housing acquired with a grant or not.

81 It does not follow, however, that all tenants of the Trust will receive the same protection. Mr Drabble conceded, I think probably correctly, that human rights' principles will not apply to those tenants of the Trust (a relatively small proportion, it seems) who are not housed in social housing at all. If the tenants are paying market rents in the normal way, then no question of subsidy arises. It is not obvious why the tenant should be in any different position to tenants in the private sector where human rights principles are inapplicable.

82 The effect of drawing this distinction does not lead to the unattractive consequence which would have resulted had the care home been held to have been a hybrid authority in YL, namely that two persons, each subject to the same level of care in the same care home, could be subject to different degrees of legal protection. Indeed, the distinction between those in social housing and those paying market rates merely mirrors the current distinction between those housed in local authority accommodation, who do have human rights protection with respect to evictions, and those housed in the private sector who do not.

Judicial review

83 Both the Aston Cantlow and YL cases emphasised that it does not necessarily follow that because a body is a public body for the purposes of s.6, it is therefore subject to public law principles. The Divisional Court held, however, that in this case the two questions had to be determined the same way. Mr Arden does not now seek to contend otherwise. In my judgement, he was right not to do so.

Disposal

84 Accordingly, I would dismiss this appeal. In my judgement the Trust is a hybrid public authority and the act of terminating a tenancy is not a private act. It does not necessarily follow, however, that every RSL providing social housing will necessarily be in the same position as the Trust. The determination of the public status of a body is fact sensitive. For example, a potentially important difference is that apparently some RSLs have not received any public subsidy at all, and arguably—and I put it no higher than that—their position could be different.

85 LORD COLLINS OF MAPESBURY: I agree with Elias L.J. that the appeal should be dismissed.

86 There are two preliminary comments to be made. The first relates to the question whether this appeal is likely to have any practical importance. In practice complaints by tenants of human rights violations on the part of local authorities or housing associations are most likely to centre on art.8(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights. In Kay v Lambeth LBC [2006] UKHL 10; [2006] 2 A.C. 465 the House of Lords held that the right of a public authority landlord to enforce a claim for possession would in most cases be justifiable under art.8(2). While that decision stands (Kay v United Kingdom is pending in the European Court of Human Rights) the practical implications of extending the protection of the Convention to tenants of RSLs must be very limited.

87 The second point relates to the context, or more accurately the lack of context, in which this appeal came to be heard. Before the Divisional Court Mrs Weaver lost comprehensively on the merits of her claim. She wholly failed in her claim that the Trust had evicted her in breach of a legitimate expectation arising out of guidance issued by the Housing Corporation, and that to evict her from her home would interfere with her rights under art.8. It was held that the claimed legitimate expectation that Housing Act 1988 Sch.2 ground 8 (arrears of rent) would not be used was far too tenuous and general to be enforceable in public law, and there was in any event no breach of it. Mrs Weaver had not given evidence that she had the expectation alleged or that she knew of the term of the contract from which the expectation is said to have arisen. The expectation was simply an artificial construct derived from the standard terms and conditions and attributed to her, rather than a genuinely held expectation of her own. The finding that there was neither a legitimate expectation nor a breach of any legitimate expectation disposed of the argument under art.8.

88 In reaching its conclusions the Divisional Court held that the Trust was subject to the Human Rights Act 1998 by virtue of s.6(3)(b) and (implicitly) that the act of termination of the tenancy was not a private act (s.6(5)). As Elias L.J. has pointed out, strictly it was unnecessary for the court to determine the wider question raising the legal status of the Trust.

89 Normally the Trust would not have been in a position to appeal from that part of the reasoning, because of the fundamental rule of procedure that appeals lie against judgments or orders only, and not against reasons: Lake v Lake [1955] P. 336; Supreme Court Act 1981 s.16. But because the Trust wanted to contest the Divisional Court's conclusion on that issue even if Mrs Weaver did not appeal (and not merely by way of a respondent's notice if she did appeal), the Divisional Court granted declarations (a) that the management and allocation of housing stock by the Trust (including decisions concerning the termination of a tenancy) was a function of a public nature, with the effect that the Trust was to be regarded as a public authority in that respect for the purposes of the Human Rights Act

1998 s.6(3)(b); and (b) that the Trust was accordingly amenable to judicial review on conventional public law grounds in respect of its performance of that function.

90 Whether a declaration should have been granted was of course a matter for the discretion of the Divisional Court, and there was no party at that stage, or on this appeal, with an interest in arguing that no such declaration should have been made. But the consequence of this procedural device is that this court is asked to determine the question of principle divorced from any plausible factual scenario in which the question might arise. In effect this court (by contrast with the Divisional Court) is being asked to give an advisory opinion. As Justice Heydon of the High Court of Australia has said in the context of findings which are not needed for the decision: "It is difficult to solve every aspect of a problem satisfactorily and conclusively when only one element of it is presented for concrete decision. Obiter dicta tend to share in the vice of, and even become, advisory opinions": (2006) 122 L.Q.R. 399, 417.

91 The problem is particularly acute here, because this court is being asked to determine in the abstract an issue on which the Divisional Court did not focus explicitly, namely whether in the present context, even if the Trust is a "person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature" within the meaning of s.6(3)(b), nevertheless it is not a public authority for present purposes because, in the words of s.6(5) "in relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private". The question is this: even if certain of the functions of the Trust are functions of a public nature, is the termination of a tenancy in accordance with its terms a private act?

92 Richards L.J. touched on the public or private character of the termination of the tenancy. First, in the only explicit reference to s.6(5) he set out the relevant parts of s.6 (at [25]). Secondly, he referred to the argument by Mr Drabble Q.C. for Mrs Weaver (at [45]) that the acts of deciding to grant or terminate tenancies of social housing were decisions concerning the allocation of public housing resources and, as such, were not purely private in nature; that a decision to terminate a tenancy led to the withdrawal of a public funded resource from the tenant affected; that it was well established that decisions about eviction could have a public law character so as to be subject to the control of public law: e.g. Wandsworth LBC v Winder (No.1) [1985] A.C. 461 and Wandsworth LBC v A [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1246. Thirdly, he referred (at [60]) in his conclusions to the fact that, on existing authority (Peabody Housing Association Ltd v Green (1979) 38 P. & C.R. 644 and R. v Servite Houses Ex p. Goldsmith [2001] B.L.G.R. 55), a decision by an RSL to terminate a tenancy was considered to be a matter of private, not public, law and not to be susceptible to judicial review; but he thought it better to leave the question of amenability to judicial review out of account when considering the issue of public authority, not least to avoid a danger of circularity of reasoning.

93 His conclusion on this aspect was (at [62]) that, if the allocation of housing stock by the Trust was a public function, then it would be wrong to separate out "management" decisions concerning the termination of a tenancy as acts of a purely private nature. The allocation and management of the housing stock were to be regarded as part and parcel of a single function or as closely related functions. It would be artificial to separate out the act of terminating a tenancy, from the act of granting a tenancy. The termination of a tenancy led to the withdrawal of a publicly funded or subsidised resource from the tenant and was likely to trigger fresh duties of the local authority, and had been recognised in the context of judicial review as involving decisions capable of having a public law character. If the Trust was a public authority in relation to the grant of a tenancy, then it was equally a public authority in relation to the termination of the tenancy.

94 It seems to me that the concession in the present case that the Trust is a "hybrid authority" which exercises both public and private functions does not assist in the application of s.6(5). It was conceded only that the Trust is a hybrid authority on the basis that some of its functions are public functions, such as the power to obtain parenting orders (Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 ss.26B and 26C) and antisocial behaviour orders (Crime and Disorder Act 1998 Pt 1). In addition, the Intervener, the Equality and Human Rights Commission, refers in its written submission to powers enjoyed by RSLs which are not otherwise available to private landlords, including the power to apply to a court to demote a tenant from assured status to the status of a demoted tenant (Housing Act 1988 s.6A, inserted by Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 s.14(4)) and the ability to grant Family Intervention Tenancies (in conjunction with which occupiers undertake behaviour support programmes) (Housing Act 1988 Sch.1 Pt 1 para.12ZA inserted by Housing and Regeneration Act 2008 s.297(2)).

95 Consequently, I do not consider that the reference to "functions of a public nature" in s.6(3)(b) becomes wholly irrelevant once that concession is made and that the focus is simply on s.6(5). It seems to me to be plain that the act in question must be an act in pursuance of the entity's relevant functions of a public nature. The fact that the Trust is conceded to perform functions of a public nature in relation to antisocial behaviour orders not only does not assist in determining whether the nature of the act of termination of a tenancy is private or public, but it deflects attention from what I consider to be an essential prerequisite to consideration of the question in s.6(5), namely that the act is in pursuance of, or at least connected with, performance of functions of a public nature.

96 That does not conclude the matter, of course, because many acts which are in pursuance of performance of functions of a public nature will be private acts. Even if the provision of social housing were a public function, it could not be suggested that the termination of a contract with a builder to repair one of the houses in the housing stock was other than a private act.

97 In Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595; [2002] Q.B. 48 this court held that the housing association was a public authority for the purposes of s.6(3)(b). The court said (at [58]): "The renting out of accommodation can certainly be of a private nature. The fact that through the act of renting by a private body a public authority may be fulfilling its public duty, does not automatically change into a public act what would otherwise be a private act . . .". It said that the "more closely the acts that could be of a private nature are enmeshed in the activities of a public body, the more likely they are to be public'' (at [65(v)]). In the result, the court held that the eviction of the tenant engaged art.8(1) but that the obligation to make the eviction order under s.21(4) of the Housing Act 1988 was within art.8(2). But the authority of this decision has been undermined by YL where it was said that it relied too heavily on the historical links between the local authority and the RSL, rather than upon the nature of the function itself which was the provision of social housing: Lord Scott at [61] and Lord Mance at [105]. See also Baroness Hale, dissenting, at [81].

98 In Aston Cantlow v Wallbank [2003] UKHL 37; [2004] 1 A.C. 546 Lord Nicholls (at [16]) contrasted a private act with the discharge of a public function. Lord Hope (at [41]) said that whether s.6(5) applied to a particular act depended on the nature of the act which was in question in each case; and concluded (at [64]) that the nature of the act was to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC was seeking to enforce; it was seeking to enforce a civil debt, and the function it was performing had nothing to do with the responsibilities which were owed to the public by the state; accordingly s.6(5) applied and in relation to the act in question the PCC was not a public authority. Lord Hobhouse (at [89]) also emphasised the fact that the act was the enforcement of a civil liability, which was a private law obligation.

99 So also in YL v Birmingham City Council [2007] UKHL 27; [2008] 1 A.C. 95 Lord Scott (with whom Lord Neuberger and Lord Mance agreed) emphasised that the notice was served in purported reliance on a contractual provision in a private law agreement, and ''its nature could not be thought to be anything other than private'' (at [34]). Baroness Hale, dissenting, thought that an act in relation to the person for whom the public function is being put forward cannot be a private act for the purposes of s.6(5) (at [73]).

100 Elias L.J. is of the view that the source of the power will be a relevant factor in determining whether the act in question is in the nature of a private act or not. I would go somewhat further. It is not easy to envisage circumstances where an act could be of a public nature where it is not done in pursuance, or purportedly in pursuance, of public functions.

101 I also agree with Elias L.J. that the following features in particular are highly relevant to the question whether the functions of the Trust are public functions (although none of them on its own is in any sense conclusive): the substantial public subsidy which enables the Trust to achieve its objectives; the way in which the allocation agreements circumscribe the freedom of the Trust to allocate properties; and the nature of the regulation to which the Trust is subject. In addition, the vast majority of RSL tenants enjoy statutory protection as regards the circumstances in which a social housing tenancy may be terminated. Secure, assured and assured shorthold tenancies (the vast bulk of RSL tenancies) can only be determined by a process of service of statutorily prescribed notices, court proceedings and a court order which ends the tenancy: cf Doherty v Birmingham City Council [2008] UKHL 57; [2008] 3 W.L.R. 636 at [100], per Lord Walker. Although I do not attach significance to the concession that the Trust is a hybrid authority because it can obtain antisocial behaviour orders, I do attach some significance to that power in conjunction with the other powers relied on by the Equality and Human Rights Commission and referred to above.

102 Consequently it does not follow that the termination of a tenancy is necessarily a private act simply because it originates from the exercise of contractual rights. In any event, I do not read Aston Cantlow and YL as doing more than treating the private law source of the right and obligation as a factor in determining whether the act is a private act or a public act. In my judgement the act of termination is inextricably linked to the provision of social housing as part of the Trust's public function. Consequently I have come to the conclusion that the Divisional Court's decision on this point was right.

103 RIX L.J.: I have read Elias L.J.'s judgment in draft, and am most grateful to him for setting out the material in this case so clearly. I have the misfortune, however, to disagree with him, and with Lord Collins of Mapesbury, as to the disposal of this appeal.

104 There is something rather perplexing about this litigation. Mrs Weaver claimed judicial review of the Trust's decision to seek to terminate her tenancy on ground 8 of Sch.2 to the Housing Act 1988. That is a ground, premised on arrears of rent of more than eight weeks, which provides the landlord with a mandatory basis for recovering possession; as contrasted with grounds 10 or 11, which grant to the court a discretion whether or not to enforce possession. Mrs Weaver alleged that the Trust's use of ground 8 instead of the discretionary grounds for possession was in breach of legitimate expectation and in breach of her rights under the Convention. It was common ground that if her argument based on legitimate expectation failed, she could not succeed in reliance on art.8 of the Convention.

105 Her case on legitimate expectation sought to rely on the assumed presence in the Trust's standard terms and conditions of its assured tenancy agreement of the following statement:

> "In providing a housing service we will comply with the regulatory framework and guidance issued by the Housing Corporation."

The relevant guidance was to be found in Housing Corporation Regulatory Circular 07/04, issued in July 2004 under s.36 of the Housing Act 1996, and then in its replacement Circular 02/07. The key passage, under the heading "Clarification of the Corporation's expectations: evictions", provides:

> "Before using Ground 8, associations should first pursue all other reasonable alternatives to recover the debt."

106 In the divisional court Richards L.J. held as follows,

> "85. . . . the claimed legitimate expectation is far too tenuous and general in character to be enforceable in public law, and there was in any event no breach of it.

86. The claimant herself has not given evidence that she had the expectation alleged or even that she knew of the term of the contract from which the expectation is said to have arisen . . . Thus the expectation is simply an artificial construct derived from the standard terms and conditions and attributed to the claimant, rather than a genuinely held expectation of her own . . .
87. As to the representation itself . . . I do not think that it can be read as a clear, unambiguous and unqualified promise or commitment to do everything set out in the guidance issued by the Housing Corporation. The guidance is by its nature guidance, not prescription. The regulatory provisions to which I have referred place the Housing Corporation in a strong position to ensure that it is substantially followed, but there is nothing that turns it into the equivalent of a statutory rule-book, and the Housing Corporation looks not just at whether the guidance has been followed but at whether alternative action has been taken to achieve the same objectives . . . The statement in [the Trust's] standard terms and conditions cannot have been intended to give the guidance a status it does not have under the statute or in the Housing Corporation's own practice. At most, Mr Arden's description of it as a 'target duty' is more apt. Moreover, if the statement has the character of a promise, there is no reason why it should not be treated as a contractual promise, since it features in the contractual terms and conditions; but it is no part of the claimant's case that the statement is contractually binding. If it lacks the qualities to give it contractual force notwithstanding that it is located in a contract, I am not satisfied that it can properly be treated as having the qualities that justify its enforcement in public law as a legitimate expectation . . .
89. Thus, even if I were to accept the existence of a legitimate expectation in terms of the relevant guidance, that is a promise or commitment on the part of [the Trust] to pursue all reasonable alternatives to recover the debt before using ground 8, I would not find a breach of it on the facts of this case . . . I do not accept that the pursuit of all reasonable alternatives requires possession proceedings to be brought first on ground 10 or 11 before reliance can be placed on ground 8 . . .
90. Looking at the overall history of [the Trust's] dealings with the claimant, I am not persuaded that [the Trust] failed to use all reasonable alternatives to recover the debt before using ground 8. In particular, in the light of the history of substantial and repeated defaults, [the Trust] was in my view entitled to take the view that reliance on ground 10 or 11 did not provide a reasonable alternative means of recovering the debt, and its reliance on ground 8 was in the circumstances in accordance with the relevant guidance and justified . . .".

107 Richards L.J. then turned to the "Convention issues" but said that his finding that there was neither a legitimate expectation nor a breach of any legitimate expectation "sinks the argument" (at [94]). As for a further more fundamental argument that the very statute under which the possession order was sought was incompatible with art.8, Richards L.J. said that it would be better not to express any view on it, since it arose on an artificial assumption and would necessarily be obiter (at [97]).

108 I have set out the public law contentions and the Divisional Court's holdings on them because it seems to me that it is necessary to put the argument before us in context. That context was the complaint that the Trust's decision to use ground 8 (rather than another method of obtaining possession) to evict Mrs Weaver was illegitimate in public law and Convention terms because a provision of the tenancy promised, although not as a contractually binding undertaking, to use other methods first. The argument failed at every point. What is significant for present purposes is that it is said that the Trust did not live up to the legitimate expectations raised by its own contract. The complaint is not even that the Trust sought to obtain possession, but that it sought to do so by one lawful method (lawful that is subject only to the more fundamental argument, not reached by the divisional court, which would have attacked the statutory basis of ground 8) before first trying to do so by another lawful method which should, for reasons engendered by its own contract, have been preferred.

109 Mrs Weaver has not sought to appeal from those decisions which the divisional court reached having first found that the Trust was a public authority within s.6(3)(b) of the HRA 1998. She is no longer interested in this litigation.

110 It is, however, the Divisional Court's decision, along its route towards dismissing Mrs Weaver's claim, that the Trust was a public authority within s.6(3)(b), that is the subject-matter of the present appeal by the Trust. The only way such an appeal could have been promoted was to grant a declaration regarding the position under s.6(3)(b), and that is what the Divisional Court did. Its declaration is set out at [5] above. It may be noted that the declaration is solely by reference to s.6(3)(b), and makes no mention of s.6(5). It may also be noted that the declaration is by reference to a single "function", namely "the management and allocation of housing stock . . . (including decisions concerning the termination of a tenancy)". It is said that such a function "is a function of a public nature". It appears that decisions concerning the termination of a tenancy are part of what is called the function of "the management and allocation of housing stock".

111 The declaration was fashioned to reflect the argument before the divisional court and its reasoning on that argument. The rival submissions of the parties before the divisional court are encapsulated in the following passages taken from the judgment of Richards L.J.:

> "44. Applying YL v Birmingham City Council, Mr Drabble submitted that [the Trust] is to be seen as carrying out a governmental function, namely the management and allocation of state-subsidised housing . . .
> 45. Further, the particular acts of deciding to grant or terminate tenancies of social housing are decisions concerning the allocation of public housing resources and, as such, are not purely private in nature . . .".

Those were the submissions made on Mrs Weaver's behalf. On behalf of the Trust, Mr Arden submitted that,

"48. . . . certain of the functions of an RSL may be public functions: for example, its statutory function in relation to anti-social behaviour orders, or functions carried out pursuant to specific statutory delegations by local housing authorities . . . These specific situations are to be distinguished, however, from the RSL's function of managing and allocating its own housing stock . . .
51. Even if the allocation of housing is a public function, Mr Arden submitted that the termination of a tenancy is not: it is a management decision and is governed by the terms of the contract . . .".

112 On these rival submissions Richards L.J. decided as follows:

"62. Reference to the termination of a tenancy brings me to a final point on this issue, which is that if the allocation of housing stock by [the Trust] is a public function, then it would in my view be wrong to separate out 'management' decisions concerning the termination of a tenancy as acts of a purely private nature. The allocation and management of the housing stock are to be regarded as part and parcel of a single function or as closely related functions. It would be artificial to separate out the act of terminating a tenancy, or indeed other acts in the course of management of a property, from the act of granting a tenancy. Moreover, as Mr Drabble submitted, the termination of a tenancy leads to the withdrawal of a publicly funded or subsidised resource from the tenant and is likely to trigger fresh duties of the local authority, and has been recognised in the context of judicial review as involving decisions capable of having a public law character. If [the Trust] is a public authority in relation to the grant of a tenancy, then it is equally a public authority in relation to the termination of the tenancy.
63. For those reasons I accept the claimant's case that [the Trust] is for relevant purposes a public authority within s.6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998 . . .".

113 Although Richards L.J. nowhere in that passage mentioned s.6(5) (indeed, it is mentioned only very briefly in passing in [25] of his judgment), I would be prepared to accept that in his critical [62], where he considered whether terminating a tenancy or decisions concerning termination were "acts of a purely private nature", he was implicitly having regard to s.6(5)'s provision that,

"in relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of subsection (3)(b) if the nature of the act is private".

However, his reasoning was that it was artificial to separate the act of termination from the act of granting a tenancy. If, therefore, the latter was a public function, or part of the overall public function of "management of a property", then the former was as well.

114 In the light of the arguments addressed to this court, I am not surprised that s.6(5) figured so sparingly in the divisional court's judgments, for before this court too the submissions essentially focussed on s.6(3)(b) rather than on s.6(5). This was despite the fact that Mr Arden conceded (albeit Elias L.J. has suggested, perhaps wrongly) that RSLs were hybrid public authorities within s.6(3)(b) because of their power to obtain ASBOs and parenting orders. However, he was at pains to resist any suggestion that the matter went further than that, or in particular that in matters of management or allocation RSLs had any public functions to perform of any kind whatsoever. Moreover, there was hardly any consideration of what was meant by the extremely broad expression "management" on the one hand, or on the other hand of what was involved in the much narrower field of terminating a tenancy (save in the context of the subsequent discussion of legitimate expectations). On the whole, submissions on all sides were addressed at a very broad level of abstraction. On one side it was being suggested that not only the Trust, but all RSLs, in all their activities, were acting as public authorities, whereas on the other side it was being suggested that (absent such peripheral matters as ASBOs and the like) RSLs were essentially commercial, albeit subsidised and regulated, entities. These were submissions at the extremes.

115 I said above that this is perplexing litigation. I have sought to illustrate what I mean by that. It is, in this court, litigation in which the respondent has no interest, having lost below and not appealed. The argument has proceeded in the main on the basis of an extremely broad canvas, without specific focus on the act of termination in this case or on the critical statutory provision, which is s.6(5), despite the concern there expressed that the focus be on the "particular act". Instead, opposing strategic positions have been taken up. In as much as "management" has been in question, there has been no real attempt to examine what is meant by that, or what is involved in it. No doubt it can cover a vast array of activity, from the purchase or development of housing to the repair of a leaking bathroom pipe in respect of a single tenancy. In as much as "allocation" and "termination" have been in question, there has been no real attempt to explain why termination of a tenancy by regard to its contractual terms is to be regarded as just the other side of the coin, or part and parcel of, a function of allocation, which is essentially precontractual. It has simply been regarded as such.

Strasbourg and domestic jurisprudence

116 In this state of affairs, I ask myself first, what guidance is given by either Strasbourg or domestic jurisprudence.

117 I begin with Strasbourg jurisprudence. This is, in my judgement, a significant starting-point, because, as Elias L.J. has pointed out (at [35(1)] above), the purpose of s.6 is to identify "those bodies for whose acts the state is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights" (per Lord Nicholls in Aston Cantlow at [6]). As Lord Hobhouse observed in the same case (at [87]), "The relevant concept is the opposition of the 'victim' and a 'governmental body'". Moreover, we are required to take Strasbourg jurisprudence into account in determining any question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right: HRA 1998 s.2(1): see Lord Hope (ibid. at [51]). See also Lord Rodger at [163] and in YL Lord Neuberger at [157].

118 What in this context is to my mind instructive is that there is no case, at any rate none has been cited, in Strasbourg jurisprudence in which the non-governmental provider of social housing has been the cause or object of a complaint of victimhood within the meaning of the Convention. The only Strasbourg case cited in the judgments of the divisional court is Novoseletskij v Ukraine (2006) 46 E.H.R.R. 53, where "a body responsible for the management and distribution of part of the state-owned housing stock was held by the Strasbourg court to be a governmental organisation for whose acts and omissions the state was liable" (at [44] of the judgment below). However, that was because the organisation in question was part of that essential "core" or "governmental" fabric of the state which is at the heart of Convention liability for these purposes. The citation by Richards L.J. of that case was simply of an element within the submissions of Mr Drabble below. When I enquired of Mr Arden generally as to what the teachings of Strasbourg jurisprudence might be about non-governmental providers of social housing, he told me that there were no relevant cases. He explained that by and large there was a distinction between countries of Eastern Europe, which had used municipalities to provide social housing, and the countries of Western Europe, where subsidised private social housing prevailed. The United Kingdom had recently moved from the Eastern to the Western European model. There were a number of Strasbourg cases concerning the provision of municipal housing, but that was all. Mr Drabble did not dispute this explanation.

119 I turn to domestic jurisprudence for assistance. I am grateful for the analysis performed by Elias L.J. in respect of the two leading cases of Aston Cantlow and YL. We are to perform a multi-factorial assessment. However, how has this worked in practice? First, I remind myself of what Lord Nicholls said in Aston Cantlow at [16]:

> "I turn next to consider whether a parochial church council is a hybrid public authority. For this purpose it is not necessary to analyse each of the functions of a parochial church council and see if any of them is a public function. What matters is whether the particular act done by the plaintiff council of which complaint is made is a private act as contrasted with the discharge of a public function."

That is of course a reference to the "particular act" in s.6(5).

120 In this context it is to my mind instructive, in a comparatively new field of enquiry, to try to see how the emerging principles have resulted in decisions. I approach the matter chronologically, while recognising that the law has been developing during the short period under review.

121 In R. v Servite Houses Ex p. Goldsmith (2001) 33 H.L.R. 35, Moses J. had to consider the closure by a registered social landlord (RSL) of its purpose-built registered care home which it had assured the applicants would be their home for life. Subsequently, however, financial losses led the RSL to decide to close it. Alternative arrangements were offered. The applicants sought judicial review on the ground that the decision to close was a breach of their legitimate expectations. Although Moses J. was not operating under the HRA and its s.6, he applied a closely analogous test for susceptibility to judicial review, namely whether the RSL was performing a public duty under a statutory source for its powers or whether the source of the power it was exercising was only in contract

(at [56]/[67]). He concluded, albeit reluctantly, that it was the latter. It was true that the applicants had been placed with the RSL by Wandsworth LBC pursuant to a statute (ss.21 and 26 of the National Assistance Act 1948); nevertheless, "Once the placement arrangements had been made the relationship between Wandsworth and Servite [the RSL] was commercial" (at [90]). The source of the RSL's powers was purely contractual and it owed no public law obligation to the applicants. Wandsworth's public law obligations were limited to an obligation to reassess the applicant's needs. The applications failed, although Moses J. raised the question whether "the solution lies in imposing public law standards on private bodies whose powers stem from contract or in imposing greater control over public authorities at the time when they first make contractual arrangements" (at [105]).

122 In YL, Lord Mance referred to the judgment in Servite as illuminating and persuasive and clearly considered it to be correct. He observed that,

> "the essentially contractual source and nature of Southern Cross's activities differentiates them from any 'function of a public nature', even though it is (as often in the private sector) a matter of public concern, interest and benefit that reputable, efficient and properly regulated providers of such services should exist" (at [120]).

Lord Scott and Lord Neuberger agreed with Lord Mance.

123 In Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595; [2002] Q.B. 48 (Poplar) the claimant was an RSL which was seeking possession from its tenant, the defendant. The tenant had originally been granted a tenancy by her local housing authority on an interim basis, while the question whether she was intentionally homeless was investigated. During her tenancy the property in which she lived (together with a substantial proportion of the authority's housing stock) was transferred by the local authority to the RSL, of whom she became a tenant under a periodic assured shorthold tenancy. In due course the local authority decided that she had become intentionally homeless. The RSL then sought possession of her home under s.21(4) of the Housing Act 1988 which provided for mandatory possession by a landlord who gave the requisite notice for seeking possession.

124 The question was whether the RSL was amenable to a complaint under art.8 of the Convention as a hybrid public authority pursuant to s.6 of the HRA 1998. This court, in its judgment given by Lord Woolf C.J., regarded inter alia the following features of the case as being relevant to that question (at [65]):

> "(iii) The act of providing accommodation to rent is not, without more, a public function for the purposes of section 6 . . . irrespective of the section of society for whom the accommodation is provided.
> (iv) The fact that a body is a charity or is conducted not for profit means that it is likely to be motivated in performing its activities by what it perceives to be in the public interest. However, this does not point to the body being a public authority. In addition, even if such a body performs functions, that would be considered to be of a public nature if performed by a public body, nevertheless such acts may remain of a private nature for the purpose of sections 6(3)(b) and 6(5).

(v) What can make an act, which would otherwise be private, public is a feature or a combination of features which impose a public character or stamp on the act. Statutory authority for what is done can at least help to mark the act as being public; so can the extent of the control over the function exercised by another body which is a public authority. The more closely the acts that could be of a private nature are enmeshed in the activities of a public body, the more likely they are to be public. However, the fact that the acts are supervised by a public regulatory body does not necessarily indicate that they are of a public nature. This is analogous to the position in judicial review, where a regulatory body may be deemed public but the activities of the body which is regulated may be categorised private.

(vi) The closeness of the relationship which exists between Tower Hamlets and Poplar [the local authority and the RSL respectively]. Poplar was created by Tower Hamlets to take a transfer of local authority housing stock; five of its board members are also members of Tower Hamlets; Poplar is subject to the guidance of Tower Hamlets as to the manner in which it acts towards the defendant.

(vii) The defendant, at the time of transfer, was a sitting tenant of Poplar and it was intended that she should be treated no better and no worse than if she remained a tenant of Tower Hamlets. While she remained a tenant, Poplar therefore stood in relation to her in very much the position previously occupied by Tower Hamlets.

66. While these are the most important factors in coming to our conclusion, it is desirable to step back and look at the position as a whole. As is the position on application for judicial review, there is no clear demarcation line which can be drawn between public and private bodies and functions. In a borderline case, such as this, the decision is very much one of fact and degree. Taking into account all the circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that while activities of housing associations need not involve the performance of public functions, in this case, in providing accommodation for the defendant and then seeking possession, the role of Poplar is so closely assimilated to that of Tower Hamlets that it was performing public and not private functions. Poplar therefore is a functional public authority, at least to that extent. We emphasise that this does not mean that all Poplar's functions are public. We do not even decide that the position would be the same if the defendant was a secure tenant. The activities of housing associations can be ambiguous. For example, their activities in raising private or public finance could be very different from those under consideration here. The raising of finance by Poplar could well be a private function." (Emphasis added.)

125 I would observe that in that reasoning this court, correctly in my judgement as subsequent House of Lords authority in Aston Cantlow and YL has shown, concentrated not so much on the question whether any functions of an RSL might be of a public nature, but on whether the particular act of seeking possession with which that case was concerned was of a public or private nature. It is clear that this court felt that it was highly relevant on the particular facts that provision (which had started with Tower Hamlets pending an investigation of intentional homelessness) and termination (which only occurred in the light of Tower Hamlets' decision that the defendant was intentionally homeless) were all part of the same function: see the passage emphasised in [66] above. The fact that the RSL was a not for profit charity did not point to it being a public authority. The raising of private or public finance could well be a private function.

126 In YL, Baroness Hale (who was of the minority) observed that "it is the nature of the function being performed, rather than the nature of the body performing it, which matters under section 6(3)(b)" and commented in this connection that Poplar "had relied too heavily upon the historical links between the local authority and the registered social landlord, rather than upon the nature of the function itself which was the provision of social housing" (at [61]). Lord Mance (who was of the majority) was to similar effect (at [105]). While that criticism was made, there is no other direct guide in the speeches in YL as to the correctness of the decision in Poplar. Seeing that the subject matter of the criticism had been a significant factor in pushing this court in Poplar to its decision in what it regarded as a "borderline" case, it is possible to view the outcome there as of now uncertain authority. However, despite the criticism in YL, I have taken the liberty to quote extensively from Poplar because, together with Servite, it is the only prior authority cited to us concerning RSLs, and, in my judgement, its logic (a fortiori when the effect of the criticism is taken into account and the factor concerned is discounted) is that it was not the function of the provision of social housing which determined the result (which would have been a quite general point) but only the special circumstances of the case. I would regard Poplar, on the facts of the present case and in the light of the criticism of it in YL, as being helpful to the Trust. In particular it recognises (see [65(iii)] of Lord Woolf's judgment) that providing accommodation to rent is not without more a public function, irrespective of the section of society for whom the accommodation is provided.

127 Not long after Poplar was decided, it was considered and distinguished in R. (on the application of Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All E.R. 936. That was a fore-runner of the issue in YL. The Foundation, a large charity, operated a residential care home, which it had decided to close down, and so wished to relocate its residents. The claimants were residents for whom a local authority paid, being persons to whom the authority owed a duty to provide care and accommodation under the National Assistance Act 1948. Their argument that the Foundation owed them obligations under art.8 of the Convention on the basis that it was a hybrid public authority under s.6(3)(b) failed. Lord Woolf C.J. again gave the judgment of this court, which also comprised Laws and Dyson L.JJ. Lord Woolf said:

"35. In our judgment the role that LCF was performing manifestly did not involve the performance of public functions. The fact that LCF is a large and flourishing organisation does not change the nature of its activities from private to public. (i) It is not in issue that it is possible for LCF to perform some public functions and some private functions . . . While the degree of public funding of the activities of an otherwise private body is certainly relevant as to the nature of the functions performed, by itself it is not determinative of whether the functions are public or private . . .".

128 Next in the series of cases is Aston Cantlow [2004] 1 A.C. 546, the first of the two cases in the House of Lords which, although they do not concern RSLs, are the leading authorities on the principles for the application of s.6. It and YL have been analysed by Elias L.J., and I will not reduplicate that. However, it is instructive to stand back and try to see the essence of each of the cases in their decision-making process. In Aston Cantlow the parochial church council's appeal succeeded because the particular act concerned, the enforcement of the liability for the repair of the chancel, was an act of a private nature. As Lord Nicholls said:

"16. I turn next to consider whether a parochial church council is a hybrid public authority. For this purpose it is not necessary to analyse each of the functions of a parochial church council. What matters is whether the particular act done by the plaintiff council of which complaint is made is a private act as contrasted with the discharge of a public function."

Lord Nicholls, looking at the matter realistically, concluded that "there is nothing particularly "public" about this" (ibid.). Similarly Lord Hope said that in the case of non "core" public authorities:

"Section 6(5) applies to them, so in their case a distinction must be drawn between their public functions and the acts which they perform which are of a private nature." (At [35].)

His decision (at [64]) was that:

"The nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce. It is seeking to enforce a civil debt. The function which it is performing has nothing to do with the responsibilities which are owed to the public by the State."

Lord Hobhouse thought that it was not shown that PCCs perform any function of a public or governmental nature (at [88]). In any event, the s.6(5) question was to be answered in the defendants' favour:

"89 . . . Is the nature of the relevant act private? The act is the enforcement of a civil liability. The liability is one which arises under private law and which is enforceable as a civil debt by virtue of the 1932 Act."

129 Finally, in YL [2008] 1 A.C. 95 the House of Lords had to consider whether a private company which had contracted with a local authority and the local NHS primary care trust to provide residential accommodation and care in its care home to an elderly woman, was subject to the HRA 1998 when it sought to terminate the contract (because of an irreconcilable breakdown in relations with Mrs YL's family). The House of Lords held by a narrow margin that it was not. The argument seems to have proceeded under s.6(3)(b) rather than under s.6(5). This was possibly because a declaration was sought by way of preliminary issue to the effect that in providing accommodation and care for the claimant the company was exercising public functions within s.6(3)(b) (see [1] and [76]). It does not appear to have been contended that the act of termination was a particular act with a separate, private, status within s.6(5) irrespective of the s.6(3)(b) status of the company as a whole.

130 The position is more complex because of the division of opinion between their Lordships. It is convenient to consider the position of the minority first. Thus Lord Bingham defined the relevant function under investigation as follows:

> "14. The nature of the function with which this case is concerned is not in doubt. It is not the mere provision of residential accommodation but the provision of residential accommodation plus care and attention for those who, by reason of age, illness, disability or any other circumstances are in need of care and attention which is not otherwise available to them."

Lord Bingham continued (at [16]):

> "Counsel for the Birmingham City Council laid great emphasis on the fact that its duty under the Act [ss.21 and 26 of the National Assistance Act 1948] is to arrange and not to provide. This is correct, but not in my view significant. The intention of Parliament is that residential care should be provided, but the means of doing so is treated as, in itself, unimportant. By one means or another the function of providing residential care is one which must be performed. For this reason also the detailed contractual arrangements between Birmingham, Southern Cross and Mrs YL and her daughter are a matter of little or no moment."

Similarly, Lord Bingham said:

> "20. When the 1998 Act was passed, it was very well known that a number of functions formerly carried out by public authorities were now carried out by private bodies. Section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act was clearly drafted with this well-known fact in mind. The performance by private body A by arrangement with public body B, and perhaps at the expense of B, of what would be a public function if carried out by B is, in my opinion, precisely the case which section 6(3)(b) was intended to embrace."

131 For Lord Bingham therefore, the matter was simply and clearly stated. The local authority (a "core" governmental authority) had a direct statutory duty to see to it that residential care (with special emphasis on care) was provided to Mrs YL. If that duty was delegated, at the local authority's expense, to a private company, it was still a public duty. Therefore the company, which was performing that duty, on payment, for the local authority, was a hybrid public authority under s.6(3)(b). No question arose under s.6(5). The termination of Mrs YL's care was necessarily the antithesis of that public duty.

132 Lord Bingham said he also wholly agreed with Baroness Hale (at [2]). She considered that she had amplified Lord Bingham's reasons (see at [75]). She explained the statutory framework in more detail and summed it up in these terms:

> "52. At the same time, local authorities were placed under a duty to carry out an assessment of the need for community care services of any person who might be in need of them (section 47(1)(a) of the [Community Care Act 1990]) and then to decide whether those needs called for the provision by them of any such services: section 47(1)(b). 'Community care services' include arranging or providing accommodation under section 21(1) of the 1948 Act: section 46(3). If the person may also need health care under the National Health Service Act 1977, the local authority must invite the relevant health body to assist in the assessment. A large slice of the social security budget was transferred to local authorities to enable them to meet these new responsibilities.
> 53. The appellant's case was a good example of how the system was supposed to work . . . The local authority arranged the placement with the care home provider and undertook to meet the charges under the tripartite contractual arrangements described above. The local authority has a continuing duty of assessment and remains responsible for the resident's welfare. The local NHS primary care trust assessed her health care needs, and found them to be in the high band, entitling her to a weekly contribution towards the nursing component in her care . . .".

Thus Baroness Hale's analysis is the same as Lord Bingham's, save that she also explains the ramifications of those statutory underpinnings which emphasise the importance of care.

133 Baroness Hale went on to draw analogies with Strasbourg jurisprudence concerned with the delegation by state bodies of their public duties to private bodies (at [56]/[57]). As for s.6, she said this:

> "65. . . . While there cannot be a single litmus test of what is a function of a public nature, the underlying rationale must be that it is a task for which the public, in the shape of the state, have assumed responsibility, at public expense if need be, and in the public interest.
> 66. One important factor is whether the state has assumed responsibility for seeing that this task is performed . . .
> 67. Another important factor is the public interest in having that task undertaken. In a state which cares about the welfare of the most vulnerable members of the community, there is a strong public interest in having people who cannot look after themselves, whether because of old age, infirmity, mental or physical disability or youth, looked after properly. They must be provided with the specialist care, including the health care, that they need . . .

> 68. Another important factor is public funding. Not everything for which the state pays is a public function . . . But providing a service to individual members of the public at public expense is different. These are people for whom the public have assumed responsibility . . .
> 69. Another factor is whether the function involves or may involve the use of statutory coercive powers . . .
> 71. Finally, then, there is the close connection between this service and the core values underlying the Convention rights and the undoubted risk that rights will be violated unless adequate steps are taken to protect them.''

She briefly referred to s.6(5) at [73].

134 I have cited from the speeches of the minority at some length to demonstrate what, in my judgement, is clear from them: that, even though here and there some of the factors discussed by Baroness Hale may have limited application to the case presently before us, nevertheless there is nothing or little to suggest that their decision could be carried over into the facts of our case. The statutory underpinnings, the Strasbourg jurisprudence, and even the aspect of public funding are all fundamentally or at least significantly different.

135 I turn then to the speeches of the majority. It seems to me that the essential difference between them and the minority is that whereas the latter began with the statutory duties of the local authorities and considered that what followed was a delegation of duties to private bodies in circumstances where, because of the essentially non delegable nature of those duties, the state, albeit through the private body, had to remain responsible, the majority held that there was no real delegation of public functions, but only a contracting out of the provision of services, and that in this respect there was a great gulf between the obligations of the state and those of the private contractor. Lord Scott put the point in the following way:

> ``29. There are, in my opinion, very clear and fundamental differences. The local authority's activities are carried out pursuant to statutory duties and responsibilities imposed by public law. The costs of doing so are met by public funds, subject to the possibility of a means tested recovery from the resident. In the case of a privately owned care home the manager's duties to its residents are, whether contractual or tortious, duties governed by private law. In relation to those residents who are publicly funded, the local and health authorities become liable to pay charges agreed under private law contracts and for the recovery of which the care home has private law remedies . . .
> 30. As it seems to me, the argument based on the alleged similarity of the nature of the function carried on by a local authority in running its own care home and that of a private person running a privately owned care home proves too much. If every contracting out by a local authority of a function that the local authority could, in the exercise of a statutory power or the discharge of a statutory duty, have carried out itself, turns the contractor into a hybrid public authority for section 6(3)(b) purposes, where does this end? . . .

31. These examples illustrate, I think, that it cannot be enough simply to compare the nature of the activities being carried out at privately owned care homes with those carried out at local authority owned care homes. It is necessary to look also at the reason why the person in question, whether an individual or corporate, is carrying out those activities. A local authority is doing so pursuant to public law obligations. A private person, including local authority employees, is doing so pursuant to private law contractual obligations . . .".

136 Lord Scott then turned his attention to the impact of regulation (see Lord Mance's speech at [79] for the extent of it) and found in it part of the private rights under contract, rather than a reason for an alternative regime of public law. He said:

"32. This regulatory framework is in place. A feature, or consequence, of it is that an obligation by Southern Cross to observe the Convention rights of residents is an express term of the agreement between the council and Southern Cross and YL. Any breach by Southern Cross of YL's Convention rights would give YL a cause of action for breach of contract under ordinary domestic law. No one has suggested that the contractual arrangements between the council and Southern Cross and between Southern Cross and YL are not typical. There is, in my opinion, no need to depart from the ordinary meaning of 'functions of a public nature' in order to provide extra protection to YL and those like her . . .".

Those remarks have resonance for the contractual situation in the present case, to which I will return.

137 Finally, Lord Scott did reach, by reference to Aston Cantlow, the question under s.6(5), without mentioning it in terms. He said:

"34. As to the act of Southern Cross that gave rise to this litigation, namely, the service of a notice terminating the agreement under which YL was contractually entitled to remain in the care home, the notice was served in purported reliance on a contractual provision in a private law agreement. It affected no one but the parties to the agreement . . .".

138 Lord Mance began his analysis with the Strasbourg jurisprudence (at [92ff]). He said that it lacked any case directly in point, but demonstrated two relevant principles. One was that the state may in some circumstances be responsible for failure to regulate or control the activities of private persons; the other was the state may in some circumstances remain responsible for the conduct of private law institutions to which it had delegated state powers. The first principle did not apply, because the company had no regulatory role. As for the second principle (which had clearly influenced the minority), this recognised that,

"there may be certain essentially state or governmental functions, particularly involving the exercise of duties or powers, for the manner of which the state will remain liable, notwithstanding that it has delegated them to a private law body".

However, that principle requires either that the body is established and capitalised by the state for state purposes and armed with state powers, or that the functions of the state are non-delegable. However, neither principle appeared to apply to private care homes or the provision of care and accommodation. Even where a body is provided with special powers, that did not mean that they amounted to functions of a public nature, as distinct from being conferred for private, religious, or purely commercial purposes.

139 Lord Mance then turned his attention to the statutory background to the company's role in that case (at [107ff]). Even if a public authority had a duty to provide care and accommodation, it did not follow that its provision under contract by a private body was equally the performance of a public function, for on analysis some of the latter's functions and activities may be private in nature (at [110]). In that respect, Lord Mance critically said that he did not regard "the actual provision, as opposed to the arrangement, of care and accommodation for those unable to arrange it for themselves as an inherently governmental function" (at [115]). He added:

> "116. In providing care and accommodation, Southern Cross acts as a private, profit-earning company. It is subject to close statutory regulation in the public interest. But so are many private occupations and businesses, with operations which may impact on members of the public in matters as diverse for example as life, health, privacy or financial well-being. Regulation by the state is no real pointer towards the person regulated being a state or governmental body or a person with a function of a public nature, if anything perhaps even the contrary. The private and commercial motivation behind Southern Cross's operations does in contrast point against treating Southern Cross as a person with a function of a public nature."

Moreover, while it is not possible to distinguish between paying and subsidised residents in a local authority care home, because the local authority is a core authority, it is incongruous to distinguish between self-paying and publicly funded residents in a private home (at [119]). He therefore concluded that the company in providing care and accommodation to YL in its home was not exercising functions of a public nature within s.6(3)(b). He did not consider s.6(5).

140 Lord Mance's analysis may be said to be essentially as follows. The provision under contract of care and accommodation by a private care home, run for profit, is essentially the carrying out of private and not public functions. The statutory background in the obligation of local authorities to arrange and provide such care and accommodation did not turn the provision of such services as distinct from their arranging into public functions. Regulatory supervision of private care homes did not lead in a different direction, if anything it confirmed his view. Neither did the public funding of YL's placement. It was incongruous to distinguish between privately and publicly funded residents. Strasbourg jurisprudence was consistent with his view. The contracting out of services otherwise provided under statute by a public authority was not such a delegation of non-delegable duties as to require a different solution.

141 Lord Neuberger considered the problem in three stages: first, on the particular facts of the case, secondly by reference to a policy argument concerning the contracting out of services which a core public authority is under a statutory duty to provide, and thirdly by reference to still wider issues of principle (at [132]). As to the first stage, he too emphasised that close and detailed supervision did not tell in favour of the company being a hybrid public authority: "There is no identity between the public interest in a particular service being provided properly and the service itself being a public service" (at [134]). Neither did the fact that services of the kind provided by the company were also provided by charities, ie operating in the public interest for the public benefit. Not only did that not affect those who provide such services on a commercial basis, but even in the case of charities it did not mean that provision of the services was a function of a public nature. Otherwise all charities (and all private organisations providing services which could be provided by charities) would be caught by s.6 (at [135]). Nor did the fact that such services were provided to the vulnerable: the need for particular protection went rather to the responsibility of government supervision (at [136]). Such factors were not irrelevant, but not persuasive. Lord Neuberger next considered three factors which were essential to Mrs YL's case. (1) As for statutory duties, they applied to the core authority, but only the duty to arrange was inherently of a public nature. (2) The public funding could not be a sufficient condition, otherwise everything and everyone paid for by a core authority would be drawn into the concept of a public function. (3) Similarly, the fact that the service could be provided by a core authority was not sufficient.

142 As for contracting out, this was not a case of the contracting out of a duty, since statute did not require the provision of care by the authority itself. In terms of public funding, it was easier to say that a general subsidy to the business as a whole could turn the business as a whole into a function of a public nature, than in the case of the funding of specific individuals. And in any event, Mrs YL continued to have her public law remedies against the local authority in respect of their continuing statutory duty to provide care and accommodation. In truth contracting out took the matter no further, otherwise the provision of meals or the repairing of buildings or the manufacture of military materiel would be caught. More generally, policy considerations concerning contracting out weighed in the opposite direction:

> "It is thought to be desirable, in some circumstances, to encourage core public authorities to contract-out services, and it may well be inimical to that policy if section 6(1) automatically applied to the contractor as it would to the authority. Indeed, unattractive though it may be to some people, one of the purposes of contracting-out at least certain services previously performed by local authorities may be to avoid some of the legal constraints and disadvantages which apply to local authorities but not to private operators. . .[T]he fact that there are competing arguments makes it hard to justify the courts resolving the instant issue by reference to policy." (At [152].)

143 Finally, Lord Neuberger came to his "wider perspective" (at [154]). He considered that only some wider policy considerations, if available, could bolster the various factors that he had so far considered, even taken together, into a conclusion in favour of Mrs YL on the s.6(3)(b) issue. It was at this point that Lord Neuberger turned to Strasbourg jurisprudence and to previous authority in the form of Aston Cantlow for guidance. There was nothing in the former to support Mrs YL's claim, while dicta in Aston Cantlow emphasised the distinction between functions of an inherently governmental nature (such as running a prison, discharging a statutory regulatory regime or maintaining defence, see at [166]) and those that were not, such as maintenance or cleaning contracts (at [162]).

144 It was in this context that Lord Neuberger contrasted the public funding of an impecunious individual in YL with the situation where,

> "the funding effectively subsidises, in whole or in part, the cost of the service as a whole . . . Thus, it appears to me to be far easier to argue that section 6(3)(b) is engaged in relation to the provision of free housing by an entity all of whose activities are wholly funded by a local authority, than it is in relation to the provision of housing by an independently funded entity to impecunious tenants whose rent is paid by the local authority."

145 In a final checklist, Lord Neuberger concluded that the following considerations, in no particular order, taken together led to his decision that the provision of care and accommodation by the company was not a function of a public nature within s.6(3)(b), despite being paid for by a local authority pursuant to its statutory duty: (a) the company's activities would not be subject to judicial review; (b) Mrs YL would not be treated by the Strasbourg court as having Convention rights against the company; (c) the company's functions with regard to the provision of care and accommodation would not be regarded as inherently governmental; (d) the company had no special statutory powers with regard to the provision of care and accommodation; (e) the care home was not funded by the local authority; (f) the rights and liabilities between the company and Mrs YL arose under a private law contract (at [160]). In essence, Lord Neuberger's analysis was very similar to that of Lord Mance.

146 Most recently, in R. (on the application of Ahmad) v Newham LBC [2009] UKHL 14, Baroness Hale of Richmond has emphasised that the provision of housing is not a government function. She said (at [12]):

> "Part VI of the Housing Act 1996 gives no-one a right to a house. This is not surprising as local housing authorities have no general duty to provide housing accommodation. They have a duty periodically to review housing needs in their area (Housing Act 1985, s 8). They have power to provide housing accommodation by building or acquiring it (1985 Act, s 9). They also have power to nominate prospective tenants to registered social landlords or to others. They are required to have an allocation policy which applies to selecting tenants for their own housing or nominating people for housing held by others (Housing Act 1996, s159(2)). But this does not mean that they have to have available any particular quantity of housing accommodation, still less that they must have enough of it to meet the demand, > even from people in the 'reasonable preference' groups identified in section 167(2). In some areas there may be an over-supply of council and social housing. In others there may be a severe under-supply. Newham is one of those others."

Baroness Hale emphasises the distinction between allocation and provision.

Discussion and conclusion

147 Applying these analyses and considerations to the facts of the present case, I do not consider that the Trust's decision to terminate Mrs Weaver's tenancy by seeking possession from the court on mandatory ground 8 justified by her non-payment of rent is properly to be categorised as the exercise of a function of a public nature rather than a private act arising out of contract. In my judgement, although there may be strands based on a multi factorial approach to argue a conclusion to the contrary effect, the essential reasoning of our jurisprudence firmly supports the Trust's appeal.

148 First, Strasbourg jurisprudence does not suggest that the Trust is amenable to Convention liability or that the United Kingdom's liability can be invoked in respect of such an act.

149 Secondly, I cannot find in the decisions of domestic jurisprudence support for Mrs Weaver's case. Servite, which was approved by the majority of their Lordships in YL, runs contrary to the decision appealed against. Poplar, despite the criticism of it in YL and allowing full effect for that criticism, gives her case no principled support. Aston Cantlow emphasises both the importance of s.6(5) in the analysis and the significance of the Trust's claim being in support of a private contractual right. As for YL, the statutory underpinnings there, for the reasons preferred by the minority, were much stronger than in the present case, for statute required the provision of care to a vulnerable person in need of welfare services. Lord Bingham himself emphasised the significance for him of the facts that statute required the provision of services and that the services concerned went beyond the accommodation and extended to care for the particularly vulnerable. In the present case, however, it is quite clear and common ground that statute does not require the provision of housing accommodation (see [44]), and there is no question of Mrs Weaver being a particularly vulnerable person to whom care and medical services must also be provided. I am doubtful that even the minority view in YL would support the divisional court's declarations.

150 Thirdly, it seems to me that the argument in this case, reflected in the judgments of the divisional court, has been inappropriately influenced by the structure of the dispute in YL. Because of the nature of the declaration there sought, and also perhaps because it was common ground that, if the provision of care and accommodation was required by statute and/or inherently of a public nature then it was irrelevant that the particular act in question was a decision to terminate the contract, the argument appears to have been essentially directed to s.6(3)(b). Alternatively, the width of the argument under s.6(3)(b) subsumed any question under art.6(5). However, as emerged in submissions before us, it is clear that in our case a major issue ought to be whether, even on the assumption that allocation is a function of a public nature, termination under the terms of the tenancy is of the same nature or alternatively is of the nature of a private act.

151 Fourthly, under the influence of the structure of the argument in our case, submissions have proceeded from the concept that "management and allocation" is an all-embracing public function which includes termination. Accordingly, the court has been encouraged to accept that if management (or allocation) is a public function, then the rest follows. I do not accept that that is a satisfactory way to analyse the housing function. It is to be noted that the declaration is not framed in terms of the "provision" of housing, nor in terms of social housing. "Management" is a vast and undifferentiated area which, as it seems to me, inevitably includes functions and acts which are most unlikely to be of a public nature: such as the commercial acquisition or even development of property, or the financing of it (even on the basis that public subsidy plays an important role, as to which see below), or the maintenance and repair of it, or the daily grind of administering a very substantial portfolio of property of all kinds. In my judgement, the acceptance that management of social housing is essentially a single integrated function of a public nature is most unlikely to be correct. Moreover, the Trust operates and manages substantial amounts of property outside the sphere of social housing, or where local authority allocation plays no role: see the figure of 36 per cent implicit in the figure quoted at [24] above. However, there has been hardly any examination of this issue of what "management" comprises in practice, and the divisional court has proceeded on the basis that management is essentially a function of either a public or a private nature and chosen between these extremes in favour of the former. It has seemed to me that both sides of this dispute have had an interest in advancing an argument which would dispose, once and for all, of the issue whether an RSL is for all purposes a hybrid public authority or not. I very much doubt, however, that such an issue can be debated in this way.

152 Fifthly, my concern becomes increasingly acute when the proposition is that because management is a public function, then allocation is, or perhaps vice versa, and because allocation is, therefore termination is. YL is clear authority for the proposition that even where a public authority has a statutory duty both to arrange and to provide care and accommodation for the most vulnerable of our society, the fact that the arrangement may be of an inherently governmental or public nature does not mean that their provision is. It seems to me that, as compared with the case of care and accommodation in a care home, a fortiori that is true of the case of housing, even social housing. Moreover, in as much as it is suggested that because allocation is a function of a public nature, therefore termination is, I would respectfully disagree. Allocation arises under arrangements made between an RSL and a local authority, where the local authority makes use of such arrangements to fulfil their statutory duty to have an allocation policy. However, once an allocation has been made and a prospective tenant has been accepted by an RSL as its tenant, the tenant then enters into a contractual tenancy with the RSL, and their relationship thenceforward is governed, just like any tenant's relationship with his or her landlord, by private law. That remains the case despite the relevance of regulation. Moreover, the statutes which govern the recovery of possession apply to an RSL's social housing tenancies and other landlords' tenancies alike. All the authorities I have considered stress the importance of private contractual rights. Poplar's decision was driven by very special factors.

153 While it is inevitable that core public authorities who enter into contractual tenancies are subject to the Convention, it seems to me to require special circumstances to impose Convention solutions on top of the working out of private law contracts of private bodies, even if such bodies are also in some respects hybrid public authorities. Admittedly the question can always arise whether a function of a public nature intrudes into the area of the contract and decisions which have to be taken under it. Where, however, as here, the contract concerned is one so well known to private/commercial life as a tenancy agreement, where such contracts are being entered into in almost identical or standard form with social housing tenants and non social housing tenants alike, it seems to me to be counter-intuitive to suppose that the working out of that contract as between a private (non-governmental) landlord and a tenant can depend on Convention rights. An exception might be where public functions fill the whole or a substantial space of that contract. I see no reason, however, for saying that that is the situation here. On the contrary, a contract like a tenancy contract, for all that it is hedged around by statutory provisions, is made for the specific purpose of determining the rights between the parties.

154 Sixthly, there is nothing special about the regulation which applies to social housing which to my mind changes that picture. The majority in YL thought that if anything regulation is needed for the very reason that, regulation apart, the relevant world is governed by private contract. It is certainly clear that very large parts of commercial life are regulated; and the place and space of regulation in such life is growing all the time. It is true that the modern regulatory regime of social housing controls or influences the rents charged (see [17] above describing the 2008 Act) and that the essence of social housing as there formulated is that it is available at lower than market rents. That, however, is built into the tenancy agreement, which fixes the rent. Similarly, regulation may provide guidance for termination, such as the guidance which is in focus in these proceedings: "Before using Ground 8, associations should first pursue all other reasonable alternatives to recover the debt." However, it seems to me not to matter whether that is treated as part of the contract or not. If, as would appear to be the case, although the issue was only reached in the divisional court after a decision had been reached on s.6(3)(b), that guidance is part of the contract (see [3]/[5] above and the term "we will comply with the regulatory framework and guidance issued by the Housing Corporation"), then it is part of the bargain and Mrs Weaver has her contractual remedy. If, on the other hand, Mrs Weaver prefers, seeking a public law remedy outside contract, to say that that term lacks contractual force for all that it is located in the contract, then it would seem to me nevertheless that it would be incongruous on that account to bring into the world of private contractual rights and obligations an obligation which is referred to in the contract and could have been made part of it. As Richards L.J. observed (see [5] above), "if it lacks the qualities to give it contractual force notwithstanding that it is located in a contract, I am not satisfied that it can properly be treated as having the qualities that justify its enforcement in public law as a legitimate expectation. . .''. It is noticeable that in YL the regulatory regime does appear to have been made part of the contract (see Lord Scott at [32] of YL, cited at [34] above).

155 Seventhly, there is nothing about the nature of the Trust, or the typical RSL, to promote the concept that in the everyday administration of its tenancy agreements it is performing functions of a public nature. Although it is a charity, it has independent corporate status and is conducted by an independent board of directors and owned by its private shareholders. As a charity, it operates for the public benefit rather than for commercial profit, but its operations are essentially in the private and business world, rather than in the world of government, for all that. Richards L.J. in the court below and Elias L.J. in this court consider that the Trust's charitable status places it outside the sphere of commercial providers. In my judgement, however, the world of charity is essentially private, and, although a charity does not operate for profit in the ordinary way, nevertheless when its function is to provide a service such as housing in return for the payment of rent and to do so on a substantial scale (the Trust owns 33,000 dwellings), it has to operate according to (for want of a better word) business disciplines or else it is very likely to fail. It seems to me that what Lord Neuberger said about charities at [135] of YL puts them into the private world rather than into the world of those performing functions of a public nature. To similar effect is Lord Mance at [110] of YL where he quotes Lord Woolf C.J. in R. (Heather) v London Cheshire Foundation at [15]:

> ''If the authority itself provides accommodation, it is performing a public function . . . However, if a body which is a charity, like LCF, provides accommodation to those to whom the local authority owes a duty under s 21 in accordance with an arrangement under s 26, it does not follow that the charity is performing a public function.''

There is no suggestion in YL or Heather that a charity is other than in the private world.

156 Eighthly, the majority of the Trust's capital finance comes from private lenders and the proceeds of housing sales, while a very substantial but decreasing minority comes from public grants. The grants are available to buy social housing. If the properties purchased with the grants are resold, the grants have to be returned, unless rolled over and used on the purchase of further social housing. The Trust's revenues come from its rents. The typical ratio of private finance to public grant across the RSL sector as a whole is 2:1. Richards L.J. and my Lords in this court see the substantial degree of public subsidy in the form of the public grants as a significant factor in determining that everything that an RSL does by way of social housing it does in exercise of a public function. I accept that public subsidy is a factor in the overall assessment; and that Lord Neuberger says in YL that a general subsidy is in this respect more telling than the defrayment by the public purse of the cost of individuals (whereas Baroness Hale took the opposite view).

157 However, in my judgement such matters are relative and there is a danger in confusing form and substance. Public subsidy in its broadest sense comes in many different forms. Sometimes the state defrays the costs of individual consumers in need. Sometimes, by making grants to companies, it defrays the costs of particular products or services. Sometimes, by means of tax deductions, it defrays the cost to taxpayers generally of the acquisition of products (capital grants) or services (mortgage finance). Sometimes, as we have seen only recently, very large sums of general public subsidy are needed to prevent private financial institutions from collapse. It would be surprising to learn that these private institutions are hybrid public authorities. Where tax deductible capital grants are concerned, the public policy is to encourage efficiency and modernisation by reducing the cost of re-equipment. It is hard to say that one form of subsidy is essentially different from another. The state also uses taxation policy to raise revenues (as well as to expend subsidy) in the public interest: thus duty is raised from the manufacturers of alcohol and tobacco. In social housing, the role that public grants essentially play is to mediate between the commercial cost of housing, for which a lower than market price is to be paid in the form of rent by tenants, and the revenues obtainable from that rent. The overall effect is to lower the cost of borrowing across the board. There is no direct allocation, however, between the grant on any particular property and the rent payable. Mrs Weaver's home is in a building which the Trust acquired on the private market with private finance. On the other hand, the effect is also to subsidise the rents of social housing tenants. Whereas I accept that public finance is an element in the equation, I would be sceptical about allowing it, or any particular form of it, to play a dominant role in the assessment.

158 Ninthly, there is the difficult question of public policy addressed by Lord Neuberger in YL at [152] (see [40] above). His prescription is that the competing views about policy render this factor neutral. As such, they do not strengthen the case for hybrid status. I would add this further consideration. Lord Neuberger spoke of the policy of contracting out as being to avoid the legal constraints and disadvantages of operating as a core governmental authority. I would diffidently suggest that there is another, possibly even more significant, ambition of the policy of moving into the private sector what at some earlier period may have been carried on in the public sector. That is a recognition that, where large business operations have to be carried out, even when such operations are not governed purely by markets but have elements of social policy about them, they are better carried out by private expertise in the management of such operations, whose experience and efficiency nevertheless redound to the public interest.

159 Tenthly, and finally, the public welfare concern which all feel for those in need of social housing, and I mean to include government, the courts, the RSLs themselves and the public at large in that "all", is addressed or capable of being addressed in many different ways: in statutory provision, in regulation, in public subsidy, in the exercise of charitable status, in the contractual arrangements between local authorities and RSLs, in the form of tenancy agreements, in the expertise of RSLs, and in the ongoing duty of local authorities to assess and to allocate accommodation for those in need. It is, however, unnecessary to give to decisions, under contract, of an essentially private nature an artificial status as acts of a public nature or in performance of public functions, in order to ensure proper protection.

160 In sum, when I consider the various factors which the authorities teach us to consider, I can find insufficient to support the conclusion that in the exercise of its contractual rights under its tenancy agreement the Trust is acting in the public rather than in the private sphere, or in performance of a function of a public nature. While it is conceded by the Trust that in certain, limited but irrelevant respects the Trust is a hybrid public authority for the purpose of s.6(3)(b), I am sceptical how far the management of social housing by an RSL can be brought within the meaning of that sub-section. Even if allocation is to be brought within that subsection, that is not the same as provision of accommodation. In my judgement, however, for the purpose of s.6(5) the Trust's decision to exercise its contractual rights by invoking a claim for possession under ground 8 cannot be attacked in public law or by reference to the Convention.

161 For my part, therefore, I would allow this appeal. In the event, however, for the reasons given by my Lords, the appeal will be dismissed

A number of travellers, including the defendants, established an unauthorised encampment in an area of woodland owned by the claimant Secretary of State and managed by the Forestry Commission. The Secretary of State issued proceedings alleging trespass and seeking an order for possession of the occupied site and of a number of other unoccupied woodland sites in the vicinity likewise vested in him and managed by the commission. He also sought an injunction to restrain the defendants from re-entering the occupied site or entering the other sites. The recorder made an order of possession of the occupied site but refused the application for possession in so far as it extended to the unoccupied sites. he also refused the injunction sought. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the Secretary of State, unanimously in respect of the wider possession order and by a majority in respect of the injunction.

On appeal by the defendants—

Held, allowing the appeal in part, (1) that a possession claim against trespassers involved the person entitled to possession seeking recovery of the land in question and, accordingly, an order for possession of land not occupied by the trespassers and of which the owner enjoyed uninterrupted possession could not be justified; that where trespassers were encamped in part of a wood a possession order might be made against them in respect of the whole wood; but that, however desirable it might be to fashion or develop a remedy to meet a practical problem such as that which arose in the present case, the Court of Appeal had had no power to make an order for possession of areas of woodland not occupied by the defendants and wholly detached and separated from the area occupied by them (post, paras 7–12, 20, 38–41, 59, 63–67, 71, 78, 95, 96–98).

Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food v Heyman (1989) 59 P & CR 48 and Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Drury [2004] 1 WLR 1906, CA disapproved.

University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301, CA distinguished.

(2) That where a trespass was threatened, and particularly where a trespass was being committed and had been committed in the past by the defendant, an injunction to restrain it was, in the absence of good reasons to the contrary, appropriate even though there appeared to be little prospect of enforcing it by imprisonment or sequestration; that it would not be appropriate to set aside the injunction granted by the Court of Appeal unless it had been plainly wrong to grant it or there had been an error of principle in the reasoning leading to its grant, neither of which was established; that the effect and purpose of government guidance on unauthorised

H

A encampments, relied on by the defendants, was not strong enough to displace the Secretary of State's right to seek the assistance of the court to prevent a legal right being infringed; and that, accordingly, the grant of the injunction should be upheld (post, paras 3, 20, 39, 79, 83–84, 87–88, 95).

Per Baroness Hale of Richmond JSC. I would not see procedural obstacles as necessarily precluding the "incremental development" sanctioned in the Drury case provided that an order could be specifically tailored against known individuals who B have already intruded on the claimant's land, are threatening to do so again and have been given a proper opportunity to contest the order. It would be helpful if the rules so provided so that the procedures could be properly thought through and the forms of order properly tailored to the facts of the case (post, para 40).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal

This was an appeal by the second and fifth defendants, Sharon Horie and Lesley Rand, by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Hope of Craighead, Baroness Hale of Richmond and Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury) given on 11 February 2009 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Arden and Wilson LJJ; Wilson LJ dissenting in part) allowing an appeal by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs from Mr Recorder Norman in the Poole County Court, sitting at Southampton.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury MR.

Richard Drabble QC and Marc Willers (instructed by Community Law Partnership, Birmingham) for the second and fifth defendants.

C

John Hobson QC and John Clargo (instructed by Whitehead Vizard, Salisbury) for the Secretary of State.

The court took time for consideration.

1 December 2009. The following judgments were handed down.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY JSC

1 If a group of people come on to my land without my permission, I shall want the law to provide a speedy way of dealing with the situation. If they leave but come back repeatedly, depending on the evidence, I shall be able to obtain an interlocutory and final injunction against them returning. But they may come on to my land and set up camp there. Again, depending on the evidence, I shall be able to obtain an injunction (interlocutory and final) against them remaining and also against them coming back again once they leave as required by the injunction. Similarly, if the evidence shows that, once they leave, they are likely to move and set up camp on other land which I own, the court can grant an injunction (interlocutory and final) against them doing that. If authority is needed for all this, it can be found in the judgment of Lord Diplock in the Court of Appeal in Manchester Corpn v Connolly [1970] Ch 420.

2 Of course, it is quite likely that I won't know the identities of at least some of the trespassers. If so, Wilson J regarded an injunction as "useless" since "it would be wholly impracticable for the claimant to seek the committal to prison of a probably changing group of not easily identifiable travellers, including establishing service of the injunction and of the application": Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Drury [2004] 1 WLR 1906, 1912, para 19. That may well have been an unduly pessimistic assessment. Certainly, claimants have used injunctions against unnamed defendants. And Sir Andrew Morritt V-C was satisfied that the procedural problems could be overcome. Admittedly, the circumstances in the first of his cases, Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2003] 1 WLR 1633, were very different from a situation involving trespassers. But trespassing protesters were the target of the interlocutory injunction which he granted in Hampshire Waste Services Ltd v Intended Trespassers upon Chineham Incinerator Site [2004] Env LR 196. Similarly, in South Cambs District Council v Persons Unknown [2004] 4 PLR 88, the Court of Appeal (Brooke LJ and Clarke LJ) granted an injunction against persons unknown "causing or permitting

H

A hardcore to be deposited, caravans, mobile homes or other forms of residential accommodation to be stationed, or existing caravans or other mobile homes to be occupied on land" adjacent to a gipsy encampment in rural Cambridgeshire (para 3). Brooke LJ commented, at para 8: "There was some difficulty in times gone by against obtaining relief against persons unknown, but over the years that problem has been remedied either by statute or by rule." See the discussion of such injunctions by B Jillaine Seymour, "Injunctions Enjoining Non-Parties: Distinction without Difference" [2007] CLJ 605–624.

3 The present case concerns travellers who set up camp on the Forestry Commission's land at Hethfelton. Lord Neuberger has explained the circumstances. The identities of some, but not all, of those involved were known to the Commission. So the defendants included "persons unknown". C Despite this, the Commission sought an injunction against all the defendants, including those described as "All persons currently living on or occupying the claimant's land at Hethfelton". The recorder declined to grant an injunction on the view that it would be disproportionate. But the Court of Appeal [2009] 1 WLR 828, by a majority, reversed the recorder on this point and granted an order that

> "The respondents, and each of them, be restrained from entering upon, trespassing upon, living on, or occupying the parcels of land set out in the Schedule hereto, and, for the avoidance of doubt, the fourth respondent shall mean 'those people trespassing on, living on, or occupying the land known as Hethfelton Wood on any date between 13 February 2007 and 3 August 2007 save for those specifically identified as first, second, third, E fifth and sixth respondents.' "

In my view, for the reasons given by Lord Neuberger, the majority were right to grant the injunction. In any event, Mr Drabble QC, who appeared for the travellers, did not suggest that this injunction had been incompetent or defective for lack of service or in some other respect. Even Wilson LJ, who dissented on the injunction point in the Court of Appeal, did not go so far as F to suggest that it was inherently useless: he simply took the view, at para 76, that it added nothing of value to the order for possession and, therefore, the recorder would have been entitled to exercise his discretion to refuse it on that basis.

4 This brings me to the order for possession which lies at the heart of the appeal. If people not only come on to my land but oust me from it, I can G bring an action for recovery of the land. That is what the Commission did in the present case: they raised an action in Poole County Court for recovery of "land at Hethfelton nr Wool and all that land described on the attached schedule all in the county of Dorset". In effect, the Commission were asking for two things: to be put back into possession of the land on which the defendants were camped at Hethfelton, and to be put into possession of the other specified areas of land which they owned, but on which, they H anticipated, the defendants might well set up camp once they left Hethfelton.

5 The Court of Appeal granted an order for possession in respect both of the land at Hethfelton and of the other parcels of land situated some distance away. As regards the competency of granting an extended order of this kind, the court was bound by the decision in the Drury case

[2004] 1 WLR 1906. The central issue in the present appeal is whether that case was rightly decided. In my view it was not.

6 Most basically, an action for recovery of land presupposes that the claimant is not in possession of the relevant land: the defendant is in possession without the claimant's permission. This remains the position even if, as the Court of Appeal held in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton [2000] QB 133, the claimant no longer needs to have an estate in the land. See Megarry & Wade, The Law of Real Property, 7th ed (2008), para 4-026. To use the old terminology, the defendant has ejected the claimant from the land; the claimant says that he has a better right to possess it, and he wants to recover possession. That is reflected in the form of the order which the court grants: "that the claimant do forthwith recover" the land—or, more fully, "that the said AB do recover against the said CD possession" of the land: see Cole, The Law and Practice in Ejectment (1857), p 786, Form 262. The fuller version has the advantage of showing that the court's order is not in rem; it is in personam, directed against, and binding only, the defendant. Of course, if the defendant refuses to leave and the court grants a writ of possession requiring the bailiff to put the claimant into possession, in principle, the bailiff will remove all those who are on the relevant land, irrespective of whether or not they were parties to the action: R v Wandsworth County Court, Ex p Wandsworth London Borough Council [1975] 1 WLR 1314. So, in that way, non-parties are affected. But, if anyone on the land has a better right than the claimant to possession, he can apply to the court for leave to defend. If he proves his case, then he will be put into possession in preference to the claimant. But the original order for possession will continue to bind the original defendant. See Stamp J's lucid account of the law in In re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, Ex p Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Assocn for the South East [1971] Ch 204, 209C–210B.

7 In re Wykeham Terrace and Manchester Corpn v Connolly [1970] Ch 420 showed the need for some reform of the procedures used in actions for recovery of land. The twin problems of unidentifiable defendants and the lack of any facility for granting an interim order for possession were tackled by a new RSC Ord 113, the provisions of which, with some alteration of the details, have been incorporated into the current rule 55 of the CPR. In the present case no issue arises about the wording of rule 55. But I would certainly not interpret "occupied" in rule 55.1(b) as preventing the use of the special procedure in a case like University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 where some protesters were excluding the university from one part of its campus, but many students and members of staff were legitimately occupying other parts.

8 The intention behind the relevant provisions of rule 55 remains the same as with Order 113: to provide a special fast procedure in cases which only involve trespassers and to allow the use of that procedure even when some or all of the trespassers cannot be identified. These important, but limited, changes in the rules cannot have been intended, however, to go further and alter the essential nature of the action itself: it remains an action for recovery of possession of land from people who are in wrongful possession of it. I should add that in the present case the defendants do not dispute that they are—or, at least, were at the relevant time—in possession, rather than mere occupation, of the Commission's land at Hethfelton.

A Wonnacott, Possession of Land (2006), p 27, points out that defendants rarely dispute this. But here, in any event, the defendants' possession is borne out by their offer to co-operate to allow the Commission's ordinary activities on the land not to be disrupted. This is inconsistent with the Commission being in possession. So the preconditions for an action for recovery of land are satisfied.

B 9 By contrast, the Forestry Commission were at all relevant times in undisturbed possession of the parcels of land listed in the schedule to the Court of Appeal's order. That being so, an action for the recovery of possession of those parcels of land is quite inappropriate. The only authority cited by the Court of Appeal in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906 for granting such an order was the decision of Saville J in Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food v Heyman (1989) 59 P & CR 48. But in that C case the defendant trespassers were not represented and so the point was not fully argued.

10 Saville J referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301, which I have just mentioned. That decision is clearly distinguishable, however. The defendant students, who had previously taken over, and been removed from, certain administrative D offices of the University of Essex, had been occupying another part of the university buildings known as "Level 6". The Court of Appeal made an order for possession extending to the whole property of the university—in effect, the whole campus. This was justified because the university's right to possession of its campus was indivisible: "If it is violated by adverse occupation of any part of the premises, that violation affects the right of possession of the whole of the premises": [1980] 1 WLR 1301, 1305C–D, per E Shaw LJ. In the Heyman case, by contrast, the Ministry's right to possession of its land at Grovely Woods was not violated in any way by the trespassers' adverse possession of its other land two or three miles away at Hare Wood. In my view, the Heyman case was wrongly decided and did not form a legitimate basis for the Court of Appeal's decision in the Drury case.

11 Mummery LJ [2004] 1 WLR 1906, 1916, para 35 described Wilson F J's approach in the Drury case as "pragmatic". And, of course, the common law does evolve by making pragmatic incremental developments. But, if they are to work, they must be consistent with basic principle and they must make sense.

12 I would not put undue emphasis on the supposed practical difficulties in providing for adequate service by attaching notices to stakes, etc, on these remoter areas of land. Doubtless, adequate arrangements G could be worked out, if extended orders were otherwise desirable. The real objection is that the Court of Appeal's extended order that "the [Commission] do recover the parcels of land set out in the Schedule hereto" is inconsistent with the fundamental nature of an action for recovering land because there is nothing to recover: the Commission were in undisturbed possession of those parcels of land. And the law is harmed rather than H improved if a court grants orders which lay defendants, knowing the facts, would rightly find incomprehensible. How, the defendants could well ask, can the Commission "recover" parcels of land which they already possess? How, too, are the defendants supposed to comply with the order? Only a lawyer could understand and explain that the order "really" means that they are not to enter and take over possession of the other parcels of Commission land. This is, of course, what the injunction already says in somewhat old-fashioned, but tolerably clear, language.

13 Doubtless, the wording could in theory be altered, but this would really be to change the nature of the action and turn the order into an injunction, so creating parallel injunctions, one leading to the possible intervention of the bailiff and the other not.

14 The claimed justification for granting an extended order for possession of this kind is indeed that it is the only effective remedy against travellers, such as the present defendants, since it can ultimately lead to them being removed by a bailiff under a warrant for possession. Moreover, unless the Commission can obtain an extended order, they will be forced to come back to court for a new order each time the defendants move to another of their properties. An injunction is said to be a much weaker remedy in a case like the present since, if the defendants fail to comply with it, all that can be done is to seek an order for their sequestration or committal to prison. Sequestration is an empty threat, the argument continues, against people who have few assets, while committal to prison might well be inappropriate in the case of defendants who are women with young children.

15 Plainly, the idea of the Commission having to return to court time and again to obtain a fresh order for possession in respect of a series of new sites is unattractive. But the scenario presupposes that the defendants would, with impunity, disobey the injunction restraining them from entering the other parcels of land. So this point is linked to the contention that the injunction would not work.

16 I note in passing that there is actually no evidence that these defendants would fail to comply with the injunction in respect of the other parcels of land. So there is no particular reason to suppose that the Court of Appeal's injunction will prove an ineffective remedy in this case. On the more general point about the alleged ineffectiveness of injunctions in cases of this kind, South Bucks District Council v Porter [2003] 2 AC 558 is of some interest. There the council wanted to obtain an injunction against gipsies living in caravans in breach of planning controls because an injunction was thought to be a potentially more effective weapon than the various enforcement procedures under the planning legislation. This is in line with the thinking behind the application for an injunction in South Cambs District Council v Persons Unknown [2004] 4 PLR 88 which I mentioned in para 2.

17 Admittedly, if the present defendants did fail to comply with the injunction, sequestration would not be a real option since they are unlikely to have any substantial assets. And, of course, there are potential difficulties in a court trying to ensure compliance with an injunction by committing to prison defendants who are women with young children. Nevertheless, as Lord Bingham of Cornhill observed in South Bucks District Council v Porter [2003] 2 AC 558, at para 32, in connection with a possible injunction against gipsies living in caravans in breach of planning controls:

> "When granting an injunction the court does not contemplate that it will be disobeyed . . . Apprehension that a party may disobey an order should not deter the court from making an order otherwise appropriate: there is not one law for the law-abiding and another for the lawless and truculent."

A Taking that approach, we should, in my view, be slow to assume that an injunction is a worthless remedy in a case like the present and that only the intervention of a bailiff is likely to be effective. If that is indeed the considered consensus of those with experience in the field, then consideration may have to be given to changing the procedures for enforcing injunctions of this kind.

B 18 But any such reform would raise far-reaching issues which are not for this court. In particular, travellers are by no means the only people without means whose unlawful activities the courts seek to restrain by injunction and where the assistance of a bailiff might be attractive to claimants. Especially when Parliament has intervened from time to time to regulate the way that the courts should treat travellers, the need for caution in creating new remedies is obvious. At the very least, the matter is C one for the Master of the Rolls and the Rule Committee who have the leisure and facilities to consider the issues.

19 For these reasons I would allow the defendants' appeal to the extent proposed by Lord Neuberger.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE JSC

D 20 I agree with all the other members of the court that this appeal should be allowed to the extent of setting aside the wider possession order. In Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Drury [2004] 1 WLR 1906, the Court of Appeal went too far in trying to achieve a practical solution. The decision cannot be seen as simply an extension of University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301, in which the facts were very different. I respectfully agree with the observations on injunctive relief E made by Lord Rodger at the end of his judgment.

BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND JSC

21 Two questions are before us. First, can the court grant a possession order in respect of land, no part of which is yet occupied by the defendant, because of the fear that she will do so if ejected from land which she currently does occupy? Second, should the court grant an injunction against F that feared trespass? The Court of Appeal unanimously answered the first question in the affirmative, following the reasoning of that court in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Drury [2004] 1 WLR 1906 and the decision of Saville J in Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food v Heyman (1989) 59 P & CR 48. The majority also answered the second question in the affirmative; Wilson LJ dissented but G only because he thought the wider possession order a sufficient remedy in the circumstances.

22 The approach in the Drury and Heyman cases was rightly described by Mummery LJ in the Drury case, at para 35, as "pragmatic", depending as it did upon the comparative efficacy of possession orders and injunctions. A possession order gives the claimant the right to call upon the bailiffs or the sheriff physically to remove the trespassers from his land, which is what he H wants. An injunction can only be enforced by imposing penalties upon those who disobey. Mummery LJ considered it a "legitimate, incremental development" of the ruling of the Court of Appeal in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 that a possession order can cover a greater area of the claimant's land than that actually occupied by the trespassers.

23 The situation in the Djemal case was very like the situation in this and no doubt many other cases. The University of Essex consists (mainly) of some less than beautiful buildings erected in the 1960s upon a beautiful campus at Wivenhoe Park near Colchester. The students had occupied a small part of the university buildings. The university wanted an order covering the whole of the university premises. The judge had given them an order covering only the part actually occupied by the students. The Court of Appeal made the wider order sought by the university, holding that there was jurisdiction to cover "the whole of the owner's property in respect of which his right of occupation has been interfered with": per Buckley LJ, at p 1304 (emphasis added). Shaw LJ reasoned that the right of the university to possession of the site and buildings was "indivisible. If it is violated by adverse occupation of any part of the premises, that violation affects the right of possession of the whole of the premises": p 1305 (emphasis added). These were extempore judgments in a case where the students had already decided to call off their direct action, but it will be noted that Buckley LJ spoke of interference with a right of occupation, while Shaw LJ spoke of violation of a right of possession.

24 The defendants in this case are occupying only part of Hethfelton Wood. We can, I think, assume that the Forestry Commission are occupying the rest. They are carrying on their forestry work as best they can—indeed, one of their problems is that they are impeded from doing it because of the risk of harm to the vehicles and their occupants. Yet Mr Drabble, for the defendant appellants, has never resisted an order covering the whole of Hethfelton Wood, nor does he invite us to disagree with Djemal. Being a sensible man, he recognises that we would be disinclined to hold that if trespassers set up camp in a large garden the householder can obtain an order enabling them to be physically removed only from that part of the garden which they have occupied, even if it is clear that they will then simply move their tents to another part of the garden.

25 The questions raised by this case and the Djemal case should be seen as questions of principle rather than pragmatism or procedure. Still less should they be answered by reference to the forms of action which were supposedly abolished in 1876. The underlying principle is ubi ius, ibi remedium: where there is a right, there should be a remedy to fit the right. The fact that "this has never been done before" is no deterrent to the principled development of the remedy to fit the right, provided that there is proper procedural protection for those against whom the remedy may be granted. So the questions are: what is the right to be protected? And what is the appropriate remedy to fit it?

26 If we were approaching this case afresh, without the benefit and burden of history, we might think that the right to be protected is the right to the physical occupation of tangible land. A remedy should be available against anyone who does not have that right and is interfering with it by occupying the land. That remedy should provide for the physical removal of the interlopers if need be. The scope of the remedy actually granted in any individual case should depend upon the scope of the right, the extent of the actual and threatened interference with it, and the adequacy of the procedural safeguards available to those at risk of physical removal.

27 In considering the nature and scope of any judicial remedy, the parallel existence of a right of self-help against trespassers must not be

A forgotten, because the rights protected by self-help should mirror the rights that can be protected by judicial order, even if the scope of self-help has been curtailed by statute. No civil wrong is done by turning out a trespasser using no more force than is reasonably necessary: see Hemmings v Stoke Poges Golf Club [1920] 1 KB 720. In Cole on Ejectment (1857), a comprehensive textbook written after the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict B c 76), there is considerable discussion (in chapter VII) of the comparative merits of self-help and ejectment. Any person with a right to enter and take possession of the land might choose simply to do that rather than to sue in ejectment. But this was not advised where the right of entry was not clear and beyond doubt, or where resistance was to be expected. The effect of the criminal statutes against forcible entry was "by no means clear": whether no force at all, or only reasonable force, might be used against the trespasser. C Cole was not as sanguine as was Lord Denning MR in McPhail v Persons, Names Unknown [1973] Ch 447, 456. Lord Denning took the view that the statutes against forcible entry did not apply to the use of reasonable force against trespassers. Those statutes have now been replaced by section 6 of the Criminal Law Act 1977. This prohibits the use or threat of violence against person or property for the purpose of securing entry to any premises D without lawful excuse. But it also provides that a right to possession or occupation of the premises is no excuse, although there is now an exception for a "displaced residential occupier" or "protected intending occupier": section 6(1A), as inserted by Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, section 72(2). This does not include the Forestry Commission, although it is not impossible that they would be able to evict the travellers without E offending against the criminal law. But in any event, the use of self-help, even if it can be lawfully achieved, is not encouraged because of the risk of disorder that it may entail.

28 Lord Denning MR in the McPhail case, at pp 456–457, considered that the statutes of forcible entry did not apply because the trespassing squatters were not in possession of the land at all. He quoted Pollock on Torts, 15th ed (1951), p 292:

> "A trespasser may in any case be turned off land before he has gained possession, and he does not gain possession until there has been something like acquiescence in the physical fact of his occupation on the part of the rightful owner."

A trespasser who merely interferes with the right to possession or occupation G of the property may also be ejected with the use of reasonable force: one does not need to go to court, or even call the police, to eject a burglar or a poacher from one's property.

29 Although Cole contemplated that self-help might be used against a tenant who had wrongfully continued in occupation after the end of his tenancy, tenants are clearly now in a different position from squatters. Lord Denning MR thought that the statutes of forcible entry did apply to protect H them (although Cole says that the authorities on which he relied had later been overruled). Most, but not all, residential tenants are now protected by statute against eviction otherwise than by court order. This is a complicated area which need not concern us now as we are dealing with people who have never been granted any right to be where they are.

30 However, Lord Denning's basic point, at p 457 B-C, is important here: "In a civilised society, the courts should themselves provide a remedy which is speedy and effective: and thus make self-help unnecessary." It seems clear that the right of self-help has never been limited to those who have actually been dispossessed of their land: in fact on one view it is limited to those who have not been so dispossessed. There is no reason in principle why the remedy of physical removal from the land should only be available to those who have been completely dispossessed. It should not depend upon the niceties of whether the person wrongfully present on the land was or was not in "possession" in whatever legal sense the word is being used. Were the students in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 in possession of the university's premises at all? Lord Denning, supported by Sir Frederick Pollock, would not think so: see the McPhail case, at p 456F. Were these new travellers in possession of Hethfelton Wood at all? Again, Lord Denning would not think so. They had parked their vehicles there, but the work of the Forestry Commission was going on around them as best it could.

31 If we accept that the remedy should be available to a person whose possession or occupation has been interfered with by the trespassers, as well as to a person who has been totally dispossessed, a case like the Djemal case becomes completely understandable, as does the order for possession of the whole of Hethfelton Wood in this case. Nor need we be troubled by the form of the order, that the claimant "recover" the land. His occupation of the whole has been interfered with and he may recover his full control of the whole from those who are interfering with it.

32 As is obvious from the above, a great deal of confusion is caused by the different meanings of the word "possession" and its overlap with occupation. As Mark Wonnacott points out in his interesting monograph, Possession of Land, Cambridge University Press, (2006) p 1, the term "possession" is used in three quite distinct senses in English land law: "first, in its proper, technical sense, as a description of the relationship between a person and an estate in land; secondly, in its vulgar sense of physical occupation of tangible land" (the third sense need not concern us here). Possession, in its first sense, he divides into a relationship of right, the right to the legal estate in question, and a relationship of fact, the actual enjoyment of the legal estate in question; a person might have the one without the other. Possession of a legal estate in fact may often overlap with actual occupation of tangible land, but they are conceptually distinct: a person may be in possession of the head lease if he collects rents from the subtenants, but he will not be in physical occupation of tangible land.

33 The modern action for the possession of land is the successor to the common law action of ejectment (and some statutory remedies developed for use in the county and magistrates' courts in the 19th century). The ejectment in question was not the ejectment sought by the action but the wrongful ejectment of the right holder. Its origins lay in the writ of trespass, an action for compensatory damages rather than recovery of the estate. But the common law action to recover the estate was only available to freeholders and not to term-holders (tenants). So the judges decided that this form of trespass could be used by tenants to recover their terms. Trespass was a more efficient form of action than the medieval real actions, such as novel disseisin, so this put tenants in a better position than freeholders. As is well known, the device of involving real people as notional lessees and ejectors

A was used to enable freeholders to sue the real ejectors. These were then replaced by the fictional characters John Doe and Richard Roe. Eventually the medieval remedies were (mostly) abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act 1833; the fictional characters of John Doe and Richard Roe by the Common Law Procedure Act 1852; and the forms of action themselves by the Judicature Acts 1873–1875: see AWB Simpson, A History of the Land Law, Oxford, Clarendon Press, 2nd ed (1986), ch VII).

B 34 The question for us is whether the remedy of a possession action should be limited to deciding disputes about "possession" in the technical sense described by Wonnacott. The discussion in Cole on Ejectment concentrates on disputes between two persons, both claiming the right to possession of the land, one in occupation and the other not. Often these are between landlords and tenants who have remained in possession when the C landlord thinks that their time is up. But it is clear that in reality what was being protected by the action was the right to physical occupation of the land, not the right to possession of a legal estate in land. The head lessee who was merely collecting the rents would not be able to bring an action which would result in his gaining physical occupation of the land unless he was entitled to it.

D 35 It seems clear that the modern possession action is there to protect the right to physical occupation of the land against those who are wrongfully interfering with it. The right protected, to the physical occupation of the land, and the remedy available, the removal of those who are wrongfully there, should match one another. The action for possession of land has evolved out of ejectment which itself evolved out of the action for trespass. There is nothing in CPR Pt 55 which is inconsistent with this view, far from E it. The distinction is drawn between a "possession claim" which is a claim for the recovery of possession of land (rule 55.1(a)) and a "possession claim against trespassers" which is a claim for the recovery of land which the claimant alleges is "occupied only by a person or persons who entered or remained on the land without the consent of a person entitled to possession of that land . . ." (rule 55.1 (b)). The object is to distinguish between the procedures to be used where a tenant remains in occupation after the end of F his tenancy and the procedures to be used where there are squatters or others who have never been given permission to enter or remain on the land. That, to my mind, is the reason for inserting "only": not to exclude the possibility that the person taking action to enforce his right to occupy is also in occupation of it. There is then provision for taking action against "persons unknown". But the remedy in each case is the same: an order for physical G removal from the land.

36 It was held in R v Wandsworth County Court, Ex p Wandsworth London Borough Council [1975] 1 WLR 1314 that a bailiff executing a possession warrant is entitled to evict anyone found on the premises whether they were party to the judgment or not. However, there is nothing to prevent the order distinguishing between those who are and those who are H not lawfully there, provided that some means is specified of identifying them. No one would suggest that an order for possession of Hethfelton Wood would allow the removal of Forestry Commission workers or picnickers who happened to be there when the bailiffs went in. In principle, court orders should be tailored to fit the facts and the rights they are enforcing rather than the other way around.

37 This does not, however, solve the principal question before us. What is the extent of the premises to which the order may relate? As Mummery LJ suggested in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906, para 31, the origin was in an action to recover a term of years. The land covered by the term would be defined in the grant. It would not extend to all the land anywhere in the lawful possession of the claimant. Equally, however, as discussed earlier, the remedy can be granted in respect of land to which the claimant is entitled even though the trespasser is not technically in possession of it. This suggests that the scope may be wider than the actual physical space occupied by the trespasser, who may well move about from time to time. In any event, the usual rule is that possession of part is possession of the whole, thus begging the question of how far the "whole" may extend. It was suggested during argument that it might extend to all the land in the same title at the Land Registry. This could be seen as the modern equivalent of the "estate" from which the claimant had been unlawfully ousted. But this is artificial when a single parcel of land may well be a combination of several different registered titles.

38 The main objection to extending the order to land some distance away from the parcel which has actually been intruded upon is one of natural justice. Before any coercive order is made, the person against whom it is made must have an opportunity of contesting it, unless there is an emergency. In the case of named defendants, such as the appellants here, this need not be an obstacle. They have the opportunity of coming to court to contest the order both in principle and in scope. The difficulty lies with "persons unknown". They are brought into the action by the process of serving notice not on individuals but on the land. If it were to be possible to enforce the physical removal of "persons unknown" from land on which they had not yet trespassed when the order was made, notice would also have to be given on that land too. That might be thought an evolution too far. Whatever else a possession order may be or have been, it has always been a remedy for a present wrongful interference with the right to occupy. There is an intrusion and the person intruded upon has the right to throw the intruder out.

39 Thus, while I would translate the modern remedy into modern terms designed to match the remedy to the rights protected, and would certainly not put too much weight on the word "recover", I would hesitate to apply it to quite separate land which has not yet been intruded upon. The more natural remedy would be an injunction against that intrusion, and I would not be unduly hesitant in granting that. We should assume that people will obey the law, and in particular the targeted orders of the court, rather than that they will not. We should not be too ready to speculate about the enforcement measures which might or might not be appropriate if it is broken. But the main purpose of an injunction would be to support a very speedy possession order, with severely abridged time limits, if it is broken.

40 However, I would not see these procedural obstacles as necessarily precluding the "incremental development" which was sanctioned in Drury. Provided that an order can be specifically tailored against known individuals who have already intruded upon the claimant's land, are threatening to do so again, and have been given a proper opportunity to contest the order, I see no reason in principle why it should not be so developed. It would be helpful if the Rules provided for it, so that the procedures could be properly thought

A through and the forms of order properly tailored to the facts of the case. The main problem at the moment is the "scatter-gun" form of the usual order (though it is not one prescribed by the Rules).

41 It is for that reason, and that reason alone, that I would allow this appeal to the extent of setting aside the wider possession order made in the Court of Appeal.

B LORD NEUBERGER OF ABBOTSBURY MR

42 There is an acute shortage of sites in this country to satisfy the needs of travellers, people who prefer a nomadic way of life. Thus, in the county in which the travellers in this case pitched their camp, Dorset, it has been estimated that over 400 additional pitches are required. The inevitable consequence is that travellers establish their camps on land which they are C not entitled to occupy, normally as trespassers, and almost always in breach of planning control. Proceedings seeking to prevent their occupation have led to human rights issues being raised before domestic courts (for instance, in the House of Lords, Doherty v Birmingham City Council (Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government intervening) [2009] 1 AC 367), and before the European Court of Human Rights (for instance, Connors v United Kingdom (2005) 40 EHRR 189). The present appeal, D however, raises issues of purely domestic law, namely the permissible physical ambit of any possession order made against trespassing travellers, and the appropriateness of granting an injunction against them.

The facts and procedural history

43 Travellers often set up their camps in wooded areas. Many woods E and forests in this country are managed by the Forestry Commission and owned by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. The functions of the Commission are "promoting the interests of forestry, the development of afforestation and the production and supply of timber and other forest products . . .": section 1(2) of the Forestry Act 1967. The Commission runs its woods and forests commercially, although it affords members of the public relatively free and unrestricted access to F such areas.

44 All undeveloped land in the United Kingdom is susceptible to unauthorised occupation by travellers, and much of such land is vested in public bodies. But land managed by the Commission is particularly vulnerable to incursion by travellers. As the recorder who heard this case at first instance said, "[given] the public access that it affords to its land and its G needs for access for forestry vehicles, it is not protected and barricaded in the same way as much of the other land in private and local authority ownership in Dorset is now protected".

45 In 2004, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister issued Guidance on Managing Unauthorised Camping. This suggests that local authorities and other public bodies distinguish between unauthorised encampment locations which are "unacceptable" (for instance, because they involve H traffic hazard or public health risks) and those which are "acceptable" (para 5.4). It further recommends that the "management of unauthorised camping must be integrated" (para 4.8), and states that "each encampment location must be considered on its merits" (para 5.4). The 2004 Guidance also indicates that specified welfare inquiries should be undertaken in relation to the travellers and their families in any unauthorised encampment before any decision is made as to whether to bring proceedings to evict them. The Secretary of State has accepted throughout these proceedings that the Commission should comply with the terms of the 2004 Guidance before possession proceedings are brought against any travellers on land it manages, and that failure to do so may invalidate such proceedings.

46 One of the woods managed by the Commission is Hethfelton Wood, near Wool, where, at the end of January 2007, a number of new travellers established an unauthorised camp. After the Commission had carried out the inquiries recommended by the 2004 Guidance, the Secretary of State issued the current proceedings, a possession claim against trespassers within CPR r 55.1(b), and an application for an injunction, in the Poole County Court, on 13 February 2007. The original defendants were Natalie Meier, Robert and Georgie Laidlaw, Sharon Horie and "Persons Names Unknown". Ms Meier travels and lives in a vehicle with her two children, having done so since 2002. Mr Laidlaw sadly died before the hearing, and, unsurprisingly in the circumstances, Mrs Laidlaw appears to have played no part in the proceedings. Ms Horie has pursued a nomadic way of life since about 1982, and lives in vehicles together with her three children. Lesley Rand (who has been a traveller since about 1996, and lives together with her severely disabled nine-year-old daughter in a specially adapted vehicle) and Kirsty Salter (who was pregnant at the time, and has been a traveller for ten years) were subsequently added as defendants.

47 Two of the defendants had previously been encamped on another area of woodland, some five miles from Hethfelton, called Moreton Plantation, which was also managed by the Commission. Following the issue of possession proceedings in relation to Moreton, a compromise was agreed on 9 January 2007, which provided that the Secretary of State should recover possession on 29 January 2007. It was on that day that a number of the defendants moved from Moreton to Hethfelton. Some of the other defendants had previously occupied another wood managed by the Commission, Morden Heath, which had also been subject to proceedings brought by the Secretary of State, which had resulted in a possession order which was due to be executed on 5 February 2007. In anticipation of the execution of that order, those other defendants moved from Morden to Hethfelton.

48 In the claim form in the instant proceedings, the Secretary of State sought possession not only of Hethfelton, but also of "all that land described on the attached schedule all in the county of Dorset". That schedule set out more than 50 separate woods, which were owned by the Secretary of State and managed by the Commission, and which were marked on an attached plan. The number of woods of which possession was sought in addition to Hethfelton was subsequently reduced to 13, and the plan showed that those 13 woods ("the other woods") were spread over an area of Dorset around 25 miles east to west and ten miles north to south. In the injunction application, the Secretary of State sought an order against the same defendants (including "Persons Names Unknown") restraining them "from re-entering [Hethfelton] or from entering [the other woods]". Copies of the claim form seeking possession were served on the named defendants and at Hethfelton in accordance with the provisions of CPR r 55.6, together with copies of the injunction application.

49 The evidence established that all the occupiers of the camp at Hethfelton were new travellers, living and travelling in motor vehicles, mostly with children and often with animals. The evidence also indicated that the camp was relatively tidy, and did not involve any antisocial conduct on the part of any of the occupants. However, the presence of children and animals caused the Commission to avoid the use of heavy plant or the carrying out of substantial work, which might otherwise have occurred, in the surrounding area. The Commission's evidence showed that other areas in Dorset managed by the Commission, in addition to Hethfelton, including Moreton and Morden, had been occupied by travellers as unauthorised camps, sometimes by one or more of the named defendants.

B

50 The claim came before Mr Recorder Norman, who gave a full and careful judgment on 3 August 2007. He had to resolve three issues. The first was whether to grant an order for possession against the defendants in respect of Hethfelton. The second issue was whether to grant an order for possession in respect of any or all of the other woods. The third issue was whether to grant an injunction restraining the defendants from entering on to all or any of the other woods.

C

51 The recorder decided to grant an order for possession against the defendants in respect of Hethfelton. However, he refused to make any wider order for possession, or to grant the injunction sought by the Secretary of State. Although he accepted that he had jurisdiction to make such orders, he considered it inappropriate to do so primarily because the Commission had failed to consider the matters suggested by the 2004 Guidance before the current proceedings were begun, and because the Commission was not prepared to assure the recorder that consideration would be given to that guidance before any wider order for possession or any injunction was enforced. Paragraph 1 of the order drawn up to reflect this decision provided that "[the] claimant do forthwith recover the land known as Hethfelton Wood".

52 The defendants did not appeal against this order for possession. However, the Secretary of State appealed against the recorder's refusal to grant an order for possession in relation to the other woods (which I will refer to as a "wider order for possession") and the injunction, and the Court of Appeal [2009] 1 WLR 828 allowed the appeal. The order made by the Court of Appeal ordered that the Secretary of State "do recover" the other woods, and that each of the defendants "be restrained from entering upon, trespassing upon, living on, or occupying" any of the other woods.

F

53 In her judgment, Arden LJ followed and applied the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in the earlier decision of Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Drury [2004] 1 WLR 1906, under which it had been held that an order for possession, at least when made pursuant to a possession claim against trespassers, could, in appropriate cases, extend to land not forming part of, or contiguous with, or even near, the land actually occupied by the trespassers. She concluded that the evidence demonstrated that at least some of the defendants had set up unauthorised encampments on woods managed by the Commission in Dorset, and that there was a substantial risk that at least some of the defendants would move on to other such woods once an order for possession was made in relation to Hethfelton.

H

54 Arden LJ also said, in disagreement with the recorder, that any failure on the part of the Commission to consider the matters recommended by the 2004 Guidance before issuing the proceedings for possession of the other woods did not justify refusing to make such a wider order. This was essentially on the basis that, if there was any such failure, it could be considered at the time the wider order for possession was sought to be enforced. Pill LJ and Wilson LJ agreed. Arden LJ also considered that, for the same reasons, the recorder had been wrong to refuse the injunction sought by the Secretary of State, and again Pill LJ agreed. However, Wilson LJ dissented on this point, on the ground that the recorder had been entitled to refuse an injunction on the additional ground which he had mentioned, namely that, if he had made a wider order for possession, it would have been disproportionate to grant an injunction as well.

55 The instant appeal is brought by Ms Horie and Ms Rand, and it raises two principal issues. The first is the extent to which an order for possession can be made in favour of a claimant in respect of land not actually occupied by a defendant. The second issue concerns the circumstances in which an injunction restraining future trespass can and should be granted; this raises two points: (a) whether an injunction against travellers is generally appropriate, and (b) the point on which the Court of Appeal differed from the recorder, namely the effect of the 2004 Guidance. I shall consider these two issues in turn and then briefly review the implications of my conclusions.

An order for possession of land not occupied by the defendants

56 In the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906, the facts were similar to those here, except the Court of Appeal held that there was no evidence establishing that the travellers in that case had occupied, or threatened to occupy, other property managed by the Commission. Accordingly, the order for possession was in the normal form, limited, like the order made by the recorder in this case, to the wood occupied by the travellers. However, the Court of Appeal decided that an order for possession could be granted, not merely in respect of land which the defendant occupied, but also in respect of other land which was owned by the claimant, and which the defendant threatened to occupy.

57 The essence of the Court of Appeal's reasoning was that (a) the law recognises that an anticipated trespass can give rise to a right of action; (b) an injunction would be of limited, if any, real use; (c) in those circumstances, the law should provide another remedy; (d) a wider order for possession would be of much more practical value than an injunction; (e) such an order for possession was justified by previous authority and in the light of the court's jurisdiction to grant quia timet injunctions; and (f) accordingly, such an order could be made; but (g) it should only be made in relatively exceptional circumstances: see at paras 20–24, 34–36 and 42–46, per Wilson J, Mummery LJ and Ward LJ respectively.

58 Particularly with the advent of the Civil Procedure Rules, it is clear that judges should strive to ensure that court procedures are efficacious, and that, where there is a threatened or actual wrong, there should be an effective remedy to prevent it or to remedy it. Further, as Lady Hale points out, so long as landowners are entitled to evict trespassers physically, judges should ensure that the more attractive and civilised option of court proceedings is as

A quick and efficacious as legally possible. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal was plainly right to seek to identify an effective remedy for the problem faced by the Commission as a result of unauthorised encampments, namely that, when a possession order is made in respect of one wood, the travellers simply move on to another wood, requiring the Commission to incur the cost, effort and delay of bringing a series or potentially endless series of possession proceedings against the same people.

B 59 None the less, however desirable it is to fashion or develop a remedy to meet a particular problem, courts have to act within the law, and their ability to control procedure and achieve justice is not unlimited. Judges are not legislators, and there comes a point where, in order to deal with a particular problem, court rules and practice cannot be developed by the courts, but have to be changed by primary or secondary legislation—or, in C so far as they can be invoked for that purpose, by practice directions. In my view, it is simply not possible to make the sort of enlarged or wider order for possession which the Court of Appeal made in this case, following (as it was, I think, bound to do) the reasoning in the Drury case.

60 The power of the county court for present purposes derives from section 21(1) of the County Courts Act 1984, which gives it "jurisdiction to D hear and determine any action for the recovery of land". The concept of "recovery" of land was the essence of a possession order both before and after the procedure was recast by sections 168 et seq of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, although, until the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, the action lay in ejectment rather than in recovery of land: see per Lord Denning MR in McPhail v Persons, Names Unknown [1973] Ch 447, E 457–458. None the less, the change of name did not involve a change of substance, and the essence of an order for possession, whether framed in ejectment or recovery, is that the claimant is getting back the property from the defendant, whether by recovering the property from the defendant or because the claimant had been wrongly ejected by the defendant. As stated by Wonnacott, in Possession of Land, p 22, "an action for recovery of land (ejectment) is an action to be put into possession of an estate in land. The F complaint is that the claimant is not currently 'in' possession of it, and . . . wants . . . to be put 'in' possession of it". See also Simpson, A History of the Land Law, 2nd ed (1986), pp 144–145 and Gledhill v Hunter (1880) 14 Ch D 492, 496, per Sir George Jessel MR.

61 As Sir George Jessel MR explained, an action for ejectment and its successor, recovery of land, was normally issued "to recover possession from G a tenant" or former tenant. An action against a trespasser, who did not actually dispossess the person entitled to possession, was based on trespass quare clausum fregit, physical intrusion on to the land. Nonetheless, where a trespasser exclusively occupies land, so as to oust the person entitled to possession, the cause of action must be for recovery of possession. (Hence, if such an action is not brought within 12 years the ousting trespasser will often have acquired title by "adverse possession".) Accordingly, in cases H where a trespasser is actually in possession of land, an action for recovery of land, ie, for possession, is appropriate, as Lord Denning MR implicitly accepted in McPhail v Persons, Names Unknown [1973] Ch 447, 457–458.

62 This analysis is substantially reflected in the provisions of the Civil Procedure Rules and in the currently prescribed form of order for possession. CPR Pt 55 is concerned with possession claims, and CPR r 55.1 provides:

> "(a) 'a possession claim' means a claim for the recovery of possession of land (including buildings or parts of buildings); (b) 'a possession claim against trespassers' means a claim for the recovery of land which the claimant alleges is occupied only by a person or persons who entered or remained on the land without the consent of a person entitled to possession of that land but does not include a claim against a tenant or sub-tenant whether his tenancy has been terminated or not . . ."

The special features of a possession claim against trespassers are that the defendants to the claim may include "persons unknown", such proceedings should be served on the land as well as on the named defendants, and the minimum period between service and hearing is two days (or five days for residential property) rather than the 28 days for other possession claims: see CPR rr 55.3(4), 55.6, and 55.5(2) and (3).

63 The drafting of CPR r 55.1 is rather peculiar in that, unlike that in rule 55.1(a), the definition in rule 55.1(b) does not include the word "possession". Given that, since 1875, the cause of action has been for recovery of land, the oddity, as Lord Rodger has pointed out, is the inclusion of the word "possession" in the former paragraph, rather than its exclusion in the latter. However, in so far as the point has any significance, the definition of "a possession claim", like the definition of "land", in rule 55.1(a) may well be carried into sub-rule (b). In any event, the important point, to my mind, is that a possession claim against trespassers involves the person "entitled to possession" seeking "recovery" of the land. Form N26 is the prescribed form of order in both a simple possession claim and a possession claim against trespassers: see Civil Procedure 2009, vol 1, p 114, para 4PD-003, table 1. That form orders the defendant to "give the claimant possession" of the land in question. Although the orders at first instance (as drafted by counsel), and in the Court of Appeal, direct that the claimant do "recover" the land in question from the defendants, that is the mirror image of ordering that the defendants "give" the claimant possession.

64 The notion that an order for possession may be sought by a claimant and made against defendants in respect of land which is wholly detached and separated, possibly by many miles, from that occupied by the defendants, accordingly seems to me to be difficult, indeed impossible, to justify. The defendants do not occupy or possess such land in any conceivable way, and the claimant enjoys uninterrupted possession of it. Equally, the defendants have not ejected the claimant from such land. For the same reasons, it does not make sense to talk about the claimant recovering possession of such land, or to order the defendant to deliver up possession of such land.

65 This does not mean that, where trespassers are encamped in part of a wood, an order for possession cannot be made against them in respect of the whole of the wood (at least if there are no other occupants of the wood), just as much as an order for possession may extend to a whole house where the defendant is only trespassing in one room (at least if the rest of the house is empty).

66 However, the fact that an order for possession may be made in respect of the whole of a piece of property, when the defendant is only in occupation of part and the remainder is empty, does not appear to me to

A assist the argument in favour of a wider possession order as made by the Court of Appeal in this case. Self-help is a remedy still available, in principle, to a landowner against trespassers (other than former residential tenants). Where only part of his property is occupied by trespassers, a landowner, exercising that remedy through privately instructed bailiffs, would, no doubt, be entitled to evict the trespassers from the whole of his property. Similarly, it seems to me, bailiffs (or sheriffs), who are required by a warrant B (or writ) of possession to evict defendants from part of a property owned by the claimant, would be entitled to remove the defendants from the whole of that property. But that does not mean that the bailiffs, whether privately instructed or acting pursuant to a warrant, could restrain the trespassers from moving on to another property, perhaps miles away, owned by the claimant.

C 67 Further, the concept of occupying part of property (the remainder of which is vacant) effectively in the name of the whole is well established: see, for example, albeit in a landlord and tenant context, Henderson v Squire (1869) LR 4 QB 170, 172. However, that concept cannot be extended to apply to land wholly distinct, even miles away, from the occupied land. So, too, the fact that one can treat land as a single entity if it is divided by a road or river (in different ownership from the land) seems to me to be an D irrelevance: as a matter of law and fact, the two divisions can sensibly be regarded as a single piece of land. Accordingly, I have no difficulty with the fact that the possession order made at first instance in this case extended to the whole of Hethfelton, even though the defendants occupied only a part of it.

68 The position is more problematical where a defendant trespasses on E part of land, the rest of which is physically occupied by a third party, or even by the landowner. Particular difficulties in this connection are, to my mind, raised in relation to a wide order for possession in a claim within CPR r 55.1(b). Such "a claim" may be brought "for the recovery of land which the claimant alleges is occupied only by a person or persons who entered or remained on the land without . . . consent . . ." Given that such a claim is limited to "land . . . occupied only by" trespassers, it is not F immediately easy to see how it could be brought, even in part, in relation to land occupied by persons who are not trespassers. And it is fundamental that the court cannot accord a claimant more relief than he seeks (although it is, of course, possible, in appropriate circumstances, for a claimant to amend to increase the extent of his claim, but that is not relevant here).

69 The Court of Appeal in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] G 1 WLR 1301 nonetheless decided that a university could be granted a possession order under RSC Ord 113, r 1, which was (in relation to the issue in this case) in similar terms to CPR r 55(1)(b), in respect of its whole campus, against trespassers who were squatting in a relatively small part, even though the remainder of the campus was lawfully occupied by academics, other employees, and indeed students. This was a thoroughly practical decision arrived at to deal with a fairly widespread problem at the H time, namely student sit-ins. There was an obvious fear that, if an order for possession was limited to the rooms occupied by the student trepassers, they would simply move to another part of the campus.

70 As already mentioned, given that there is the alternative remedy of self-help, the court should ensure that its procedures are as effective as lawfully possible. Nonetheless, there is obviously great force in the argument that the fact that areas of the campus in that case was lawfully and exclusively occupied by academic staff, employees and students should have precluded a claim and an order for possession in respect of those areas, both in principle and in the light of the wording of RSC Ord 113, r 1. A

71 However, this is not the occasion formally to consider the correctness of the decision in the Djemal case [1980] 1 WLR 1301, which was not put in issue by either of the parties, as the Secretary of State (like the Court of Appeal in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906) relied on it, and the defendants were content to distinguish it. Accordingly, the implications of overruling or explaining the decision, which may be far-reaching in terms of principle and practice, have not been debated or canvassed. B

72 The Court of Appeal's conclusion in the Drury case, that the court could make a wider order for possession such as that in the instant case, rested very much on the reasoning in the Djemal case [1980] 1 WLR 1306, and in the subsequent first instance decision of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food v Heyman (1989) 59 P & CR 48, which represented an "incremental development of the ruling in [the Djemal case]", as Mummery LJ [2004] 1 WLR 1906, para 35 put it. However, it seems to me that the decision in the Drury case was an illegitimate extension of the reasoning and decision in the Djemal case. The fact that an order for possession can be made in respect of a single piece of land, only part of which is occupied by trespassers, does not justify the conclusion that an order for possession can be made in respect of two entirely separate pieces of land, only one of which is occupied by trespassers, just because both pieces of land happen to be in common ownership. As already mentioned, bailiffs, whether acting on instructions from a landowner exercising the right of self-help to evict a trespasser or acting pursuant to a warrant of possession, can remove the trespasser on part of a piece of property from the whole of that property, but they cannot prevent him from entering a different property, possibly many miles away. Similarly, while it is acceptable, at least in some circumstances, to treat occupation of part of property as amounting to occupation of the whole of that property, one cannot treat occupation of one property as amounting to occupation of another, entirely separate, property, possibly miles away, simply because the two properties are in the same ownership. C D E F

73 Having said all that, I accept that the notion of a wider, effectively precautionary, order for possession as made in the Drury case has obvious attraction in practice. As the Court of Appeal explained in that case, the alternative to a wider possession order, namely an injunction restraining the defendant from camping in other woods in the area, would be of limited efficacy. An order for possession is normally enforced in the county court by applying for a warrant of possession under CPR Sch 2, CCR Ord 26, which involves the occupiers being removed from the land by the bailiffs. (The equivalent in the High Court is a writ of possession executed by the sheriff under RSC Ord 45, r 3). This is a procedurally direct and simple method of enforcement. An injunction, however, "may be enforced", and that was treated by the court in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906 as meaning "may only be enforced", by sequestration or committal: see RSC Ord 45, r 5(1) and, in relation to the county court, CPR Sch 2, CCR Ord 29 and section 38 of the County Courts Act 1984. Given that the claimant's aim is G H

A to evict the travellers, those are unsatisfactory remedies compared with applying for a warrant of possession. They are not only indirect, but they are normally procedurally unwieldy and time-consuming, and, in any event, they are of questionable value in cases against travellers, as explained in the next section of this opinion.

B 74 There is also some apparent force as a matter of principle in the notion that the courts should be able to grant a precautionary wider order for possession. If judges have developed the concept of an injunction which restrains a defendant from doing something he has not yet done, but is threatening to do, why, it might be asked, should they now not develop an order for possession which requires a defendant to deliver up possession of land that he has not yet occupied, but is threatening to occupy? The short answer is that a wider or precautionary order for possession, whether C in the form granted in this case or in the prescribed Form N26, requires a defendant to do something he cannot do, namely to deliver up possession of land he does not occupy, and purports to return to the claimant something he has not lost, namely possession of land of which already he has possession.

D 75 What the claimant is really seeking in the present case is an order that, if the defendant goes on to the other woods, the claimant should be entitled to possession. That is really in the nature of declaratory or injunctive relief: it is not an order for possession. A declaration identifies the parties' rights and obligations. A quia timet injunction involves the court forbidding the defendant from doing something which he may do and which he would not entitled to do. Both those types of relief are different from what the Court of Appeal intended to grant here, namely a contingent order E requiring the defendant to do something (to deliver up possession) if he does something else (trespassing) which he may do and which he would not be entitled to do. I describe the Court of Appeal as intending to grant such an order, because, as just explained, the actual order is in the form of an immediate order for possession of the other woods, which, as I have mentioned, is also hard to justify, given that the defendants were not in occupation of any part of them.

F 76 Further, while it would be beneficial to be able to make a wider possession order because of the relative ease with which it could be enforced in the event of the defendants trespassing on other woods, such an order would not be without its disadvantages and limitations. An order for possession only binds those persons who are parties to the proceedings (and their privies), although the bailiffs (and sheriffs) are obliged to execute G a warrant (or writ) of possession against all those in occupation: see In re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, Ex p Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association for the South East [1971] Ch 204, 209–210; R v Wandsworth County Court, Ex p Wandsworth London Borough Council [1975] 1 WLR 1314, 1317–1319; Thompson v Elmbridge Borough Council [1987] 1 WLR 1425, 1431–1432; and the full discussion in Wonnacott, Possession of Land, pp 146–152. It would therefore be wrong H in principle for the court to make a wider order for possession against trespassers (whether named or not) in one wood with a view to its being executed against other trespassers in other woods. None the less, because the warrant must be executed against anyone on the land, there is either a risk of one or more of the occupiers of another wood being evicted without having the benefit of due process, or room for delay while such an occupier applies to the court and is heard before a warrant is executed against him.

77 Quite apart from this, a warrant of possession to execute an order for possession made in the county court in a claim for possession against trespassers can only be issued without leave within three months of the order: CPR Sch 2, CCR Ord 24, r 6(2). So, after the expiry of three months, a wider possession order does not obviate the need for the claimant applying to the court before he can obtain possession of any land the subject of the order. Further, as pointed out by Wilson J in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906, para 22, it seems rather arbitrary that only a person who owns land which is being unlawfully occupied can obtain a wider order for possession protecting all his land in a particular area.

78 In conclusion on this issue, while there is considerable practical attraction in the notion that the court should be able to make the wide type of possession order which the Court of Appeal made in this case, following the Drury case, I do not consider that the court has such power. It is inconsistent with the nature of a possession order, and with the relevant provisions governing the powers of the court. The reasoning in the case on which it is primarily based, University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301, cannot sensibly be extended to justify the making of a wider possession order, and there are aspects of such an order which would be unsatisfactory. I should add that I have read what Lord Rodger has to say on this, the main, issue, and I agree with him.

Should an injunction be refused as it will probably not be enforced?

79 That brings me to the question whether an injunction restraining travellers from trespassing on other land should be granted in circumstances such as the present. Obviously, the decision whether or not to grant an order restraining a person from trespassing will turn very much on the precise facts of the case. None the less, where a trespass to the claimant's property is threatened, and particularly where a trespass is being committed, and has been committed in the past, by the defendant, an injunction to restrain the threatened trespass would, in the absence of good reasons to the contrary, appear to be appropriate.

80 However, as Lord Walker said during argument, the court should not normally make orders which it does not intend, or will be unable, to enforce. In a case such as the present, if the defendants had disobeyed an injunction not to trespass on any of the other woods, it seems highly unlikely that the two methods of enforcement prescribed by CPR Sch 2, CCR Ord 29 and section 38 of the County Courts Act 1984 (RSC Ord 45, r 5(1) in the High Court) would be invoked. The defendants presumably have no significant assets apart from their means of transport, which are also their homes, so sequestration would be pointless or oppressive. And many of the defendants are vulnerable, and most of them have young children, so imprisonment may very well be disproportionate. In South Bucks District Council v Porter [2003] 2 AC 558 local planning authorities were seeking injunctions to restrain gipsies from remaining on land in breach of planning law, and Lord Bingham of Cornhill said, at para 32, that "[t]he court should ordinarily be slow to make an order which it would not . . . be willing, if need be, to enforce by imprisonment".

A 81 On the other hand, in the same paragraph of his opinion, Lord Bingham also said that "[a]pprehension that a party may disobey an order should not deter the court from making an order otherwise appropriate". A court may consider it unlikely that it would make an order for sequestration or imprisonment, if an injunction it was being invited to grant were to be breached, but it may none the less properly decide to grant the injunction. Thus, the court may take the view that the defendants are more B likely not to trespass on the claimant's land if an injunction is granted, because of their respect for a court order, or because of their fear of the repercussions of breaching such an order. Or the court may think that an order of imprisonment for breach, while unlikely, would nonetheless be a real possibility, or it may think that a suspended order of imprisonment, in the event of breach, may well be a deterrent (although a suspended order C should not be made if the court does not anticipate activating the order if the terms of suspension are breached).

82 It was suggested in argument that, if a defendant established an unauthorised camp in a wood which, in earlier proceedings, he had been enjoined from occupying, the court would be likely to be sympathetic to an application by the Commission to abridge even the short time limits in CPR r 55.5(2). However, as Lord Rodger observed, if the court D were satisfied that a defendant was moving from unauthorised site to unauthorised site on woods managed by the Commission, an abridgement of time limits might be thought to be appropriate anyway. Quite apart from this, if the only reason for granting an injunction restraining a defendant from trespassing in other woods was to assist the Commission in obtaining possession of any of those other woods should the defendant camp in them, E it seems to me that this could be catered for by declaratory relief. For instance, the court could grant a declaration that the Commission is in possession of those other woods and the defendant has no right to dispossess it.

83 In some cases, it may be inappropriate to grant an injunction to restrain a trespassing on land unless the court considers not only that there is a real risk of the defendants so trespassing, but also that there is at least a F real prospect of enforcing the injunction if it is breached. However, even where there appears to be little prospect of enforcing the injunction by imprisonment or sequestration, it may be appropriate to grant it because the judge considers that the grant of an injunction could have a real deterrent effect on the particular defendants. If the judge considers that some relief would be appropriate only because it could well assist the claimant in G obtaining possession of such land if the defendants commit the threatened trespass, then a declaration would appear to me to be more appropriate than an injunction.

84 In the present case, neither the recorder nor the Court of Appeal appears to have concluded that an injunction should be refused on the ground that it would not be enforced by imprisonment or because it would have no real value. Although it may well be that a case could have been (and H may well have been) developed along those lines, it was not adopted by the recorder, and clearly did not impress the Court of Appeal. In those circumstances, it seems to me that it is not appropriate for this court to set aside the injunction unless satisfied that it was plainly wrong to grant it, or that there was an error of principle in the reasoning which led to its grant.

It does not appear to me that either of those points has been established in this case.

The effect of the 2004 Guidance on the grant of an injunction

85 The recorder considered that it was inappropriate to grant an injunction in favour of the Secretary of State because the Commission had not complied with the 2004 Guidance in relation to the other woods before issuing the proceedings, and would not give an assurance that it would comply with the 2004 Guidance before it enforced the injunction. The Court of Appeal considered that the injunction could nonetheless be granted, as the issue of the Commission's compliance with the 2004 Guidance could be considered before the injunction was enforced.

86 As I have already mentioned, it has been conceded by the Secretary of State throughout these proceedings that the Commission is obliged to comply with the 2004 Guidance, and that failure to do so may vitiate its right to possession against travellers trespassing on land it manages. On that basis, there is some initial attraction in the defendants' argument that, if the 2004 Guidance ought to be complied with before the injunction is enforced, it would be inappropriate to grant the injunction before the Guidance was complied with. After all, now the injunction has been granted, the defendants would be in contempt of court and prone to imprisonment (once the appropriate procedures had been complied with) if they encamped on any of the other woods.

87 However, I am of the opinion that the Court of Appeal was right to conclude that, even in the light of the Secretary of State's concession, the 2004 Guidance did not present an obstacle to the granting of an injunction in this case. The Guidance is concerned with steps to be taken in relation to existing unauthorised encampments: it is not concerned with preventing such encampments from being established in the first place. The recommended procedures in the 2004 Guidance were relevant to the question of whether an order for possession should be made against the defendants in respect of their existing encampment on Hethfelton. However, quite apart from the fact that they are merely aspects of a non-statutory code of guidance, those recommendations are not directly relevant to the issue of whether the defendants should be barred from setting up a camp on other land managed by the Commission. Accordingly, I do not see how it could have justified an attack on the lawfulness of the Secretary of State seeking an injunction to restrain the defendants from setting up such unauthorised camps. At least on the basis of the concession to which I have referred, I incline to the view that the existence and provisions of the 2004 Guidance could be taken into account by the court when considering whether to grant an injunction and when fashioning the terms of any injunction. However, I prefer to leave the point open, as it was, understandably, not much discussed in argument before us.

88 Even if the 2004 Guidance was of relevance to the issue of whether the injunction should be granted, it seems to me that it could not be decisive. Otherwise, it would mean that such an injunction could never be granted, because it would not be possible to carry out up-to-date welfare inquiries in relation to defendants who might not move on to a wood which they were enjoined from occupying for several months, or, conceivably, even several years, after the order was made. As Arden LJ held, particularly bearing in

A mind that it purports to be no more than guidance, the effect and purpose of the 2004 Guidance is simply not strong enough to displace the Secretary of State's right to seek the assistance of the court to prevent a legal right being infringed. Further, the fact that welfare inquiries were made in relation to the defendants' occupation of Hethfelton by social services means that the more significant investigations required by the 2004 Guidance had been carried out anyway.

B 89 Following questions from Lady Hale, it transpired for the first time in these proceedings that, at the time of the issue of the claim, the Commission had (and has) a detailed procedural code which is intended to apply when there are travellers unlawfully on its land, and that this code substantially followed the 2004 Guidance. It therefore appears that the Commission has considered the 2004 Guidance and promulgated a code which takes its C contents into account. On that basis, unless it could be shown in a particular case that the code had been ignored, it appears to me that the Commission's decision to evict travellers could not be unlawful on the ground relied on by the defendants in this case. However, it appears to me that failure to comply with non-statutory guidance would be unlikely to render a decision unlawful, although failure to have regard to the Guidance could do so.

90 If the defendants were to trespass on to land covered by the D injunction, the Commission would presumably comply with its code before seeking to enforce the injunction. If it did not do so, then, if justified on the facts of a particular case, there may (at least if the Commission's concession is correct) be room for argument that, in seeking to enforce the injunction against travellers who have set up a camp in breach of an injunction, the Secretary of State was acting unlawfully. It is true that this means that, in a E case such as this, a defendant who trespasses in breach of an injunction may be at risk of imprisonment before the Commission has complied with the 2004 Guidance. However, where imprisonment is sought and where it would otherwise be a realistic prospect, the defendant could argue at the committal hearing that the injunction should not be enforced, even that it should be discharged, on the ground that the recommendations in the 2004 Guidance have not been followed.

F 91 Accordingly, on this point, I conclude that, even assuming (in accordance with the Secretary of State's concession) that the Commission's failure to comply with the 2004 Guidance may deter the court from making an order for possession against travellers, it should not preclude the granting of an injunction to restrain travellers from trespassing on other land. However, at least in a case where it could be shown that the claimant should G have considered the 2004 Guidance, but did not do so, the Guidance could conceivably be relevant to the question whether an injunction should be granted (and if so on what terms), and, if the injunction is breached, to the question of whether or not it should be enforced (and, if so, how). In the event, therefore, the grant of an injunction was appropriate as Arden LJ and Pill LJ concluded (and the only reason Wilson LJ thought otherwise, namely the existence of the wider possession order, no longer applies).

H

The implications of this analysis

92 As I have explained, the thinking of the Court of Appeal in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906 proceeded on the basis that an injunction restraining trespass to land could only be enforced by sequestration or imprisonment. In the light of the terms of CPR Sch 1, RSC Ord 45, r 5(1), this may very well be right. Certainly, in the light of the contrast between the terms of that rule and the terms of CPR Sch 1, RSC Ord 45, r 3(1) and CPR Sch 2, CCR Ord 26, r 17(1) (which respectively provide for writs and warrants of possession only to enforce orders for possession), it is hard to see how a warrant of possession in the county court or a writ of possession in the High Court could be sought by a claimant, where such an injunction was breached.

93 However, where, after the grant of such an injunction (or, indeed, a declaration), a defendant entered on to the land in question, it is, I think, conceivable that, at least in the High Court, the claimant could apply for a writ of restitution, ordering the sheriff or bailiffs to recover possession of the land for the benefit of the claimant. Such a writ is often described as one of the "writs in aid of" other writs, such as a writ of possession or a writ of delivery: see for instance CPR Sch 1, RSC Ord 46, r 1. Restitution is normally the means of obtaining possession against a defendant (or his privy) who has gone back into possession after having been evicted pursuant to a court order. It appears that it can also be invoked against a claimant who has obtained possession pursuant to a court order which is subsequently set aside (normally on appeal): see Civil Procedure 2009, vol 1, p 2099, para sc 46.3.3. Historically at any rate, a writ of restitution could also be sought against a person who had gone into possession by force: see Cole on Ejectment, pp 692–694. So there may be an argument that such a writ may be sought by a claimant against a defendant who has entered on to the land after an injunction has been granted restraining him from doing so, or even after a declaration has been made that the claimant is, and the defendant is not, entitled to possession. It may also be the case that it is open to the county court to issue a warrant of restitution in such circumstances.

94 Whether a writ or warrant of restitution would be available to support such an injunction or declaration, and whether the present procedural rules governing the enforcement of injunctions against trespass on facts such as those in the present case are satisfactory, seem to me to be questions which are ripe for consideration by the Civil Procedure Rule Committee. The precise ambit of the circumstances in which a writ or warrant of restitution may be sought is somewhat obscure, and could usefully be clarified. Further, if, as I have concluded, it is not open to the court to grant a wider order for possession, as was granted by the Court of Appeal in the Drury case [2004] 1 WLR 1906 and in this case, then it appears likely that there may very well be defects in the procedural powers of the courts of England and Wales. Where a person threatens to trespass on land, an injunction may well be of rather little, if any, real practical value if the person is someone against whom an order for sequestration or imprisonment is unlikely to be made, and an order for possession is not one which is open to the court. In addition, it seems to me that it may be worth considering whether the current court rules satisfactorily deal with circumstances such as those which were considered in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1WLR 1306.

Disposal of this appeal

95 Accordingly, it follows that, for my part, I would allow the defendants' appeal to the extent of setting aside the wider possession order

A made by the Court of Appeal, but dismiss their appeal to the extent of upholding the injunction granted by the Court of Appeal.

LORD COLLINS OF MAPESBURY JSC

96 At the end of the argument my inclination was to the conclusion that in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Drury [2004] 1 WLR 1906, the Court of Appeal had legitimately extended B University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 to fashion an exceptional remedy to deal with cases of the present kind. I was particularly impressed by the point that an injunction might be a remedy which was not capable of being employed effectively in cases such as this. But I am now convinced that there is no legitimate basis for making an order for possession in an action for the recovery of wholly distinct land of which the defendant is not C in possession.

97 But in my opinion University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 represented a sensible and practical solution to the problem faced by the university, and was correctly decided. I agree, in particular, that it can be justified on the basis that the university's right to possession of its campus was indivisible, as Lord Rodger says, or that the remedy is available to a person whose possession or occupation has been interfered with, as Lady D Hale puts it. Where the defendant is occupying part of the claimant's premises, the order for possession may extend to the whole of the premises. First, it has been pointed out, rightly, that the courts have used the concept of possession in differing contexts as a functional and relative concept in order to do justice and to effectuate the social purpose of the legal rules in which possession (or, I would add, deprivation of possession) is a necessary E element: Harris, "The Concept of Possession in English Law", in Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (ed Guest, 1961) p 69, at p 72. Secondly, the procedural powers of the court are subject to incremental change in order to adapt to the new circumstances: see, eg, in relation to the power to grant injunctions, Fourie v Le Roux [2007] 1 WLR 320, para 30 and Masri v Consolidated Contractors International (UK) Ltd (No 2) [2009] QB 450, para 182.

F 98 I would therefore allow the appeal to the extent of setting aside the wider possession order.

Appeal allowed in part.

J U D G M E N T
MR JUSTICE HENDERSON:

1. I have before me an application brought by the School of Oriental and African Studies ("SOAS"), seeking possession on an urgent basis of part of its campus known as the Brunei Suite, which is on the ground floor of the Brunei Gallery which is one of the principal buildings comprising the London campus of the school. The matter first came before me yesterday morning on a without notice application for a possession order sought against persons unknown, including students of SOAS who have been in occupation of the Brunei Suite since about noon on Monday of this week, conducting a "sit-in" as part of their protest against the Coalition Government's spending plans in relation to higher education. I gave permission yesterday for short notice of the effective hearing under CPR Part 55 to be given with an immediate return time of 3.30 in the afternoon, and the notice indicated that the return would take place before myself in this court.

2. In due course I will come on to what I was told yesterday afternoon, but in order to set the background I will first refer to some of the evidence in the first witness statement of Mr Richard John Poulson in support of the application. He is the Director of Estates and Facilities of SOAS, which forms part of the University of London and is a leading world centre for the study of a diverse range of subjects concerned with Asia, Africa and the Middle East. It currently has more than 4,400 students, 40 of whom are on postgraduate or research programmes. The main campus of the school is in the vicinity of Russell Square in London. A plan shows that there are three main buildings which are separated either by a courtyard with trees or roads, but they are all within a short distance of each other, and one of those three main buildings is the Brunei Gallery, of which the Brunei Suite forms part.

3. The school itself is a private charitable body and holds the premises under a lease granted to it by London University. It is convenient at this point to refer to some of the provisions in the lease, which was granted on 12 May 1993 for a term of 98 years beginning on that date. The permitted user of the premises was any purpose within paragraphs (c) and (d) of Class D1 of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1987 as in force at the date of the lease. The relevant use class – I do not have the text in front of me at the moment – is, in short, use for educational purposes.

4. There are, as one would expect, a number of covenants on the part of SOAS, including the user covenant (which I have already mentioned), and a covenant against causing any form of nuisance in clause 4.17, including not to do anything which may be or become a nuisance or which may cause damage, annoyance, inconvenience or disturbance to the landlord, or which may be injurious to the value, tone, amenity or character of the demised premises. There are also covenants not to use any part of the demised premises for residential or sleeping purposes in clause 4.15, and a number of provisions relating to alienation in clause 4.20, including a covenant not to part with the possession or share the occupation of the whole or any part or parts of the demised premises, or to permit any person to occupy them, save by way of an assignment or underlease.

5. Since the SOAS campus is private land, it follows, as a matter of basic English property law, that the only persons who may enter upon the campus are people who have the licence or consent of SOAS. For normal purposes, of course, the students who are enrolled at SOAS have the permission of SOAS to be on the campus for the purposes of their education in the broadest sense of that term.

6. The particular protest with which this application is concerned began at about noon on Monday 22 November, when, according to the undisputed evidence of Mr Poulson, around 20 people took up occupation of the Brunei Suite, which Mr Poulson describes as a conference facility situated on the ground floor of the Brunei Gallery, and indicated their intention to remain in occupation as a protest against the Coalition Government's plans to increase undergraduate fees and make associated cuts to the education budget. The protestors had issued a list of demands and they have tried to negotiate with SOAS, but it is the stated policy of SOAS only to negotiate with the Student Union. Although negotiations have been in progress with the Student Union, SOAS has declined to negotiate with the particular students who are carrying on the occupation.

7. The protestors have sought support from a number of sources, including other students, members of staff, the wider University of London student body, and some political figures. However, the basic ground upon which the possession order is sought is the property rights of SOAS to have occupation of its own premises and to prevent unlawful trespass. SOAS says that the students who are conducting the sit-in are trespassers, because they have no right or licence to occupy the Brunei Suite to the exclusion of the school, and they most certainly have no right to sleep there or to control who has access to the premises.

E

8. In this context, I was referred to the regulations for students at SOAS, which are exhibited to Mr Poulson's witness statement and which provide in paragraph 9.1 under the heading "Student discipline":

F

"No student of the School shall engage in activity likely to interfere in the broadest sense with the proper functioning or activities of the School or those who work or study in the School or undertake action which otherwise damages the School."

G

It appears clear to me that conducting a sit-in on part of the school's premises is to engage in an activity which is likely to interfere in the broadest sense with the proper functioning and activities of the school, and with those who work or study there. That appears to me obvious as a matter of common sense, but is in any event borne out by the detailed evidence which Mr Poulson has adduced in his witness statement of yesterday and in a further witness statement which he has produced today.

9. To revert to his first statement, he sets out a number of concerns which SOAS has. He highlights the risk to health and safety as a result of the unauthorised occupation, and the encouragement given to others to join in the protest. He says there is a general risk to the building from the occupation, which may worsen if the protestors continue in occupation any longer. A particular concern was the large rally which took place yesterday and began at Malet Street, very close to the Brunei Gallery. That rally has, of course, now taken place, and it is only fair to record that it did not result in any incursion into the Brunei Gallery. Nevertheless, I think the school's concern on that score was understandable, although happily events have shown that it was, I will not say misplaced, but did not lead to anything untoward.

B

10. SOAS is also concerned that the current protest may escalate and may lead to confrontation, and that the premises which have been occupied are not designed to hold substantial public gatherings. Again I think it is fair to say that so far there has been no dangerous overcrowding, at least none of which I have been made aware, but the possibility does seem to me to be there, particularly given the avowed intention of the occupying students for the occupation to continue and grow in size and become a focus for possible future events. It is worth noting in this context that the next day of action against the Government's fee policy for higher education is scheduled for next Tuesday, 30 November.

11. The Brunei Suite is described by Mr Poulson as being a meeting and hospitality venue with a capacity limited to between 120 and 200 people, depending upon how it is configured.

E

12. That, in outline, was the evidence relied upon by SOAS yesterday. As I have already said, I adjourned the matter until 3.30 so that representatives of the student body, if they wished, could attend court and make representations. In the event, that is what happened and, as I said yesterday, I was genuinely grateful to them for coming along to put their side of the matter to me. I was addressed yesterday by a Mrs Hamilton, who is a non-practising barrister who had been asked to assist. She submitted that there were three possible grounds of defence to the possession application which needed to be considered. First, she thought there might be some provision in the lease which would allow wider use of the premises by the student body than what one would normally expect to find in a commercial lease of property. Having now seen the lease, there seems to me to be no substance in that particular point. Secondly, she said that there might be an infringement of the occupying students' rights under Articles 10 and 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights. That is a matter to which I will need to return later. Thirdly, she submitted, in outline, that the school's concerns about the possible repercussions of the sit-in or how it might develop were unfounded, and supported by evidence which should not be taken at face value. She submitted that the sit-in has so far been conducted in a well-organised and orderly way, without causing any real prejudice to anybody or to the proper conduct of the school's academic activities.

A

13. I was also addressed by a number of individual students, who reinforced some of the above points and also made a number of other points, including, in particular, expressing the wish that time should be allowed for them to obtain legal representation and give further consideration to any defences that might be available. I was also told a little more about the way in which the occupation has taken place. I was informed that on Monday a health and safety officer had toured the Brunei building without, apparently, finding anything to cause him concern. It was suggested that there was no real urgency in the school's concerns, and that the demonstration which took place yesterday had by then finished without any problems being caused to SOAS.

B

14. In those circumstances, I agreed to stand the matter over for 24 hours (or rather, slightly less than 24 hours) until 2 o'clock this afternoon, so that the student body could seek legal advice and, if so advised, put in evidence. The matter then came back before me at 2 o'clock today, when the students were represented by counsel, Mr Alexis Slatter, who appears with a junior on their behalf. Mr Slatter was only instructed this morning, and I bear in mind that he has had very little time in which to get to grips with the facts and the law in this matter. For her part, Miss Holland produced a further note dealing with the human rights aspects of the case, together with a second witness statement of Mr Poulson, which deals with some of the matters ventilated in court before me yesterday and reiterates the concerns that SOAS has about the continuing occupation. I then rose for half an hour, so that I could read Mr Poulson's second statement and a key case on Articles 10 and 11 (the Appleby case, described below).

15. I will begin with Mr Poulson's second statement, where he describes the ongoing concerns of SOAS which have in no way been allayed by developments over the last few days. In relation to the health and safety visit which took place on Monday, he says that the inspection in question was swift and only considered a few major concerns such as immediate fire risks, but since then the occupiers have reconfigured furniture and fittings, and also taken a number of further items onto the property. That apart, he points out that other staff dealing with matters such as maintenance, security and cleaning have not had access to the area, and he is therefore uncertain whether any damage has been caused, whether advertently or not. Essential services such as electrical distribution boards and isolation valves for water and heating services for the whole building are within the occupied area, and currently the school has no access to them. In addition, it is unclear whether any one individual is in charge of the occupation and whether the protestors would collectively be able to uphold appropriate standards of behaviour or conduct, although I again emphasise that there is no evidence of any failure on that score to date.

G

16. Mr Poulson refers to the repeated calls made for people to join the occupation and to give support. In his earlier statement, he said a musical event by a Cuban big band had been advertised which in the event did not take place, but other meetings and debates have taken place and yesterday evening a particular band did play in the Brunei Suite, apparently to a packed crowd. Certainly the music could be heard in the adjacent entrance foyer, and at the same time evening classes, both at the language centre and for Birkbeck College, were being held elsewhere in the building. Mr Poulson says (and I would accept) that there was, therefore, a potential for other events of that type to cause significant disruption to the school's normal activities.

B

17. Mr Poulson explains that SOAS has deliberately adopted a low-key security presence, intended to manage access to the area. Nevertheless, the security guards have been ignored in a number of important ways. On both Tuesday and Wednesday nights, certain individuals attempted to enter by climbing in through the windows after the building had been secured; and there was a further incident of people climbing in through the windows after security staff sought to prevent entry to the suite following service of the interim injunction which I granted yesterday. He says (and again I would agree) that a number of additional concerns arise from the use of windows for gaining access to and egress from the suite. Furthermore, significant extra calls have been made on staff time and resources, and this will become much more serious if the occupation continues into the weekend. His evidence is that, given the normal limitations on staffing levels over the weekend, he would need to arrange for extra security to be on hand at an estimated cost of £2,500. That apart, he says that there has been genuine disruption to the business of the school. This partly consists of the diversion of substantial resources. Senior staff and security staff have had to devote a lot of their time since Monday to working around the occupation, and their normal day-to-day activities have been correspondingly curtailed. In addition, a number of events of an academic nature have been disrupted by the occupation, because the Brunei Suite is principally used in association with the lecture theatre in the basement below. There were several important events and conferences scheduled to take place in and around the Brunei Suite over the course of this week, which have been relocated where possible, but some events have had to be cancelled. For example, a significant conference scheduled for tomorrow, Friday, has now had to be cancelled. In those circumstances, cancellation fees apply, and there is also a significant loss of reputation to SOAS associated with the cancellations and the inability to honour commitments. Mr Poulson says that if it becomes necessary to cancel bookings scheduled for the weekend, the costs to SOAS could be in the region of £11,000. That, it seems to me, is a very significant financial detriment to SOAS which weighs heavily in the balance when I have to evaluate whether to grant an immediate possession order or allow further time to the defendants.

F

18. Mr Poulson then refers to the lease, and says that, to the best of his knowledge, there is nothing connected with the donation made by the Sultan of Brunei which has any impact on the contractual position under the lease or the way in which the Brunei Suite can be used. In particular, there is nothing which provides any form of authority for an occupation or sit-in. Mr Poulson then describes the school's policy on how to respond to occupations. I have already referred to one aspect of that policy, which is that negotiations should be with elected representatives of the SOAS student community, namely the Student Union. He refers to and quotes from a statement which was yesterday issued by the school's registrar and secretary expressing regret about the occupation, reaffirming the commitment of SOAS to open discussion with the Student Union, and also emphasising that the school's policy on occupations had been unanimously approved in October 2009 by the SOAS governing body, which included representatives of the Student Union.

19. That is the evidential position before me. Turning to how the matter should now proceed, Miss Holland has submitted very strongly that I should make an immediate possession order today because no arguable defence has been disclosed, even though counsel has now been instructed on behalf of the students and there has been enough time for at least the bones of an arguable case to emerge. It seems to me that, if there were any arguable defence at this point, it would probably be right to allow a little further time for it to be investigated and for evidence and legal argument to be prepared. However, it also seems to me that the only plausible legal argument which has been mentioned is the human rights argument, to which I now turn.

20. The rights relied upon are those protected by Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention. Article 10 provides that everybody has the right to freedom of expression, including freedom to hold opinion and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. However, Article 10(2) goes on to say that the exercise of those freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of a number of specific objectives, including the protection of the reputation or rights of others. Article 11(1) then provides that everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, but again by Article 11(2) that is qualified, because it says that no restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of those rights other than such as are presented by law and are necessary in a democratic society, again in the interests of a number of specified purposes or objectives.

21. The question whether these Articles confer a right to protest on private property has been considered by the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Appleby v The United Kingdom which was decided in May 2003 and is reported at 37 EHRR 38. The applicants had established an environmental group called the Washington First Forum to campaign against a plan to build on the only public playing field near the town centre of Washington in Tyne & Wear. They set about collecting signatures for a petition to persuade the council to reject the project, and tried to set up stands in a privately owned shopping mall in Washington known as The Galleries. They were then prevented from doing so by security guards employed by the landlord. Although the manager of one of the shops did allow the applicants to set up stands in his store, that permission was subsequently revoked, and the manager of The Galleries informed the applicants that permission had been refused because the private owner took a strictly neutral stance on all political and religious issues.

G

22. The applicants sought to rely on Articles 10 and 11, and complained that they had been prevented from meeting in their own town centre to share information and ideas about the proposed building plans. They also had a complaint under Article 13, but for present purposes I can ignore that. The court held, by a majority of six votes to one, that there had been no violation of either Article 10 or Article 13. In paragraphs 39 and 40 the court set out the relevant general principles. It began by recalling the key importance of freedom of expression as one of the preconditions for a functioning democracy, and went on to say that genuine effective exercise of such freedom does not depend merely on the State's duty not to interfere, but may require positive measures of protection even in the sphere of relations between individuals. The Court then said that, in determining whether or not a positive obligation exists, regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interests of the community and the interests of the individual.

23. Turning to the application of those general principles to the case before it, the court set out the facts, which I have summarised, and recorded that the nature of the Convention right at stake was an important consideration. However, it was also important to have regard to the property rights of the owner of the shopping centre under Article 1 of Protocol 1 to the Convention. The court considered arguments that the shopping centre in question had many of the characteristics of a traditional town centre and could, therefore, be regarded as a quasi-public space. The court also referred to inconclusive authority in the United States, which had, however, refrained from holding, at any rate at the level of the Supreme Court, that there is any federal constitutional right of free speech in a privately owned shopping mall.

24. The court then expressed its conclusions in a paragraph which I will quote because it goes to the heart of the present case:

> "47. That provision [Article 10], notwithstanding the acknowledged importance of freedom of expression, does not bestow any freedom of forum for the exercise of that right. While it is true that demographic, social, economic and technological developments are changing the ways in which people move around and come into contact with each other, the Court is not persuaded that this requires the automatic creation of rights of entry to private property, or even, necessarily, to all publicly owned property (Government offices and ministries, for instance). Where however the bar on access to property has the effect of preventing any effective exercise of freedom of expression or it can be said that the essence of the right has been destroyed, the Court would not exclude that a positive obligation could arise for the State to protect the enjoyment of Convention rights by regulating property rights. The corporate town, where the entire municipality was controlled by a private body, might be an example."

This paragraph appears to me to provide clear authority that Article 10 does not give any general freedom to exercise the relevant rights upon private land. The only exception which the court envisaged was where the prohibition on access might prevent any effective exercise at all of freedom of expression, or where it might be said that the underlying essence of the right had in some way been destroyed.

25. On the facts of the present case, it seems to me entirely fanciful to argue that preventing the students of SOAS from exercising their Article 10 rights in the Brunei Suite would in any way impinge upon the effective exercise of their right of freedom of expression. There are many other places and ways in which that right can be exercised, and as the events of the last few days have shown there are indeed many ways in which it has been exercised. The proposition that Article 10 requires the law to override the property rights of SOAS in its own buildings is, in my view, unarguable and offers no prospects of success at trial.

B

26. Similar considerations apply to Article 11 which the court went on to deal with in paragraphs 51 and 52 of its judgment, because the court found that "largely identical considerations arise under this provision". So, for the same reasons, it would be equally fanciful to suppose that the Article 11 right to freedom of peaceful assembly required the court to override the property rights of SOAS in its own premises.

C

27. The case of Appleby appears to me to be plainly and squarely against the proposition which was advanced to me yesterday by Mrs Hamilton, and was further advanced to me today by Mr Slatter, to the effect that there may be an arguable defence based upon Articles 10 and 11. Mr Slatter had a further point, which was to say that SOAS is, at least arguably, a public authority, but I am not persuaded that that makes any relevant difference for present purposes. It is not in issue that, if there were a valid human rights argument, it could be relied upon by way of defence to the possession proceedings. So for that purpose it matters not whether or not SOAS is to be regarded as a public authority. Where its standing as a public authority would be relevant is if there were to be an application for judicial review, and indeed Mr Slatter began his submissions this afternoon by suggesting that this was a course which his clients wished to investigate. The suggestion was that it might be possible to show that the decision to seek the possession order was one that no reasonable public body could have taken. I will assume for present purposes, without deciding, that SOAS might be regarded as a public body for that purpose. The problem is that the argument appears to me wholly devoid of any prospects of success, because in view of the clear law laid down in Appleby it is simply impossible to conclude that no reasonable public body could have sought to regain possession of the Brunei Suite. Indeed, it seems to me almost self-evident that it was an eminently reasonable decision for the SOAS authorities to take, given the concerns expressed in the witness statements of Mr Poulson both yesterday and today.

G

28. In those circumstances, I am not persuaded that there is any defence to the possession proceedings which offers any realistic prospect of success, and I therefore think it would be wrong to allow any further adjournment for the defendants to look around for other possible grounds of defence. I cannot myself think of any grounds upon which they might be able to rely, given the incontrovertible property law principles which are relied upon by the claimant. The simple truth of the matter is that SOAS is the leasehold owner of the property and has the right to immediate possession of it. The students are entitled to use it in accordance with their contracts with SOAS and for the purposes of their education, but those rights do not extend to conducting a sit-in which excludes SOAS from the premises.

B

29. It seems to me, therefore, that SOAS is entitled to an immediate possession order and that such an order should be granted. The only remaining issue is whether the order should extend to the whole of the campus, or merely to the Brunei Suite. On that point I was referred yesterday by Miss Holland to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Secretary of State for Environment Food and Rural Affairs v Meier & Others [2009] UKSC 11, [2009] 1 WLR 2780. The relevant principles are discussed in the judgments of Lord Rodger, Baroness Hale and Lord Neuberger, and in particular they all referred to the earlier decision of the Court of Appeal in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301. That was an earlier case of a student sit-in, where students who had previously taken over and been removed from certain offices at the University of Essex then occupied another part of the university buildings. The Court of Appeal made an order for possession extending to the whole property of the university, in effect the whole of the campus. In paragraph 10 of his judgment Lord Rodger said:

"This was justified because the university's right to possession of its campus was indivisible."

In other words, an incursion into one part entitled the university to an order for possession in relation to the whole.

E

30. Baroness Hale, in paragraphs 22 and 23 of her judgment, referred to the Court of Appeal's decision and to the reasoning of Shaw LJ that the right of the university to possession of the site and buildings was indivisible. She said nothing to question the correctness of that analysis, and again, as a matter of common sense, I think it must be right that, provided one can regard the campus as a single piece of property for these purposes, it is appropriate for the possession order to be granted in relation to the whole rather than any part, if only to avoid the risk of the sit-in moving from one location to another. The situation that needs to be clearly distinguished is where the claimant owns other quite separate property which cannot reasonably be regarded as forming part of the same premises as those which have been occupied. In that situation, it is not possible to grant a pre-emptive possession order in relation to property of which possession has not yet been lost.

G

31. Lord Neuberger also dealt with this point in paragraphs 69 and following, referring to the decision in Djemal as a thoroughly practical one to deal with what he described as a fairly widespread problem at the time, namely student sit-ins. He did, indeed, go on to say in paragraph 71 that this was not the occasion formally to consider the correctness of Djemal, because it had not been put in issue by either of the parties. It is right for me to note that qualification, but nevertheless it remains Court of Appeal authority which is binding on me and, in my judgment, has not in any sense been overruled by the Meier case. Indeed, the indications are that Djemal had the clear approval of most, if not all, of the court in Meier.

32. In those circumstances, I think it is right, as I have said, to grant an immediate possession order and to grant it in relation to the whole of the SOAS campus.

Court of Appeal

*Mayor of London (on behalf of the Greater London Authority) v Hall and others

[2010] EWCA Civ 817

2010 July 9; 16 Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury MR, Arden, Stanley Burnton LJJ

Injunction — Trespass — Order for possession — Demonstrators setting up camp on square opposite Parliament in breach of byelaws — Title to square vested in Crown but local authority responsible for control and management functions — Mayor on behalf of local authority applying for possession order and injunction requiring demonstrators to leave square — Whether mayor having right to claim possession — Whether injunction impermissible enforcement of criminal law — Whether injunction breaching defendants' Convention rights — Human Rights Act 1998 (c 42), Sch 1, Pt I, arts 10, 11 — Greater London Authority Act 1999 (c 29), ss 384, 385

By section 384(1) of the Greater London Authority Act 1999[1] title to the square opposite the Houses of Parliament was vested in the Crown but by section 384(3) the care, control, management and regulation of the square was the function of the Greater London Authority, to be exercised by the Mayor of London on behalf of the authority under section 384(8). Acting pursuant to section 384(8) the mayor applied for an order for possession of the square against defendants who were encamped there in order to demonstrate in respect of a number of causes and an injunction against certain defendants requiring them to dismantle the structures which they had erected on the square and to leave the square. The majority of the defendants had only been encamped on the square for a few weeks but the second defendant, a long-standing protester who had pitched a tent on a small part of the square, had been there for some nine years without causing damage to the square or discouraging lawful visitors, joined from time to time by the third defendant. The defendants contended (i) that the mayor had no right to possession of the square since title to the land was vested in the Crown; (ii) that since by camping on the square they were in contravention of byelaws made pursuant to section 385(1) of the 1999 Act, which by section section 385(3) was a criminal offence, the grant of an injunction would amount to an impermissible enforcement of the criminal law; and (iii) that the orders sought would breach their rights to freedom of expression and freedom of assembly, guaranteed by articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, scheduled to the Human Rights Act 1998[2]. The judge made a possession order over the whole of the square against 17 of 19 named defendants and persons unknown and imposed injunctions on 14 of the defendants and persons unknown.

[2] Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 10: "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression . . . 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."
Art 11: "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly . . . 2. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others . . ."

A On applications for permission to appeal by seven named defendants—

Held, granting permission to appeal to and allowing the appeals of the second and third defendants but refusing permission to all other defendants, that it was implicit in sections 384 and 385 of the Greater London Authority Act 1999 that the mayor had the right to seek possession of the square in his own name since, although bare title of the square was vested in the Crown, every aspect of ownership and possession was vested in the mayor as part of his own statutory duty and statutory B right, not as an agent of the Crown; that since the mayor was entitled, in his capacity of the person in possession of the square, to maintain an injunction to remove those in unlawful occupation and since there was evidence to support the view that the criminal penalties provided for in section 385(3) of the 1999 Act to enforce the byelaws would not have operated as a deterrent to the defendants, the judge had been entitled to grant injunctive relief; that the defendants' desire to express their views in the square in the form of a relatively long-term occupation with tents and placards C was within the scope of articles 10 and 11 of the Convention; that, although the defendants were trespassers and in breach of the byelaws, they were entitled to have the proportionality of both the making of the possession order and the granting of the injunction assessed by the court, rather than the mayor, in a balancing exercise considering the facts and focusing very sharply and critically on the reasons put forward for curtailing the expression of their beliefs in public; that, balancing the defendants' rights to freedom of expression and assembly with the need to prevent crime, protect health and protect the rights and freedoms of others to access the D square and demonstrate with authorisation, the relief granted in respect of all but the second and third defendants had been a wholly proportionate response; but that, since different considerations applied to the second defendant and those protesting with him, and since he was entitled to have his case decided on the basis of new medical evidence which he wished to put before the court, the question of whether it was proportionate to make an order for possession and to grant an injunction against him would be remitted for reconsideration by the High Court (post, paras 28–30, E 32–33, 37, 40, 43, 53–56, 65, 68–69, 72, 76, 77).

APPLICATIONS for permission to appeal from Griffith Williams J

E By a claim form dated and served on 26 May 2010, and amended pursuant to the order of Maddison J dated 3 June 2010, the claimant, the Mayor of London (on behalf of the Greater London Authority) claimed an order for possession of Parliament Square Gardens as against the defendants, Rebecca Hall, Brian Haw, Barbara Tucker, Charity Sweet, Lew Almond, Chan Aniker, Anna Chithrakla, Chris Coverdale, Joshua Dunn, Dirk Duputall, Friend (also known as Robert Hobbs), Stuart Holmes, Rodge F Kinney, Professor Chris Knight, Peace Little, Simon Moore, Anita Olivacce, Peter Phoenix, Raga Woods and persons unknown, and an injunction as against the first and fourth to twentieth defendants, requiring them forthwith to: (1) dismantle and remove from the grassed area all tents and similar structures on Parliament Square Gardens except with permission granted by the mayor or on his behalf under byelaw 5(9) of the Trafalgar G Square and Parliament Square Gardens Byelaws 2000; (2) cease to organise or take part in the assembly known as Democracy Village and thereafter not to take part in any assembly without permission under byelaw 5 of the 2000 Byelaws or section 133 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005; and (3) leave the square in accordance with the lawful directions of the mayor or on his behalf under byelaw 5(7); and as against the second and third defendants, an injunction requiring them forthwith to: (1) dismantle H and remove all tents and similar structures except with permission from the mayor or on his behalf under byelaw 5(7); (2) cease to organise or take part in any assembly on the grassed area without permission under byelaw 5(10) and/or section 133 of the 2005 Act; and (3) leave the grassed area in accordance with the lawful directions issued on behalf of the mayor.

On 29 June 2010 Griffith Williams J granted the relief sought, making an order for possession over the whole of Parliament Square Gardens against all defendants except the fourth and nineteenth and granting injunctions against all the defendants, except the first and nineteenth.

By an appellant's notice dated 2 July 2010 the first defendant, Rebecca Hall, sought permission to appeal against the possession order made against her on the following grounds, inter alia. (1) The claimant mayor was not entitled to possession of Parliament Square Gardens and accordingly the possession order, made under CPR Pt 55, had been made in error of law. (2) For the law to attribute possession of land to a person who could establish no paper title to possession the claimant had to show both factual possession and the requisite intention to possess, and since the judge had made no finding that the mayor was in physical occupation of Parliament Square Gardens, it had been wrong for the judge to find that the mayor had a right to seek possession. (3) If, which was not accepted, the judge had found that the mayor was in factual possession of the land, in so finding he had erred in law. The Greater London Authority Act 1999 vested the legal estate in the land in the Queen and plainly did not expressly give possession, or even a right of occupation of the square, to the mayor, the duties and functions of "control, management and regulation" of Parliament Square Gardens in section 384 of the 1999 Act being distinct and different from the right to possession of the land and conferring no exclusive right to possession. Nothing in the statutory scheme created a right for the mayor at will to exclude the world from entering and/or remaining on Parliament Square Gardens which was the hallmark of the right to possession necessary to found a successful possession claim by a claimant with no title. (4) The judge had therefore misconstrued the 1999 Act in three material respects: (i) in deciding that sections 30(2)(c) and 34 were not ancillary to the duty and functions in section 384 but provided greater powers than section 384 itself; (ii) in deciding that the power to regulate the "use" of Parliament Square Gardens in section 386 by byelaws created a power to exclude the world from the square; (iii) in having made no reference to the fact that the byelaws themselves, at byelaw 5(7), did not provide a power to exclude but only a power to give a direction to leave, which direction had to be reasonable. (5) The judge had erred in treating the ability to close or fence off the square to carry out its duties and functions as a general power to exclude the whole world at will. (6) Management functions were not inconsistent with the possibility of having exclusive possession but such responsibilities did not confer a right to possession in the present case. Management functions could be incidental to possession but the converse was not true. (7) The judge had erred in rejecting the first defendant's submission that the statutory scheme under the 1999 Act was in effect no different from control or management functions conferred by a property owner on a managing agent. The judge had failed to recognise the full implications of that extension or development of the common law approach to exclusive possession, based not on a legal estate or physical occupation of the land but on a statutory duty or a function of day-to-day control and management of the land. (8) The judge had impermissibly extended the common law relating to the entitlement to possession in respect of land not owned by the claimant and over which the public had an unfettered right of entry. That approach, following Laws LJ in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton [2000] QB 133, was inconsistent with the

A observations of Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury MR in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Meier [2009] 1 WLR 2780, para 59, as to the limits of the courts' powers to develop the common law. (9) If the first defendant was correct and the judge had erred in law in concluding that the statute had created a right of exclusive possession over Parliament Square Gardens and the mayor sought to rely on Dutton's case, it could be distinguished on the facts of the present case, and had in any event B been decided per incuriam in the light of Hill v Tupper (1863) 2 H & C 121 and Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd [1997] AC 655, which had not been cited to the court in Dutton's case, and/or Dutton's case had been wrongly decided.

By an appellant's notice dated 1 July 2010 the second defendant, Brian Haw, sought permission to appeal against the possession order and the injunction against him on the following grounds, inter alia. (1) The judge, C while correctly recognising that the second defendant's rights under articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms were engaged by the issue of whether he required to occupy a small area of Parliament Square Gardens in order to carry out his authorised protest in Parliament Square, had erred in law in concluding that there was a pressing social need not to permit an indefinite camp by the D second defendant in order to protect the rights and freedoms of others to access all of Parliament Square Gardens and to demonstrate with authorisation. (2) The judge ought to have concluded that, in view of the nine-year length of the second defendant's demonstration involving substantial periods during which use of a small part of Parliament Square Gardens had been tolerated by the claimant, and the absence of any evidence that any member of the public had been inconvenienced or prevented from E holding a permitted demonstration by the second defendant's presence there, that there was no pressing social need to require him to cease using Parliament Square Gardens to sleep in a tent. (3) The judge ought to have held that the exclusion of the second defendant from Parliament Square Gardens either by the grant of a possession order or of an injunction, and by the prohibition on the second defendant pitching a tent without F permission by way of injunction, were impermissible restrictions on the second defendant's article 10 and 11 rights.

The third defendant, Barbara Tucker, the eighth defendant, Chris Coverdale, the eleventh defendant, Friend (also known as Ian Robert Hobbs), the twelfth defendant, Stuart Holmes, and the fifteenth defendant, Peace Little, also sought permission to appeal.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Neuberger of G Abbotsbury MR.

Jan Luba QC, Mark Wonnacott, Stephanie Harrison and John Beckley (instructed by Bindmans LLP) for the first defendant, Ms Hall.

Martin Westgate QC and Paul Harris (instructed by Birnberg Peirce & Partners) for the second defendant, Mr Haw.

H The third, eighth, eleventh, twelfth and fifteenth defendants appeared in person.

Ashley Underwood QC and David Forsdick (instructed by Eversheds LLP) for the mayor.

The court took time for consideration.

16 July 2010. The following judgments were handed down.

LORD NEUBERGER OF ABBOTSBURY MR

1 There are before us applications for permission to appeal, which have been ordered to be heard on the basis that, if permission is given, the hearing of the appeal should follow immediately. We have heard the matter on a "rolled up" basis; in other words, the application and the projected appeal have been, in effect, argued together.

2 There are two orders which are sought to be appealed, and they were made by Griffith Williams J, following a hearing spread over eight days between 14 and 24 June 2010, with judgment given on 29 June [2010] EWHC 1613 (QB). Both orders were made in favour of the claimant, the Mayor of London, suing "on behalf of the Greater London Authority". The first was an order for possession of Parliament Square Gardens, London SW1 ("PSG"), against 17 out of 19 named defendants and "persons unknown". The second order was an injunction requiring 14 out of the 19 defendants and "persons unknown" (a) to dismantle any structures on, (b) (save in the case of three of the defendants, Mr Haw, Mrs Tucker and Ms Sweet) to cease to organise assemblies on, and (c) to leave, PSG.

The legislative background

3 The principal statutory provision governing the ownership and control of PSG is section 384 of the Greater London Authority Act 1999, which is in the following terms:

> "(1) The land comprised in the site of the central garden of Parliament Square (which, at the passing of this Act, is vested in the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport) is by this subsection transferred to and vested in Her Majesty as part of the hereditary possessions and revenues of Her Majesty.
> "(2) Nothing in subsection (1) above affects— (a) any sewers, cables, mains, pipes or other apparatus under that site, or (b) any interest which was, immediately before the passing of this Act, vested in London Regional Transport or any of its subsidiaries.
> "(3) The care, control, management and regulation of the central garden of Parliament Square shall be functions of the authority.
> "(4) It shall be the duty of the authority well and sufficiently to light, cleanse, water, pave, repair and keep in good order and condition the central garden of Parliament Square.
> "(5) The functions conferred or imposed on the authority by this section are in addition to any other functions of the authority.
> "(6) In consequence of the preceding provisions of this section, any functions of the Secretary of State under or by virtue of section 22 of the Crown Lands Act 1851 (duties and powers of management in relation to the royal parks, gardens and possessions there mentioned), so far as relating to the whole or any part of the central garden of Parliament Square, shall determine.
> "(7) Subsections (3) and (4) above shall have effect notwithstanding any law, statute, custom or usage to the contrary.
> "(8) Any functions conferred or imposed on the authority by virtue of this section shall be functions of the authority which are exercisable by the mayor acting on behalf of the authority.

A "(9) In this section 'the central garden of Parliament Square' means the site in Parliament Square on which the Minister of Works was authorised by the Parliament Square (Improvement) Act 1949 to lay out the garden referred to in that Act as 'the new central garden'."

4 It is also relevant to refer to the next section of the same Act ("section 385") which provides, so far as is relevant:

B "(1) The authority may make such byelaws to be observed by persons using Trafalgar Square or Parliament Square Garden as the authority considers necessary for securing the proper management of those squares and the preservation of order and the prevention of abuses there.

"(2) Byelaws under this section may designate specified provisions of the byelaws as trading byelaws.

C "(3) A person who contravenes or fails to comply with any byelaw under this section shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction— (a) if the byelaw is a trading byelaw, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or (b) in any other case, to a fine not exceeding level 1 on the standard scale."

5 It is also convenient to set out some of the Trafalgar Square and D Parliament Square Gardens Byelaws 2000 ("the byelaws"), made pursuant to section 385(1):

"3. No person shall within the Squares . . . (6) fail to comply with a reasonable direction given by an authorised person to leave the Squares . . ."

"5. Unless acting in accordance with permission given in writing by . . . E the mayor . . . no person shall within the Squares: (1) attach any article to any tree, plinth, plant box, seat, railing, fence or other structure; (2) interfere with any notice or sign; (3) exhibit any notice, advertisement or any other written or pictorial matter . . . (7) camp, or erect or cause to be erected any structure, tent or enclosure . . . (9) make or give a public speech or address . . . (10) organise or take part in any assembly, display, F performance, representation, parade, procession, review or theatrical event . . . (13) go on any shrubbery or flower bed . . ."

The factual background to the projected appeal

6 The basic facts giving rise to these proceedings are well summarised in the opening five paragraphs of the judge's judgment:

G "1. . . . PSG . . . comprises the central area of Parliament Square around which runs the public highway, including in places pavement. To the east is the Palace of Westminster, to the south Westminster Abbey, to the west the Supreme Court and to the north, Whitehall and various government buildings. It is a highly important open space and garden at the heart of London and our parliamentary democracy; it is an area of significant historic and symbolic value worldwide.

H "2. PSG is part of the Westminster Abbey and Parliament Square conservation area and a UNESCO designated world heritage site . . . It is classified as Grade II on English Heritage's Register of parks and gardens with special historic interest. It provides world renowned views of both the palace of Westminster and Westminster Abbey.

"3. On 1 May 2010, four separate groups said to represent the four horsemen of the apocalypse and which had formed up at different locations across London arrived and set up a camp which they named their 'Democracy Village'. Their then stated intention was to remain until 6 May 2010, the date of the general election but they have continued to occupy PSG and (on the evidence of a number of the defendants . . .) have every intention to do so for the foreseeable future.

"4. Brian Haw (the second defendant) has been camping lawfully since 2001 on a pavement on the eastern side of PSG—a part of the highway controlled by Westminster City Council. He was joined some years later by Barbara Tucker (the third defendant). They have been conducting their own protest for love, peace, justice for all. They and those associated with them are in no way a part of the Democracy Village.

"5. The defendants who are a part of the Democracy Village are demonstrating variously in respect of a number of causes—these include the war in Afghanistan, the war in Iraq, genocide, war crimes and worldwide environmental issues."

7 As this attenuated summary suggests, the full factual background, particularly in the view of the defendants, is wide-ranging and involves very fundamental issues indeed. This was clear from the judge's summary of the evidence he read and heard, and it was brought home to us by the eloquent oral submissions we received from some of the defendants, revealing their strong feelings of moral and ethical outrage at various issues of undoubted public importance, identified in para 5 of the judgment below. Bearing in mind the fundamental nature of these issues, and the location where the defendants are gathered, the centrality of the two freedoms, which are undoubtedly engaged in these proceedings, freedom of expression and freedom of assembly, could not be placed under a sharper focus.

8 Mr Haw, the second defendant, (represented at first instance by Mr Harris, who was led in this court by Mr Westgate QC) has been a virtually permanent fixture on the pavement area on the east of PSG, facing the Houses of Parliament, since 2001. While some might regard his presence with his placards as an eyesore in the face of Parliament, others see him as something of a national treasure, embodying the right of free speech in the very eye of the democratic storm. There have been various attempts to remove him from the pavement area, but none have so far succeeded, and the present proceedings do not seek to remove him from there, at least directly. At some point, he erected a tent on the grassed area of PSG ("the grassed area") immediately adjoining his pitch on the pavement; there is some dispute as to when that started, he says in 2001, the evidence on behalf of the mayor is much later. The third defendant, Ms Tucker, who represented herself, has joined Mr Haw from time to time, as has the fourth defendant, Ms Sweet.

9 The other defendants have been on PSG for all, or much, of the time since Democracy Village started up at the beginning of May 2010. Of those defendants, Ms Hall, the first defendant, and a member of Democracy Village, was represented by Mr Luba QC, Mr Wonnacott, Ms Harrison and Mr Beckley. The other named defendants are members of Democracy Village, and, in so far as they took part in the proceedings below, they acted in person. All of them were added as named defendants on their application, as the proceedings originally identified only three named defendants, as well as "persons unknown".

A 10 After hearing argument and evidence, the judge made the order for possession and granted the injunction against the great majority of the named defendants, although he excluded two defendants from each order. In particular, the judge decided that no injunction should be granted against Ms Hall, although she was included in the order for possession.

11 The application for permission to appeal was made by a number of the defendants, and Smith LJ ordered that the application be heard in open B court, with appeal to follow if permission was granted. I have already referred to the fact that Mr Haw was represented before us; Mrs Tucker represented herself. Of the Democracy Village occupiers, I have already mentioned that Ms Hall was represented; other members of Democracy Village, Mr Coverdale, Friend, Mr Holmes, Mr Knight, and Peace Little (to all of whom the injunction and the order for possession extended) made C oral submissions on their own behalf.

The issues on this appeal

12 A number of issues have been raised. First, whether the trial below was fair—whether it complied with article 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the D Convention"). Secondly, whether the claim for possession was properly constituted. Thirdly, whether the order for possession and the injunction complied with articles 10 and 11 of the Convention in terms of proportionality. Fourthly, whether an injunction was a permissible remedy in the light of section 385 and the byelaws. Fifthly, there are issues concerning costs.

13 Mr Haw (together with Mrs Tucker) raises three arguments specific E to his case, one relating to the speed of the proceedings, the second to the form of the possession application and order against him, and the third relating to proportionality.

14 I shall take these various issues in turn, save that those relating to Mr Haw will be discussed before the question of costs.

Did the defendants have a fair trial?

F

15 The gap between the issue of these proceedings, 26 May 2010, and the commencement of the hearing before Griffith Williams J, 14 June 2010, was undoubtedly very short. However, so far as the domestic procedural aspect is concerned, CPR Pt 55 understandably envisages an abbreviated procedure in relation to "a possession claim against trespassers", and that procedure is mandatory in a case such as the present. Injunctive relief, if G justified, should, as a matter of principle, be available speedily.

16 Having said that, this was an unusual case, and it is right to consider whether the defendants were afforded a fair trial which complies with the domestic law and with article 6 (although it would be a rare case where the two requirements would not march together). There is no reason to think that there are any areas of law or fact which could be raised other than H those identified in para 12 above: if there had been, no doubt Mr Luba or Mr Westgate would have drawn them to our attention. The second and fourth issues principally involve legal argument and have been fully canvassed by counsel. The only area where it is, at least on the face of it, conceivable that more time would have been needed to gather evidence or argument would be on proportionality. However, having heard the arguments and read the evidence and the judgment, I am quite satisfied that no prejudice whatever was caused to any of the defendants (other than Mr Haw) in relation to the presentation of their respective cases on this issue, whether in the form of evidence or arguments, by the short time between the issue of proceedings and the hearing of the claims.

17 The principal concerns expressed by the defendants who pursued this argument related to the importance attached to the issues which those defendants who participated in the Democracy Village stood for (and, in Mrs Tucker's case, the issues which Mr Haw stood for). Those issues are of prime public importance, and in the first rank of topics which article 10 is concerned to respect, in that they are political in nature. The importance of having an unrestricted right to express publicly and strongly a controversial view on a political, or any other, topic cannot be doubted: it is of the essence of a free democratic society and should be vigilantly protected by the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. Accordingly, it was unnecessary for the defendants in this case to expand on their views, with which many may agree strongly and many may disagree strongly, relating to the environment, alleged genocide, the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and more specific issues such as the use of depleted uranium.

18 It is true that Mr Holmes (and possibly other defendants) has applied for legal aid, and there has not been the time to have their applications processed. However, in my view, no prejudice has been caused to him as a result of his having to represent himself. The issues have been fully canvassed with the assistance of six barristers, and their instructing solicitors, acting for Mr Haw and Ms Hall, and the factual issues have been fully aired in the form of the evidence put before the judge. Indeed, without in any way intending to criticise anyone (as it is inevitable where so many defendants separately advance their respective cases), the issues were aired more fully below than they would have been if the unrepresented defendants had been represented.

19 It is also right to mention that this was not a case where the parties were forced to present their respective cases on the first occasion that the case came before a judge for hearing. The case came before Maddison J on 3 June, when he gave certain directions, and it came before him again on 7 June, when he gave further directions. The defendants therefore had significantly more time to prepare their respective cases than the minimum which they could have been given under the Civil Procedure Rules and quite rightly in the circumstances. This was not a case where they can have been taken by surprise at the hearing proceeding on 14 June. Further, because Griffith Williams J heard evidence from any party who reasonably wished to give evidence, there was time for further consideration to be given to arguments and evidence during the ten days over which the hearing was spread.

20 Accordingly, even ignoring the point that the Court of Appeal is, as a matter of principle, reluctant to interfere with a judge's case management decision (a point of very considerable importance, I should add), it seems to me that Griffith Williams J was not merely entitled, but was positively correct, in deciding to proceed with the hearing and to refuse an adjournment. If the mayor was entitled to any of the relief which he was seeking, it would be wrong to delay the proceedings for any time greater than was needed to ensure that the defendants had a fair trial.

A Does the mayor have the right to claim possession?

21 The powers and duties relating to PSG and conferred on the Greater London Authority (which I shall treat as conferred on the mayor, both in the light of section 384(8) and for the sake of convenience) are in sections 384(3) and (4), 385(1) and (2), and the byelaws. In my view, those provisions, as can be seen from the control which the mayor actually exercised (gardening, B refuse collection, patrolling, enforcement of byelaws), inevitably lead to the conclusion that the mayor was, at any rate until 1 May, in possession of PSG. As the majority of the Australian High Court put it, a person has possession of certain land if he can "control access to the [land] by others, and, in general, decide how the land will be used": Western Australia v Ward (2002) 213 CLR 1, para 52. Of course, the grassed area of PSG is not fenced off, as it is intended to be available for general public access, but the precise nature C of the acts and rights required to amount to possession varies with the nature of the land and all the circumstances: see e g West Bank Estates Ltd v Arthur [1967] 1 AC 665, 678B–C.

22 The argument advanced by Mr Luba and Mr Wonnacott on this first issue is simply stated, and is based on clear, if somewhat historical, principles, although, at least on its face, the argument seems absurd. Simply D stated the argument is this: a claim for possession of land, if made by a person who has been put out of possession, can only be successfully maintained if that person can establish title of some sort to a legal estate in the land. In particular, it is insufficient for such a person to maintain such a claim, if he is merely relying on an interest or right, falling short of a legal estate, which gives him a claim or right to use and control of the land. The reason I describe the argument as apparently absurd is that it amounts E to saying that the mere fact that a person can establish that he has a right to use and control, which effectively amounts to possession, of land does not entitle him to maintain a claim for possession of that land even against someone on that land who is undoubtedly a trespasser.

23 The basis of this argument, in very summary terms, is that (i) a claim for possession of land is the modern equivalent of a claim for ejectment (see the discussion in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and F Rural Affairs v Meier [2009] 1 WLR 2780, paras 6–7, 26–33, and 59–61); (ii) a claim for ejectment (as opposed to a claim for an injunction in trespass) could only be maintained by someone who could establish a legal estate in the land (see e g per Lord Mansfield CJ, and Aston and Willes JJ in Roe v Harvey (1769) 4 Burr 2484, 2487, 2488 and 2489 respectively, and per Bayley J in Harper v Charlesworth (1825) 4 B & C 574, 589); and (iii) it G would represent an unprincipled departure, fraught with inconsistencies and unforeseeable problems and conundrums, to depart from this rule (as the Supreme Court of New South Wales decided in Georgeski v Owners Corpn Sp49833 [2004] NSWSC 1096).

24 This argument is inconsistent with the majority decision of this court in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton [2000] QB 133, where the plaintiff's case was weaker than the mayor's case here, as the mayor has actually H enjoyed possession, and his right is statutory in origin. However, it is said by Mr Luba that the reasoning of the majority in Dutton's case is inconsistent with authority not cited to the court in that case (such as Hill v Tupper (1863) 2 H & C 121), and that it is inconsistent with the more principle-based approach of the House of Lords in Meier's case [2009] 1 WLR 2780, although Dutton's case was referred to without adverse criticism by Lord Rodger of Earlsferry JSC, at para 6.

25 Mr Underwood QC, who appeared with Mr Forsdick for the mayor, argued that, as the mayor had been in possession before the defendants wrongly dispossessed him, authority showed that, even under the arcane rules relating to ejectment proceedings, he could properly seek possession. That is true, but it is because a claimant's previous possession is evidence of his title (or, strictly speaking, of his prior seisin), but it is rebuttable evidence, and if rebutted by other evidence, the right to claim possession dissolves: see Asher v Whitlock (1865) LR 1 QB 1. In this case, therefore, the defendants argue, the presumption of the mayor's right to claim possession arising from his previous possession dissolves once one looks at section 384(1), which makes it clear that the mayor has no title, as the freehold is vested in the Crown.

26 As at present advised, at least if one ignores the full effect of sections 384 and 385, I think that there is real force in the defendants' argument, the erudition of whose contents was matched by the clarity and crispness of its presentation. Certainly, if the law governing the right to claim possession is governed by the same principles as those that governed the right to maintain a claim in ejectment, the argument seems very powerful.

27 However, there is obvious force in the point that the modern law relating to possession claims should not be shackled by the arcane and archaic rules relating to ejectment, and, in particular, that it should develop and adapt to accommodate a claim by anyone entitled to use and control, effectively amounting to possession, of the land in question—along the lines of the views expressed by Laws LJ in Dutton's case [2000] QB 133 and by Baroness Hale of Richmond JSC in Meier's case [2009] 1 WLR 2780. Further, it is only my opinion in Meier's case, paras 60–69, which can be said plainly to support the argument that a possession order may be subject to the same principles as those that applied to ejectment, and even my opinion was concerned with a very different aspect of a possession order from that raised here, as the claimant's title was not in issue. Lord Rodger JSC at paras 6 and 7 can be said to provide only a little, and then only very indirect, support for the argument, and any such support is rather undermined by his uncritical citation of Dutton's case. The effect of the brief speeches of Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe and Lord Collins of Mapesbury JJSC is neutral on the argument, save that they can be said to have adopted a relatively orthodox approach to the concept of possession. Baroness Hale JSC's observations at paras 26–36 are rather against the argument.

28 However, even assuming that Mr Luba and Mr Wonnacott are right as a matter of general principle, the answer in this case lies in the relevant statutory provisions. As Stanley Burnton LJ pointed out, and as Mr Luba realistically accepted, it would be open to Parliament to confer by statute the power to claim possession of land on a person who has no title to that land. Although it is true that there is nothing in the 1999 Act which, in express terms, gives the mayor the right to seek possession of PSG in his own name, I have reached the conclusion that it is implicit in sections 384 and 385 that he has that right.

29 In the two sections, the legislature has distributed different aspects of ownership and control between the Crown and the mayor. Title is

A undoubtedly vested in the Crown by section 384(1), but every aspect of ownership and possession is vested in the mayor, as part of his own statutory duty and statutory right, and not as an agent of the Crown: he has complete control and regulation of PSG. The only satisfactory reason which was advanced at the hearing for vesting title to PSG in the Crown, rather than the mayor, is symbolic: Parliament Square (like Trafalgar Square, which enjoys the same regime) is a place of premier national significance B and importance.

30 While the Crown has no function other than that of bare ownership, the mayor decides what activities can occur on PSG, how it is to be laid out and maintained, what statues and other structures are to be erected there, who can come onto PSG, in what circumstances, what they can and cannot do when they are there, and when they have to leave. It is common ground C that, if, as I consider is clear, the mayor is the person entitled to lawful possession of PSG, he could obtain an injunction, such as that which he has obtained, as a claimant seeking an injunction in trespass only has to show that he is entitled to (or even only that he enjoyed) possession—see per Chadwick LJ, dissenting in Dutton's case [2000] QB 133, paras 146–147. In fact, the only thing which the mayor cannot do in relation to PSG, on the defendants' case, is to seek possession. D

31 Mr Luba argued that Parliament must have appreciated, or, more accurately, must be taken to have appreciated, the law, and that, by vesting the freehold of PSG in the Crown, it must have envisaged that only the Crown (presumably by relator action through the Attorney General) could bring proceedings for possession if PSG was invaded by squatters. He suggested that this was reinforced by the absence of a provision such as is E found in section 1(2) of the Crown Estate Act 1961, which specifically bestows on the Crown Estates Commissioners the ability to perform "all such acts as belong to the Crown's rights of ownership".

32 It seems obvious that, in order for the scheme envisaged by sections 384 and 385 to work properly, the mayor should have the ability to seek possession in his own name of PSG. It cannot have been envisaged that he would have to ask the Attorney General to bring proceedings, with the delay, F uncertainty and cost which such a course would involve. Indeed, the Attorney General would have a discretion whether to bring a relator action, and, for reasons which seemed good to him, he might refuse to seek an order for possession. It would be scarcely consistent with the powers and duties conferred on the mayor by sections 384 and 385 if he could be denied the ability to obtain possession of PSG. The national importance of PSG G underlines the need for minimum delay and maximum certainty and simplicity where summary action is required.

33 Reading the two sections together, they show that while bare title to PSG is vested in the Crown, the mayor is given the power to do everything in relation to the land. The mayor can, in my view, rely on the two sections to show not merely that he has a statutory right to possession of PSG, and indeed a statutory duty to enforce that right, but, crucially for present H purposes, to demonstrate that while they confer title to PSG on the Crown, it is a title which it is his right to enforce, and, bearing in mind his duties under sections 384 and 385, his obligation to enforce, in his own name. In other words, far from those two sections undermining his title to sue, they support it.

34 As to the 1961 Act, the Crown Estates Commissioners are the agents of the Crown, so it is understandable why there is specific reference to their powers in section 1(2). However, it goes a little further than that: as Arden LJ said, given the provisions of section 1(2) of that Act and the reference to the 1851 Act in section 384(6), it seems very unlikely that Parliament envisaged that the Crown would have to bring proceedings for possession of PSG in its own name.

35 It is right to refer to the fact that the possession proceedings in Meier's case [2009] 1 WLR 2780 were brought by the freehold title owner, the Secretary of State, rather than the Forestry Commission, in whom the management of the land was vested. The powers given to the mayor under sections 384 and 385 are considerably wider than those conferred on the forestry commissioners by the Forestry Act 1967. This would explain why the claimant was not the forestry commissioners, but the Secretary of State, to whom Crown woodlands had devolved through the Minister of Works. There was a similar line of devolution of PSG through the Minister of Works to the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, but the 1999 Act extinguished all those powers. Those powers included all the rights of the Crown in respect of PSG: hence the need for section 384(1) to revest title in the Crown. It is significant that this was done by extinguishing and not recreating in the Crown Estate Commissioners the wide powers to manage that they have in relation to Crown lands: those powers enable the Crown Estate Commissioners to exercise all the rights of ownership in Crown lands: see section 1(2) of the 1961 Act, referred to above.

Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention and proportionality

36 As I have already said, there can be no doubt that the defendants should have the right to express the views which they wish to express; similarly, there is no doubt that they should enjoy the right to assemble together. Such rights are, of course, specifically protected by, respectively, articles 10 and 11 of the Convention. However, as articles 10.2 and 11.2 of the Convention emphasise, these rights, vitally important though they are, must be subject to some constraints, and those constraints include "restrictions" provided they are, inter alia,

> "prescribed by law and . . . necessary in a democratic society in the interests of . . . public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime . . . for the protection of the [under article 10, 'reputation or'] rights ['and', under article 11, 'freedoms'] of others."

37 The right to express views publicly, particularly on the important issues about which the defendants feel so strongly, and the right of the defendants to assemble for the purpose of expressing and discussing those views, extends to the manner in which the defendants wish to express their views and to the location where they wish to express and exchange their views. If it were otherwise, these fundamental human rights would be at risk of emasculation. Accordingly, the defendants' desire to express their views in Parliament Square, the open space opposite the main entrance to the Houses of Parliament, and to do so in the form of the Democracy Village, on the basis of relatively long-term occupation with tents and placards, are all, in my opinion, within the scope of articles 10 and 11.

A 38 Having said that, the greater the extent of the right claimed under article 10.1 or article 11.1, the greater the potential for the exercise of the claimed right interfering with the rights of others, and, consequently, the greater the risk of the claim having to be curtailed or rejected by virtue of article 10.2 or article 11.2.

39 The byelaws themselves cannot be said to fall foul of articles 10 and 11: they envisage demonstrations, speeches, camping, placards and the like B being permitted subject to the mayor's consent. In this case, the mayor considered and refused an application (or, strictly, a letter which he treated as an application) for the establishment and continuance of the Democracy Village on PSG, and he refused it for reasons given in a fairly detailed letter dated 20 May 2010. That letter included the observation that:

> C "The effect of the Democracy Village is to prevent the public from exercising their rights over a very significant part of PSG for a prolonged and indefinite period [and] one impact of the Democracy Village has been to exclude others from exercising their right to protest there. The extent and duration of the impact of the Democracy Village on the lawful, reasonable and ordinary activities on PSG is the primary reason for refusing consent."

D The letter also said that "The mayor is seriously concerned about the substantial damage which is being caused by the Democracy Village to PSG", and that "the cost of reparation to return the Square to its former condition is substantial". The letter went on to state that:

> "Permissions for other peaceful protests and rallies on Parliament Square Garden are normally limited to a maximum of three hours, in E order to allow for proper management, to ensure that the day-to-day business of the city is not impeded, and to allow the maximum number of groups or individuals to use the space to exercise their democratic right to peaceful protest. As this period will be extended in appropriate cases, the mayor is not prepared to permit camping by significant numbers for a prolonged period."

F 40 The Democracy Village defendants are plainly trespassers on PSG: rightly, that is no longer in contention, although it was debated before the judge. The defendants' presence on PSG is also in breach of the byelaws, as the mayor's consent to their occupation has been refused. Although those are factors to be weighed against them, particularly after what is now more than two months of effectively exclusive occupation, the Democracy Village G defendants are still entitled to have the proportionality of both the making of the possession order and the granting of the injunction sought by the mayor assessed by the court as articles 10 and 11 are engaged, not least because it is the mayor, the person seeking the relief who could authorise them remaining lawfully on PSG.

41 This is not a case like Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] 2 AC 465 or Doherty v Birmingham City Council (Secretary of State H for Communities and Local Government intervening) [2009] AC 367, where (at least in the view of the majority of the House of Lords in each case) article 8 could not be invoked by an occupier of a residential property in support of his case against his landlord's claim for possession. That was because the domestic law had already taken into account, and balanced, the public interest in a public authority landlord obtaining possession and the tenant's right to respect for his home. No such legislative balancing exercise has been carried out here. In any event, it can be argued that recent Strasbourg jurisprudence could be invoked to suggest that the reasoning of the majority in those two cases should no longer hold good (an issue which has just been argued before the Supreme Court on appeal from Manchester City Council v Pinnock (Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government intervening) [2010] 1 WLR 713*).

42 Quite apart from this, when freedom of assembly, and, even more, when freedom of expression, are in play, then, save possibly in very unusual and clear circumstances, article 11, and article 10, should be capable of being invoked to enable the merits of the particular case to be considered. Thus, in R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire Constabulary [2007] 2 AC 105, paras 36 and 37 Lord Bingham of Cornhill made it clear that state authorities have a positive duty to take steps to ensure that lawful public demonstrations can take place, and that any prior restraint on freedom of speech requires "the most careful scrutiny".

43 Given, therefore, that articles 10 and 11 are in play, it seems to me that the decision on the balancing, or proportionality, issue is ultimately one for the court, not the mayor: see R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School [2007] 1 AC 100 and Belfast City Council v Miss Behavin' Ltd [2007] 1 WLR 1420. Further, when carrying out that balancing exercise, the court must consider the facts, and, particularly when it comes to article 10 (and article 11), focus very sharply and critically on the reasons put forward for curtailing anyone's desire to express their beliefs—above all their political beliefs—in public.

44 In that connection, it is clear both from the evidence before the judge and from some of the argument before us that the factual basis for some of the reasoning in the mayor's letter of 20 May, refusing Democracy Village the right to occupy PSG, was challenged. In particular, it was said by some of the defendants that the presence of the Democracy Village on PSG had plainly not prevented at least three significant demonstrations in Parliament Square and its vicinity since 1 May, and that, far from putting off people from visiting PSG, whether or not for the purpose of demonstrating, the Democracy Village actually encouraged people to come to Parliament Square to express or discuss the views which the defendants supported.

45 The judge received written and oral evidence from Simon Grinter, the head of the Greater London Authority's Facilities and Squares Management (who was closely cross-examined by or on behalf of a number of the defendants), which included a written note from Syed Shah (a PSG warden). He also read witness statements from nine of the defendants, and from various public figures in support of the defendants' case, and heard oral evidence from about 15 of the defendants and a number of supporting witnesses. The effect of that evidence is pretty fully summarised at [2010] EWHC 1613 (QB) at [23]–[74].

46 The judge concluded, at para 133, that there was:

> "a pressing social need not to permit an indefinite camped protest on PSG for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others to access all of

* Reporter's note. The Supreme Court's decision of 3 November 2010 is now reported [2010] 3 WLR 1441.

A PSG and to demonstrate with authorisation but also importantly for the protection of health—the camp has no running water or toilet facilities—and the prevention of crime—there is evidence of criminal damage to the flower beds and of graffiti."

He went on to say that he was:

B "satisfied the GLA and the mayor are being prevented from exercising their necessary powers of control management and care of PSG and the use of PSG by tourists and visitors, by local workers, by those who want to take advantage of its world renowned setting and by others who want to protest lawfully, is being prevented."

47 In my view, in so far as those conclusions amounted to findings of fact, they were, to put it at its lowest, findings which were open to the judge C on the evidence before him. Once those findings were made, there are no grounds for attacking the conclusion reached by the judge in the following paragraph, namely that

"while the removal of the defendants . . . would interfere with their article 10 and article 11 rights, that is a wholly proportionate response and so no defendant has a Convention defence . . . to the claim for D possession."

48 It is important to bear in mind that this was not a case where there is any suggestion that the defendants should not be allowed to express their opinions or to assemble together. The claim against them only relates to their activities on PSG. It is not even a case where they have been absolutely prohibited from expressing themselves and assembling where, or in the E manner, in which they choose. They have been allowed to express their views and assemble together at the location of their choice, PSG, for over two months on an effectively exclusive basis. It is not even as if they will necessarily be excluded from mounting an orthodox demonstration at PSG in the future. Plainly, these points are not necessarily determinative of their case, but, when it comes to balancing their rights against the rights F of others, they are obviously significant factors.

49 The importance of Parliament Square as a location for demonstrations and the importance of the right to demonstrate each cut both ways in this case. It is important that the Democracy Village members are able to express their views through their encampment on PSG, just opposite the Houses of Parliament. However, as Arden LJ rightly said, it is equally important to all the other people who wish to demonstrate on G PSG that the Democracy Village is removed, in the light of the judge's finding, in line with the mayor's view, and (it should be added) the preponderance of the evidence, that the presence of the Democracy Village impedes the ability of others to demonstrate there. Additionally, there are the rights of those who simply want to walk or wander in PSG, not perhaps Convention rights, but none the less important rights connected with H freedom and self-expression. The fact that Democracy Village have been effectively in exclusive occupation of PSG for over two months is also relevant, especially as there is no sign of the camp being struck, as the defendants have, it may be said, had some 70 days to make their point.

50 As to the suggestion that removing all the Democracy Village defendants was an overreaction, Mr Underwood pointed out that this was

A very much an "all or nothing" situation: either all the Democracy Village defendants go, or none of them do. He said, with force, that it was not fair, principled or practical to distinguish between the defendants (save, perhaps, Mr Haw, Mrs Tucker and Ms Sweet, the fourth defendant) when considering whom to evict. There is no good reason to let some of them stay while requiring others to leave: it would involve arbitrary selection; it would encourage other, new, supporters of Democracy Village to join the camp; B it would be unlikely to achieve the ends which the mayor is seeking, and entitled, to achieve. He also made the point that the mayor needed to recover possession in order to control the use of PSG and bring to an end the "first come first served anarchy" which currently prevailed.

51 The defendants relied on the reasoning of Laws LJ in Tabernacle v Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWCA Civ 23; The Times, 25 February C 2009, where this court held an attempt by the Government to prevent a protest camp being held at Aldermaston to be unlawful. However, as the judge pointed out, the facts of that case were very different from those in this case. The protest camp was on a piece of land adjoining the highway by Aldermaston, and the protest was held one weekend every month, and had taken place for over 20 years; further, there was no evidence of any significant obstruction of the highway or to any other public, or indeed D private, right; in addition, no attempt had been made by the Secretary of State to enforce his right, whether to possession or anything else, for all that time. Further, in that case, the need to balance the rights of the defendants to demonstrate against the rights of others to demonstrate did not arise, as of course it does here.

E The injunction should not have been granted in aid of the criminal law

52 The defendants argue that the judge should not have granted the injunction, because, as a matter of principle, it was wrong to invoke the civil law to enforce byelaws which have their own criminal sanction—see section 385(3). As a matter of principle, there is clear authority for the proposition that, particularly where "Parliament has legislated in detail", the courts should at least "in general leave the matter to be dealt with F as Parliament intended . . . save perhaps in exceptional circumstances": Birmingham City Council v Shafi [2009] 1 WLR 1961, para 44, following the principles laid down by Lord Templeman in Stoke-on-Trent City Council v B & Q (Retail) Ltd [1984] AC 754, 776, and Bingham LJ in City of London Corpn v Bovis Construction Ltd [1992] 3 All ER 697, 714. Further, it is clear that Parliament has legislated relevantly on two fairly recent occasions— G namely in the 1999 Act, which, in sections 384 and 385, relates to activities on PSG, and also in the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, which, in sections 132 and 134, contains rather controversial provisions creating criminal offences out of unauthorised demonstrations and similar activities within a specified distance of the Palace of Westminster.

53 There are, in my view, two answers to this argument. The first is that the mayor is entitled, in his capacity of the person in possession of PSG, to H maintain an injunction to remove those in unlawful occupation. Even on the assumption that, as contended by Mr Luba and Mr Wonnacott, the mayor is not entitled to maintain a claim for possession, it is accepted that, if he is entitled to use and control, effectively amounting to possession, he is entitled, in that capacity, to enjoin those in occupation of PSG from

A remaining there. If, as I have concluded, he is entitled to maintain a claim for possession, then, if the facts justify it, he is entitled to an injunction in support of the enforcement of that claim (a view which receives support from the thrust of the reasoning in Meier's case [2009] 1 WLR 2780).

54 In this case, the need to ensure that the defendants remove their tents and placards and do not return was, to my mind, plainly established to the judge's satisfaction. He concluded that the great majority of the defendants B would not be deterred by the threat of criminal proceedings in the magistrates' court from continuing to breach the byelaws. It must follow from this that, if not entitled to sue for possession, the mayor, as the person entitled to possession, was justified in seeking injunctive relief, and that, if he was entitled to sue for possession, he was entitled to seek injunctive relief in support.

C 55 Furthermore, the judge's finding that the criminal procedures provided for in section 385(3) would not operate as a deterrent to the defendants justified his decision to grant an injunction in aid of the enforcement of the byelaws. On this point, the judge said [2010] EWHC 1613 (QB) at [143]:

> "Whereas the standard of proof required in civil proceedings is the D balance of probabilities, I am, in fact, sure that these applications (subject to the exercise of the court's discretion) must succeed. I am satisfied, for the reasons which follow that this is an exceptional case: the identities of most of those taking part in the Democracy Village are unknown—but for their insistence in being joined as defendants to these proceedings, the identities of defendants 5 to 19 would not have been ascertained; it would impose an undue burden on the claimant to institute proceedings against E all the occupiers, with the complicating factor that some of those taking part move in and out of occupation; effecting service would not be straightforward; proceedings in the magistrates' courts would have to be by way of summons, a sometimes prolonged procedure; the refusals, hitherto, of those taking part in the Democracy Village to obey lawful instructions gives no grounds for optimism that there will be future F compliance; indeed a number of the defendants made it clear they have no intention of obeying a court order for possession; . . ."

56 Given these conclusions, which were ones which were plainly open to him on the evidence (to put it at its lowest), I consider that the judge was entitled to grant the injunction that he did, even ignoring the fact that it was sought by the person entitled to possession of the land concerned. In the G B & Q (Retail) case [1984] AC 754, 776J, having said that the court should, in principle, be "reluctant" to grant an injunction in aid of the criminal law which provided for penalties for Sunday trading, Lord Templeman said that "the council were entitled to take the view that the appellants would not be deterred by a maximum fine which was substantially less than the profits which could be made from illegal Sunday trading". So here: the judge found that, albeit for reasons more admirable than money-making, the defendants H would not have been deterred from continuing to breach the byelaws by a level 1 fine in the magistrates' court.

57 Quite apart from this, I do not think that the byelaws were framed with a view to applying to a long-term, or even indefinite, and exclusive, or near-exclusive, occupation of PSG. Although the words of byelaws 5(a)(7), (9) and (10), taken together, cover the sort of operation involved in the Democracy Village, I consider that that sort of exclusive long-term arrangement was not within the contemplation of those who drafted the byelaws. Although I would not suggest that this is a separate reason for upholding the judge's decision to grant an injunction, it is a point which underpins the two reasons which I do consider justify that decision.

Mr Haw's arguments

58 Separate arguments are raised on procedural aspects, on the possession application and order, and on proportionality, by Mr Westgate on behalf of Mr Haw, and, at least arguably, by Mrs Tucker who has joined in his demonstration, and by Ms Sweet, who has also done so, albeit to a lesser extent. As explained above, his long-standing presence on the pavement on the east side of Parliament Square is not challenged in these proceedings. What is challenged is his encroachment onto a small adjoining part of PSG, where he has pitched a tent.

59 Mr Haw makes the general point that he is entirely separate from the other, Democracy Village, defendants. He has pitched his tent on what is only a very small part of the grassed area, and has done so since about 2001 (albeit that he has also pitched it on the pavement where he demonstrates) and there is no suggestion that his presence, unlike that of the Democracy Village defendants, has discouraged other visitors or demonstrators to PSG or has damaged the flowers on PSG.

60 The first of Mr Haw's arguments that it is convenient to consider is that the application and order for possession against Mr Haw both extend to the whole of PSG, and not just the small part which he occupies. At first sight that submission derives some support from the decision in Meier's case [2009] 1 WLR 2780, which underlines the point that possession can only be sought of the land occupied by the defendant. However, where only part of what can fairly be described as one piece of land is occupied by a defendant, it is clear that the owner of the land can claim possession of the whole piece. The point is most clearly made by Lord Rodger JSC at para 10, where he refers to the right to possession of a piece of land as being "indivisible" (and see also paras 67 and 97). Further, where, as here, the whole piece of land is occupied by trespassers, and it is difficult precisely to identify who occupies what part, it is particularly unrealistic to expect the claimant to identify which part each defendant occupies, and practicality is a relevant factor, as the decision in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 establishes.

61 The other arguments raised on behalf of Mr Haw both rely on the contention that his health requires him, or at least makes it better for him, to sleep on the relatively softer grass rather than the pavement, because of an acute medical condition from which he suffers. At first sight, that is answered by Mr Underwood's point that he can get a mattress, but it is said in response that the pavement slopes in a way that prevents sleeping on the pavement being feasible in the light of his medical condition.

62 Mr Haw contends that the application for possession and for the injunction came on speedily because of factors which applied to the other, Democracy Village, defendants, and which had no application to him, as summarised in para 59 above, and that this caused him prejudice, because he was unable to obtain medical reports to support his case that he needed to be able to sleep on the grass. He says that this is very important because, if he

A has to remove the tent and restrain his presence and activities to the pavement, it would be an unfair and disproportionate interference with his presence and activities on the pavement.

63 This contention is not only based on his medical condition, but it is also based on his alleged need to sleep on the grass for reasons of safety, as he is less likely to be hit by traffic or attacked by thugs than if he sleeps on the pavement. I have some doubts about this: if pitched on the grass, his tent B would be very close to the western edge of the eastern pavement, and therefore would be not much further from the traffic and would be equally accessible to thugs. And there is no evidence of his having been harmed in any traffic accident.

64 Mr Haw's argument on proportionality goes wider, in that he says that, while the judge appeared to accept [2010] EWHC 1613 (QB) at [119] C that he was in a different position from the Democracy Village defendants when embarking on the discussion of proportionality, he did not distinguish between him and the other defendants when actually considering that issue. For the reasons identified in para 59 above, he says that his claim to remain on the very small part of PSG occupied by his tent at least deserved separate consideration from the claim against the other, Democracy Village, defendants—particularly when it came to the issue of proportionality.

D 65 I accept that Mr Haw is in a different position from that of the Democracy Village defendants. He and his demonstration are quite separate from them and theirs, he has been demonstrating for far longer, and his demonstration "pitch" is not under attack in these proceedings. Further, his demonstration has not put off visitors or other demonstrators (one rather suspects that the reverse may be the case), and there is no question of his E having damaged the flora on PSG. The evidence as to when he first pitched his tent on the grass, and how often it was pitched there is in dispute, but it does seem as if he has been encamped on PSG for a significantly longer time than the Democracy Village.

66 Mr Underwood's argument that it is wrong for the mayor to try and distinguish between the various occupiers of PSG has, as I have mentioned, great force in relation to all the Democracy Village defendants. While F I accept that it can also be applied to Mr Haw, it appears to me that it has much less force in his case, essentially for the reasons identified in the preceding paragraph. Those reasons may well justify treating Mr Haw differently from the other defendants, as a matter of principle.

67 The judge did not make any findings of fact as to the effect of making an order for possession or granting an injunction against Mr Haw on his G ability to maintain his demonstration or on his rights under article 10 or article 11. Nor did he expressly consider Mr Haw separately from the other defendants when considering the proportionality under articles 10 and 11 of making the orders against him sought by the mayor, although he did consider Mr Haw separately on the issue of the likelihood of his being deterred by magistrates' court proceedings (see [2010] EWHC 1613 (QB) at [148]). Further, although the judge received the medical report on Mr Haw H before he gave judgment, it was only received on the last day of the hearing and Mr Haw had very limited opportunity to consider its contents and to make submissions about it.

68 With considerable hesitation, I have reached the conclusion that the question of whether it was proportionate to make an order for possession and to grant an injunction against Mr Haw should be remitted for reconsideration by the High Court. Although the case against him was weaker than that against the Democracy Village defendants, for the reasons already mentioned, it was still a strong case in the sense that he had no defence to the claims for possession or an injunction other than the argument based on articles 10 and 11. In addition, in an important respect, his argument based on those articles is weaker than that of the other defendants: the orders are not intended to interfere with his desire to continue with his demonstration in Parliament Square. However, he argues that they would make it more difficult, even medically very difficult, for him to do so, because he will have to pitch his tent on the pavement.

69 I entertain very significant doubts whether Mr Haw will be able to persuade a judge that he should be able to maintain a tent on the grassed area of PSG, even if he establishes that, for the medical or other reasons, his being prevented from doing so would render it significantly harder for him to maintain his demonstration on the pavement facing the Houses of Parliament. His right to express his views is not being challenged, and it is by no means clear that, if he had to sleep elsewhere, he would be precluded from maintaining his pitch where it is. Even if his ability to maintain his pitch is, albeit indirectly, under challenge, it might well be stretching his article 10 rights too far to say that he should be entitled, particularly after having done so for so long, to maintain his demonstration in the precise location of his choice, by trespassing on adjoining public property. However, I think that he is entitled to have his case decided on the basis of the medical and other evidence he wishes to put before the court, and to have a reasoned judgment on the issue.

Issues relating to costs

70 The main argument on costs was that of Ms Hall, who was ordered to pay the costs of the possession proceedings, but not of the injunction proceedings, as the judge accepted that she would not disobey the possession order, and would be deterred by magistrates' court proceedings. She said it was illogical that she should have to pay the costs of the possession proceedings and not receive the costs of the injunction proceedings. When Stanley Burnton LJ put to him the point that it would be simpler to make no order for costs as between her and the mayor in relation to the whole proceedings, Mr Underwood realistically and fairly said that he had no submission to make.

71 So far as the other defendants are concerned, it was submitted that it was unfair that each of them should potentially be liable for the costs of an eight-day action, with two directions hearings. I have some sympathy with that view, but the judge did find that the Democracy Village defendants were, as it were, in it together. He said [2010] EWHC 1613 (QB) at [138]:

> "on the evidence and the balance of probabilities I am satisfied in the case of each defendant that he or she knew of such breaches by others who were part of Democracy Village and for the purposes of the criminal law aided and abetted the commission of such breaches."

In the light of that finding, I consider that it is hard for the Democracy Village defendants to object to an order which effectively renders each of them jointly and severally liable for the costs of these proceedings. None the

A less, I would limit the extent of those costs to 80% of the total costs, as part of the costs related to Mr Haw, Mrs Tucker, and Ms Sweet, whose case was separate, and anyway is being remitted.

Conclusions

72 On the various substantive issues which have been raised, I would B grant Mr Haw (and Mrs Tucker and Ms Sweet) permission to appeal on the issue whether it is proportionate to make an order for possession or to grant an injunction against him, grant his appeal, and would remit that issue to the High Court. Otherwise, I would refuse permission to appeal on all other substantive issues, save that the order for possession against the other defendants will have to be amended to exclude the area occupied by Mr Haw's tent.

C 73 I would grant Ms Hall permission to appeal on costs, allow her appeal, and substitute for the partial order for costs against her, a direction that there be no order for costs as between her and the mayor. I would also grant permission to the Democracy Village defendants to appeal on costs. As I have indicated, I would allow their appeal to the extent of limiting their liability to 80%, rather than 100%, of the mayor's costs on a standard basis.

74 No doubt counsel can prepare an appropriate form of order. The D order should include directions to ensure that the rehearing of the claims against Mr Haw is disposed of very speedily.

75 Finally, I would like to express my appreciation to all those, whether lawyers or defendants, who addressed the court orally or in writing: this was a case involving a large number of parties and two significant legal issues, as well as other points, and it was disposed of efficiently and fairly in a day. E Our task was also greatly assisted by the quality of the oral and written submissions and the judgment below.

2012 Feb 13; 22 Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury MR, Stanley Burnton, McFarlane LJJ B

Human rights — Freedom of expression — Freedom of assembly — Interference with — Demonstrators setting up camp in St Paul's Cathedral churchyard obstructing highway and in breach of planning control — Majority of occupied land owned by local authority having planning control over portion of occupied land owned by Church — Judge granting local authority's claims for possession and injunction requiring removal of all tents — Whether unjust interference with demonstrators' Convention rights — Human Rights Act 1998 (c 42), Sch 1, Pt I, arts 10, 11 C

In the middle of October 2011 the defendants and others set up in the churchyard of St Paul's Cathedral a protest camp consisting of a large number of tents, which were used for overnight accommodation, meetings and other activities and services. Many of the occupants of the tents designated their organisation the "Occupy Movement" or "Occupy London" whose concerns were mainly centred on the perceived crisis of capitalism and the banking industry and the inability of democratic institutions to deal with many of the world's most pressing problems. The greater part of the occupied land was open land owned by and under the responsibility of the claimant local authority as planning or highway authority, while a portion was owned by the Church over which the claimant had planning control. The local authority brought proceedings for possession of the occupied land, for an injunction requiring the defendants to remove the tents from all the occupied land and not to erect tents on that land thereafter, and for declarations that the claimant was entitled to remove the tents. The judge found that the defendants had no defence to the claim for possession, that the camp was a clear and unreasonable obstruction of the highway and a breach of planning control, and concluded that the defendants' rights of freedom of expression and freedom of assembly under, respectively, articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[1] were undoubtedly engaged, but that the factors for granting the claimant relief easily outweighed the factors against. The judge considered that the claimant had convincingly established a pressing social need not to permit the camp to remain, that the orders sought represented the least intrusive way to meet that need, and that it would not be disproportionate to grant the relief claimed, and he granted the orders in the claimant's favour. A including but not limited to the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance of the precise location to the protesters, the duration of the protest, the degree to which the protesters occupied the land, and the extent of the actual interference the protest caused to the rights of others as well as the property rights of the owners of the land and the rights of any members of the public; that articles 10 and 11 of the Convention were undoubtedly engaged in that the defendants were entitled to invoke their rights under those provisions in relation B to the maintenance of the camp; that it could be appropriate and fair to take into account the general character of the views whose expression the Convention was being invoked to protect, but that could not be a factor which trumped all others and was unlikely to be particularly weighty; that the judge had taken into account the fact the defendants were expressing strongly held views on very important issues but further analysis of those views and issues would have been unhelpful and inappropriate; that by the time the judge came to give his judgment the camp had been for three months trespassing in the churchyard, substantially interfering with C the public right of way and the rights of those who wished to worship in the cathedral, in breach not just of the owner's property rights and of planning control but significantly causing other problems connected with health, nuisance and the like and some damage to local businesses, and was likely to continue, so that it was very difficult to see how the defendants' Convention rights could ever prevail against the will and rights of the landowner and the rights of others by their continuous and exclusive occupation of public land; that, furthermore, whether a court should make D orders which were less intrusive would require a defendant to propose a specific arrangement which would be workable in practice and would not give rise to such breaches of statutory provisions and the rights of others as in the present case; that no such proposal had been put forward nor realistically could any have been; that, therefore, there was no basis for saying that any of the defendants' criticisms, even taken together, could persuade an appellate court that the judge's decision was wrong; and that, accordingly, the judge had been entitled to reach the conclusion that E he had (post, paras 23, 28, 38, 39, 41, 44, 49, 53–55, 60).

Per curiam. In future cases of this nature, where the facts involve a demonstration which involves not merely occupying public land, but doing so for more than a short period and in a way which not only is in breach of statute but substantially interferes with the rights of others, it should be possible for the hearing to be disposed of at first instance more quickly than in the present case. Little if any court time need be taken up with evidence of the defendant protesters explaining to F the court the views they were seeking to promote. The contents of those views should not be in dispute, and they are very unlikely to be of much significance to the legal issues involved. While it would be wrong to suggest that in every case such evidence should be excluded, a judge should be ready to exercise available case management powers to ensure that hearings in this sort of case did not take up a disproportionate amount of court time (post, paras 62, 63).

APPLICATIONS for permission to appeal

On 15 and 16 October 2011 a protest camp was set up in the churchyard of St Paul's Cathedral consisting of a large number of tents. Notice was served by the claimant, the City of London Corpn, on the camp on 16 November requiring the removal of the tents by the next day. The tents not having been removed, on 18 November the claimant issued proceedings against persons unknown for possession of the highway and other open land in the churchyard and injunctions requiring the removal of the tents and other structures in the camp. On 25 November at a directions hearing Wilkie J appointed Tammy Samede as the representative defendant of those taking part in the protest, and George Barda and Daniel Ashman were added as litigants in person as second and third defendants. After a five-day hearing in December 2011, Lindblom J on 18 January 2012 [2012] EWHC 34 (QB) granted orders for possession in favour of the claimant, an injunction and declarations that the claimant was entitled to remove the tents from all areas, and he refused permission to appeal.

The defendants applied for permission to appeal on the ground that the judge's decision was wrong because it was not the least intrusive interference with the defendants' engaged rights that could be justified under articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms as scheduled to the Human Rights Act 1998. On 30 January 2012, the Court of Appeal (Stanley Burnton LJ) directed that all applications for permission to appeal be listed before a three-judge Court of Appeal to include the Master of the Rolls and two Lords Justices of Appeal on 13 February 2012. The fourth and fifth defendants, Paul Randle-Jolliffe and Stephen Moore were added as parties before the hearing of the permission to appeal.

The facts are stated in the judgment of the court.

22 February 2012. LORD NEUBERGER OF ABBOTSBURY MR
B handed down the following judgment of the court to which all members had contributed.

1 On 18 January 2012 Lindblom J handed down a very full and careful judgment, following a five-day hearing the previous month. Having heard consequential arguments, he then made orders in favour of the Mayor Commonalty and Citizens of the City of London ("the City"), against three
C named defendants Tammy Samede (who had been appointed by the court as a representative defendant), George Barda, and Daniel Ashman and "persons unknown". If implemented, the effect of these orders would be to put an end to the camp which has been located in the St Paul's Cathedral churchyard in London since 15 October 2011, and has received much publicity.

The factual background

2 The camp was described by the judge in his judgment [2012] EWHC 34 (QB) at [4] in these terms:

> "It consists of a large number of tents, between 150 and 200 at the time of the hearing, many of them used by protestors, either regularly or from
> E time to time, as overnight accommodation, and several larger tents used for other activities and services including the holding of meetings and the provision of a 'university' (called 'Tent City University'), a library, a first aid facility, a place for women and children, a place where food and drink are served, and a 'welfare' facility. The size and extent of the camp has varied over time. Shortly before the hearing its footprint receded in some > F places. At an earlier stage some adjustments had been made to it in an effort to keep fire lanes open."

3 Many of the occupiers of the camp have designated their organisation the "Occupy Movement". The concerns of the Occupy Movement were summarised by the judge, at para 155 as:

> "largely [centring] on, but . . . far from being confined to, the
> G crisis—or perceived crisis—of capitalism, and of the banking industry, and the inability— or perceived inability—of traditional democratic institutions to cope with many of the world's most pressing problems. They encompass climate change, social and economic injustice, the iniquitous use of tax havens, the culpability of western governments in a number of conflicts, and many more issues besides. All of these topics,
> H clearly, are of very great political importance."

4 The concerns of those in the camp are well summarised in that passage, and they were well articulated before us. In particular, Mr Barda, Mr Ashman and the Mr Randle-Jolliffe, in powerful, eloquent and concise submissions, advanced the causes which the Occupy Movement and the camp stand for, with a passion which was all the more impressive given the restraint and humour with which their arguments were presented.

5 The majority of the area occupied by the camp consists of a piece of highway land owned by the City, but the occupied area also includes other open land which is owned by the Church. The City's claim was for orders for (i) possession of the highway land which it owns and which is occupied by the camp, (ii) an injunction requiring the removal of the tents from that land, and restraining the erection of tents thereon in the future, (iii) an injunction requiring the removal of the tents from the land owned by the Church, and restraining the erection of tents thereon in the future, (iv) possession of adjoining highway land and open space land owned by the City and onto which it was feared that the camp would move, and (v) an injunction restraining the erection of tents on the adjoining land in the future. Apart from its right to possession of the land referred to in (i) and (iv), the City principally relied on its power to seek injunctive relief under section 130(5) of the Highways Act 1980, as the camp obstructs the highway, and under section 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, as the camp breaches planning control and an enforcement notice has been served.

The judgment of Lindblom J

6 At [2012] EWHC 34 (QB) at [1] the judge identified the general issue which these proceedings involved as being "the limits to the right of lawful assembly and protest on the highway", which, as he said, "[in] a democratic society [is] a question of fundamental importance." More specifically, the judge said that these proceedings raised the question whether the limits on the rights of assembly and protest:

> "extend to the indefinite occupation of highway land by an encampment of protestors who say this form of protest is essential to the exercise of their rights under articles 10 and 11 of the . . . Convention on Human Rights, when the land they have chosen to occupy is in a prominent place in the heart of the metropolis, beside a cathedral of national and international importance, which is visited each year by many thousands of people and where many thousands more come to exercise their right, under article 9 of the Convention, to worship as they choose?"

7 At para 13, the judge correctly identified the three main issues for him as being:

> "first, whether the City has established that it is entitled to possession of [the areas it owns], so that, subject to the court's consideration of the interference with the defendants' rights under articles 10 and 11 of the Convention, an order for possession ought to be granted; second, whether, again subject to the court's consideration of the interference with the defendants' rights, the City should succeed in its claim . . . and third, whether the interference with the defendants' rights entailed in granting relief would be lawful, necessary and proportionate."

8 In the following two paragraphs, he recorded that the City did not dispute that the defendants' rights under articles 10 (freedom of expression)

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A and 11 (freedom of assembly) of the Convention were engaged. He then stated that the City contended that the orders it was seeking did not prevent the defendants from exercising those rights, and that they would amount to a "justified interference" with those rights. He also mentioned that the City's case, in summary terms, was that the defendants could not rely on articles 10 and 11 of the Convention to justify occupying land as "a semi-permanent campsite", particularly bearing in mind that such occupation was B in breach of a number of statutory provisions, infringed the property rights of the City and the Church, and also impeded other members of the public from enjoying their rights, most notably the right of access to the cathedral to worship, which engages article 9 of the Convention (freedom of religion), and obstructed the use of the highway by members of the public generally.

9 The judge then explained, at paras 17–100, in some detail the C evidence which he had heard from witnesses called on behalf of the City and on behalf of the defendants, and some of the distinguished people who had provided written evidence in support of the views supported and propagated by the Occupy Movement. In the next 13 paragraphs he summarised the arguments which had been advanced to him. At paras 114–152, the judge then discussed the various issues which had been raised under three D headings, which reflected the three main issues which he had identified.

10 Under "Possession", at paras 114–126, the judge concluded that the defendants were in occupation of the areas of land owned by the City and had no domestic law defence to the City's possession claim. Under the heading "Injunctive and declaratory relief", in the next 17 paragraphs (paras 127–143), the judge concluded that the camp was "undoubtedly" an E "unreasonable obstruction of the highway" and a breach of planning control, both of which the City had a duty to enforce, and which applied to the area of land owned by the Church.

11 In those circumstances, as the judge said, the only basis upon which the defendants could hope to succeed in resisting the relief sought by the City was under the third heading "Human rights", which he dealt with at paras 144–164. We shall describe his analysis in those paragraphs in a little F more detail.

12 He began by discussing the arguments raised by the defendants. They relied on "the fundamental importance in a democratic society of the rights under articles 10 and 11 of the Convention" (para 154), which was, as the judge accepted, a good point—as far as it went. The defendants also relied on the fundamental importance of the concerns which motivated G them. As to that the judge said, at para 155: "The Convention rights in play are neither strengthened nor weakened by a subjective response to the aims of the protest itself or by the level of support it seems to command." However, he accepted that he should:

> "give due weight not only to the defendants' conviction that their protest is profoundly important but also to their belief that it is essential H to the protest and to its success that it is conducted in the manner and form they have chosen for it—by a protest camp on the land they have occupied in St Paul's Churchyard."

13 It was next contended by the defendants, at para 156, that "some inconvenience to other members of the public would be likely to result even from a lawful protest on this part of the highway." The judge said that, in his view:

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

> "the harm caused by this protest camp, in this place, is materially greater than the harm that would be likely if the protest were conducted by the same protestors, assembling every day but without the tents and all the other impedimenta they have brought to the land."

He went on to reject the "suggestion that the City's main concerns could be met by an injunction stipulating that no tents were to be occupied between certain hours" on the ground that it was "wholly unconvincing". He doubted that it could be enforced. Anyway, he said, "it would not serve to remove the obstruction of the highway" or "overcome the problems attributable to the presence of the camp, including the damage being done to the work of, and worship in, the cathedral, to the amenity of the cathedral's surroundings, and to local businesses".

14 The defendants also relied on the fact that they had been prepared to negotiate after the City resorted to litigation. The judge was unimpressed with that, not least because the defendants and their representatives had not come up with any clear proposals. Finally, the defendants submitted (para 158) that "many of the protestors have done everything they can to limit the impacts of the protest camp." However, the judge said, even accepting that was true, "the defendants have not been able to prevent the camp causing substantial harm", namely obstruction of the highway, nuisance by noise, and "[disruption to] the exercise by others of their Convention rights, including the article 9 rights of those who wish to worship in St Paul's Cathedral".

15 The judge then turned to the five arguments raised by the City which he described as being, in his view, "very strong" (para 159). First, he thought he should give (para 160):

> "considerable weight to the fact that Parliament has legislated to give highway authorities powers and duties to protect public rights over the highway land vested in them, and local planning authorities powers to enforce planning control in the public interest."

He then referred to section 2 of the Local Government Act 2000, section 137 of the Highways Act 1980, section 179 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, section 269 of the Public Health Act 1936, and section 2 of the Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict c 32). He said that the significant point was that:

> "the continued presence of the protest camp on this land is plainly at odds with the intent and purpose of [those] statutory schemes . . . The corollary is this. For Parliament's intention in enacting those statutory schemes to be given effect it is necessary for the relief sought by the City to be granted."

16 Secondly, as the judge accepted (para 161), "it would be impossible . . . to reconcile the presence of the protest camp with the lawful function and character of this land as highway". He drew support from what was said in this court in Mayor of London (on behalf of the Greater London Authority) v Hall [2011] 1 WLR 504, para 48.

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A 17 Thirdly, the judge (para 162) was "convinced that the effects of [the] protest camp . . . have been such as to interfere seriously with the rights, under article 9 of the Convention, of those who desire to worship in the cathedral". He explained that:

> "During the camp's presence, and, in my view, largely if not totally as a result of its presence, there has been a drop of about two fifths in the B numbers of those worshipping in the cathedral. About the same fraction has been lost in the number of visitors, an important source of funds for the upkeep of the building and for its ministry".

He also took into account "the effects of the presence of the protest camp on the work and morale of the cathedral staff as a significant factor in the balancing exercise", referring to the fact that "noise from the camp has been C a persistent problem", that "members of the cathedral's staff have been verbally abused", and that "[graffiti have] been scrawled on the Chapter House and on the cathedral itself".

18 Fourthly, at para 163, the judge explained that the camp caused other problems. By interfering with the public right of way, and reducing pedestrian traffic, the camp had, he thought, "damaged the trade of local D businesses". Also, as the judge found, it had resulted in a "loss of open space that the public can get to", "has strained the local drainage system beyond capacity", "has caused nuisance by the generation of noise and smell", and "has made a material change in the use of the land for which planning permission would not be granted". The judge also thought that, albeit perhaps only indirectly, the camp had resulted in "an increase in crime and E disorder around the cathedral". Fifthly, the judge said, at para 164, "the length of time for which the camp has been present is relevant", citing the Hall case, at para 49.

19 The judge therefore concluded, at paras 165–166, that "when the balance is struck, the factors for granting relief in this case easily outweigh the factors against", that the City had "undoubtedly" "convincingly F established a pressing social need not to permit the defendants' protest camp to remain in St Paul's Churchyard, and to prevent it being located elsewhere on any of the land to which these proceedings relate", and that it would "undoubtedly" not be "disproportionate to grant the relief the City has claimed". He was clear that the orders the City was seeking represented "the least intrusive way in which to meet the pressing social need, and strikes a fair balance between the needs of the community and the individuals G concerned so as not to impose an excessive burden on them", and that to withhold relief would simply be "wrong".

These applications

20 After hearing argument as to the form of order which he should make, Lindblom J concluded that he should make: (1) orders for possession H in respect of the two areas of land owned by the City at St Paul's Churchyard and occupied by the defendants; (2) an injunction requiring the defendants (a) to remove forthwith all tents in the area currently occupied by the camp, (b) not to impede the City's agents from removing such tents, and (c) not to erect tents on the other areas around the cathedral the subject of the proceedings; and (3) declarations that the City could remove tents from all those areas.

21 Lindblom J refused permission to appeal, but the three named defendants, Ms Samede, Mr Barda, and Mr Ashman, then applied for permission to appeal from this court. Their written applications came before Stanley Burnton LJ, who ordered that the applications be heard in court with the appeals to follow if permission to appeal is granted.

22 The hearing of those applications took place on 13 February and lasted a full day. Ms Samede and Mr Barda were respectively represented by Mr Cooper QC and Mr Paget and by Ms Williams (who were acting pro bono, and should be commended for that), and Mr Ashman represented himself. Many other members of the Occupy Movement attended (and unfortunately the court room was not big enough to accommodate all of them). Two of them, Mr Randle-Jolliffe and Mr Moore, made submissions in support of an appeal, and they were added as parties.

23 Having heard the arguments we decided to reserve judgment on the question of whether to allow the projected appeals to proceed, and if so, on what points. We have decided that permission to appeal should be refused, for the reasons which follow.

Are articles 10 and 11 engaged?

24 Stanley Burnton LJ raised the question whether it was clear that the City was right to concede that articles 10 and 11 of the Convention were engaged. The European Court of Human Rights ("the Strasbourg court") jurisprudence establishes that it was. In that connection it is worth referring to Kuznetsov v Russia (Application No 10877/04) (unreported) 23 October 2008 where the Strasbourg court considered the case of an applicant who took part in a small demonstration which, for a short time, obstructed access to a public court building. The court, at para 35,

> "[reiterated] at the outset that the right to freedom of assembly covers both private meetings and meetings on public thoroughfares, as well as static meetings and public processions; this right can be exercised both by individual participants and by those organising the assembly . . ."

25 As for article 10, it is clear from the Strasbourg court's decision in Lucas v United Kingdom (Application No 39013/02) (unreported) 18 March 2003, "that protests can constitute expressions of opinion within the meaning of article 10 and that the arrest and detention of protesters can constitute interference with the right to freedom of expression".

26 In Appleby v United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHRR 783 the Strasbourg court held that article 10 and article 11 raised the same issues in a case where a group of people were banned from seeking to collect signatures for a petition from shoppers in a privately owned shopping centre. It was held that there was no infringement of the Convention because the ban did not have "the effect of preventing any effective exercise of freedom of expression or [of destroying] the essence of the right", not least because they could carry out their activities elsewhere: paras 47 and 48.

27 Domestic law is consistent with this view. Thus in R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire Constabulary [2007] 2 AC 105, paras 36 and 37 Lord Bingham of Cornhill made it clear that state authorities have a

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A positive duty to take steps to ensure that lawful public demonstrations can take place, and the same view was taken by this court in the Hall case [2011] 1 WLR 504. Tabernacle v Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWCA Civ 23; The Times, 25 February 2009 is also worth mentioning. In that case bylaws preventing the maintenance of the long-standing, one weekend a month, Aldermaston Women's Peace Camp, protesting on government B owned open land against nuclear weapons, were held to breach the protesters' Convention rights. As Laws LJ said, at para 37: "the camp has borne consistent, long-standing, and peaceful witness to the convictions of the women who have belonged to it', and, to the protesters, " 'the manner and form' is the protest itself".

28 It is clear from the judge's findings, and from what was said by the defendants who addressed us, that the Occupy Movement seeks to C propagate the views summarised by Lindblom J in the passage, set out in para 3 above, to educate members of the public about those views, and to engage in dialogue with others about those views. It is also clear that this aim is sought to be achieved through the activities, leaflets, books, newspapers and speeches at the camp, reinforced by its attendant publicity, which is partly attributable to its large size and prominent location, not D merely in the City of London (the heart of the financial world), but in the churchyard of St Paul's Cathedral. In those circumstances it seems clear that articles 10 and 11 of the Convention are engaged—i e the defendants can invoke their rights under those provisions of the Convention in relation to the maintenance of the camp. (During the hearing it was suggested that at least some of the defendants might also be entitled to invoke article 9; it is E unnecessary to decide the point, as it can take matters no further in the same way as article 11 took matters no further over article 10 in the Appleby case 37 EHRR 783, para 52.)

The argument that the judge should have dismissed the City's claim

29 With the exception of Ms Samede, the defendants making the F present applications are seeking to set aside all the orders made by Lindblom J, on the basis that they contend that the judge ought not to have found for the City at all, but should have dismissed the claim and allowed the camp to continue in place. It is convenient to deal first with one or two rather esoteric arguments raised by Mr Randle-Jolliffe.

30 First, he challenged the judgment on the ground that it did not apply G to him, as a "Magna Carta heir". But that is a concept unknown to the law. He also says that his "Magna Carta rights" would be breached by execution of the orders. But only chapters 1, 9 and 29 of Magna Carta (1297 version) survive. Chapter 29, with its requirement that the state proceeds according to the law, and its prohibition on the selling or delaying of justice, is seen by many as the historical foundation for the rule of law in England, but it has no bearing on the arguments in this case. Somewhat ironically, the other H two chapters concern the rights of the Church and the City of London, and cannot help the defendants. Mr Randle-Jolliffe also invokes "constitutional and superior law issues" which, he alleges, prevail over statutory, common law, and human rights law. Again that is simply wrong—at least in a court of law.

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

31 Another ground he raised was the contention that the City had no locus standi to bring the proceedings "as the current mayoral position has been previously usurped by the guilds and aldermen in contravention of the City of London's 1215 Royal Charter". We do not understand that point, not least because both the Lord Mayor and the aldermen and guilds (through the Commonalty and Citizens) are included in the claimants.

32 Three arguments raised by Ms Williams on behalf of Mr Barda, and supported by Mr Ashman, can also be taken shortly. First, it was said that the City's arguments based on the breach of the various statutes identified in the judgment, and the public rights and the City's powers and duties under the statutes referred to, are not of themselves enough to render the judge's decision proportionate. Even if that is right (and we rather doubt whether it is) these concerns were only the subject of the first of the five reasons which, when combined, persuaded the judge to reach the conclusion that he reached.

33 Secondly, it was said that the judge was wrong to take into account the increase in crime: [2012] EWHC 34 (QB) at [163]. It is true that the evidence showed that the police considered that those responsible for the camp had done their best to minimise the risk of criminal activity, but there was evidence that crime had increased in the area, so there was evidence which justified the judge's view. But the point can be said to cut both ways: there is no guarantee that the admirable care to ensure that criminal activity is kept to a minimum would continue. Anyway, it is fanciful to suggest that the judge would not have reached the conclusion that he did if he had thought that the evidence or arguments did not satisfy him that he should take this factor into account.

34 Thirdly, it was said that the judge ought not to have found as he did, at para 162, that there was any interference with the rights of those who wished to worship at St Paul's Cathedral, given that (a) no worshipper gave evidence, and (b) the Occupy Movement stands for the same values as the Church of England. As to (a), the judge was plainly entitled to reach the conclusion that he arrived at. He had figures which showed a very significant reduction in worshippers at, and visitors to, the cathedral since the camp had arrived, and evidence of opinion from the cathedral registrar that the reduction was caused by the camp. While there were some other possible explanations for the reduction, the judge was, to put it at its lowest, entitled to reach the view that he did. As to point (b), it is true that some prominent members of the Church of England have expressed support for the camp, but that is no answer to the judge's concern about the interference by the camp with the access of people who wish to worship in the cathedral.

35 Mr Ashman had two further criticisms of the judgment. First, he complained that the judge wrongly referred to the camp as a "protest" camp. We accept that the aims of Occupy London are not by any means limited to protesting in the familiar sense of, say, a protest march. The aims of the movement, as implemented in the camp, include education, heightening awareness and fostering debate. However, the judge was plainly aware of this, as the passages in his judgment quoted in paras 2 and 3 above demonstrate. Further those activities do include protesting; indeed they may be said to be based on protesting, in the sense that the Occupy Movement's raison d'être is, at least to a substantial extent, based on its opposition to

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A many of the policies, especially economic, financial, and environmental policies, adopted by the United Kingdom Government.

36 Secondly, it is said that the defendants intend to strike the camp, possibly by the end of this month. It is by no means clear that this would happen voluntarily. Indeed, the impression given by Mr Ashman, when he was asked about this, was that the camp would only be struck when the B Occupy Movement believed that it had had a definite effect in the form of some sort of change of government policy. All in all it appears improbable that the camp will cease voluntarily within the next few months. If the judge was otherwise right to make the orders which were made, it would have required a very clear commitment by the defendants to vacate the churchyard in the very near future before there could even have been any possibility of justifying the judge not making the orders.

C 37 The broadest argument in support of the contention that the orders made by Lindblom J should simply be set aside is rather more fundamental. That argument is that, assuming the correctness of all the findings of fact made, and the relevant factors identified, by the judge in his judgment, it was an unjustified interference with the defendants' Convention rights to make any order which closed down the camp. This argument amounts to saying D that articles 10 and 11 effectively mandated the judge to hold that the camp should be allowed to continue in its current form, presumably for the foreseeable future. The basis of this argument is that, on the facts of this case, there was an insufficiently "pressing social need in a democratic society" to justify the orders which the judge made, bearing in mind the defendants' article 10 and 11 rights.

E 38 This argument raises the question which the judge identified at the start of his judgment, namely "the limits to the right of lawful assembly and protest on the highway", using the word "protest" in its broad sense of meaning the expression and dissemination of opinions. In that connection as the judge observed, at para 100, it is clear that, unless the law is that "assembly on the public highway may be lawful, the right contained in article 11.1 of the Convention is denied"—quoting Lord Irvine of Lairg F LC in Director of Public Prosecutions v Margaret Jones [1999] 2 AC 240, 259. However, as the judge also went on to say, at para 145:

> "To camp on the highway as a means of protest was not held lawful in Director of Public Prosecutions v Jones. Limitations on the public right of assembly on the highway were noticed, both at common law and under article 11 of the Convention: see Lord Irvine LC at p 259A–G, Lord Slynn G of Hadley at p 265C–G, Lord Hope of Craighead at p 277D–278D, and Lord Clyde at p 280F. In a passage of his speech that I have quoted above Lord Clyde expressed his view that the public's right did not extend to camping."

39 As the judge recognised, the answer to the question which he identified at the start of his judgment is inevitably fact sensitive, and will H normally depend on a number of factors. In our view, those factors include (but are not limited to) the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance of the precise location to the protesters, the duration of the protest, the degree to which the protesters occupy the land, and the extent of the actual interference the protest causes to the rights of others, including the property rights of the owners of the land, and the rights of any members of the public.

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

40 The defendants argue that the importance of the issues with which the Occupy Movement is concerned is also of considerable relevance. That raises a potentially controversial point, because as the judge said, at para 155:

> "it is not for the court to venture views of its own on the substance of the protest itself, or to gauge how effective it has been in bringing the protestors' views to the fore. The Convention rights in play are neither strengthened nor weakened by a subjective response to the aims of the protest itself or by the level of support it seems to command . . . the court cannot—indeed, must not—attempt to adjudicate on the merits of the protest. To do that would go against the very spirit of articles 10 and 11 of the Convention . . . the right to protest is the right to protest right or wrong, misguidedly or obviously correctly, for morally dubious aims or for aims that are wholly virtuous."

41 Having said that, we accept that it can be appropriate to take into account the general character of the views whose expression the Convention is being invoked to protect. For instance, political and economic views are at the top end of the scale, and pornography and vapid tittle-tattle is towards the bottom. In this case the judge accepted that the topics of concern to the Occupy Movement were "of very great political importance": para 155. In our view, that was something which could fairly be taken into account. However, it cannot be a factor which trumps all others, and indeed it is unlikely to be a particularly weighty factor: otherwise judges would find themselves according greater protection to views which they think important, or with which they agree. As the Strasbourg court said in Kuznetsov v Russia, para 45:

> "any measures interfering with the freedom of assembly and expression other than in cases of incitement to violence or rejection of democratic principles—however shocking and unacceptable certain views or words used may appear to the authorities—do a disservice to democracy and often even endanger it. In a democratic society based on the rule of law, the ideas which challenge the existing order must be afforded a proper opportunity of expression through the exercise of the right of assembly as well as by other lawful means . . ."

The judge took into account the fact that the defendants were expressing views on very important issues, views which many would see as being of considerable breadth, depth and relevance, and that the defendants strongly believed in the views they were expressing. Any further analysis of those views and issues would have been unhelpful, indeed inappropriate.

42 In Appleby v United Kingdom 37 EHRR 783 the Strasbourg court accepted that the applicants' article 10 and 11 rights were engaged, but held, at para 43, that there was no infringement of those rights because "[regard] must also be had to the property rights of the owner of the [privately owned] shopping centre", and there were other places where the applicants could exercise their article 10 and 11 rights. While St Paul's Churchyard is a particularly attractive location for the movement, in view of its prominence

A in the City of London, the judge's orders clearly do not prevent the movement protesting anywhere other than the churchyard. And there are many "rights" with which the camp interferes adversely.

43 The level of public disruption which a protest on public land may legitimately cause before interference with article 10 and 11 rights is justified was discussed by the Strasbourg court in the Kuznetsov case, para 44. After B explaining that the demonstration in that case had lasted about half an hour, and had blocked the public passage giving access to a court house, the court emphasised that a degree of tolerance is required from the state, and then said this:

> "The court considers the following elements important for the assessment of this situation. Firstly, it is undisputed that there were no C complaints by anyone, whether individual visitors, judges or court employees, about the alleged obstruction of entry to the court house by the picket participants. Secondly, even assuming that the presence of several individuals on top of the staircase did restrict access to the entrance door, it is creditable that the applicant diligently complied with the officials' request and without further argument descended the stairs onto the pavement. Thirdly, it is notable that the alleged hindrance was D of an extremely short duration. Finally, as a general principle, the court reiterates that any demonstration in a public place inevitably causes a certain level of disruption to ordinary life, including disruption of traffic, and that it is important for the public authorities to show a certain degree of tolerance towards peaceful gatherings if the freedom of assembly guaranteed by article 11 of the Convention is not to be deprived of all E substance . . . Accordingly, the court is not satisfied that the alleged obstruction of passage, especially in the circumstances where the applicant gave evidence of his flexibility and readiness to cooperate with the authorities, was a relevant and sufficient reason for the interference."

44 In that case, the demonstration amounted to a trespass and blocked a public right of way, but it not only lasted only 30 minutes, but it appeared to F interfere with no public rights in practice, and ended as soon as the police requested it to end. In this case, by the time that Lindblom J came to give his judgment, the camp was, and had been for three months, (i) trespassing in St Paul's Churchyard, (ii) substantially interfering with the public right of way and the rights of those who wished to worship in the cathedral, (iii) in breach of planning control, and (iv) causing strain on public health facilities, and G some damage to local businesses. In those circumstances, far from it not being open to the judge to make the orders that he made, it seems to us that there is a very powerful case indeed for saying that, if he had refused to make any order in the City's favour, this court would have reversed him.

45 The facts of this case are a long way from those in the Tabernacle case [2009] EWCA Civ 23 where (i) members of the public (and therefore, at least prima facie the protesters) had the right to pitch tents where the protest H was camped, (ii) the protest camp was in place only one weekend a month, (iii) there was no interference with any third party rights, (iv) the very object of their protest was on adjoining land owned by the same public landowner, and (v) the protest had continued for 20 years with no complaint. On the other hand, in one respect the defendants' case is stronger than that of the applicants in Appleby v United Kingdom in that the land involved here is publicly owned; against that, the activities of the applicants in the Appleby case, unlike those of the defendants here, did not involve possessing the land concerned, or interfering with its use by other people, or with the enjoyment of other peoples' Convention rights.

46 The contrast between the facts of this case and those in the Kuznetsov case is very marked. In that case the period of occupation of the public passage way by the protesters was less than an hour, during which the protesters accommodated the requests of the authorities, there was no evidence of any actual obstruction of anyone else's rights, and there was no suggestion of the breach of any statutory provisions or of any nuisance or public health implications. It is true that the Convention rights of the protesters in the Kuznetsov case were held to be infringed, but the way in which the Strasbourg court expressed itself (as quoted at para 43 above) is not helpful to the defendants in this case, to put it mildly. That point is reinforced by the fact, pointed out by the judge [2012] EWHC 34 (QB) at [145], that "complaints brought against evictions in cases where a protest on a far smaller scale than [the camp] has blocked a public road or occupied a public space have been held inadmissible [by the Commission]": see G v Federal Republic of Germany (1989) 60 DR 256 and G v Norway (1984) 6 EHRR SE 357.

47 It is worth referring in a little more detail to the Commission's decision in G v Germany, not least because it was cited with approval by the Strasbourg court in its judgment in Lucas v United Kingdom 18 March 2003. G v Germany 60 DR 256 concerned a sit-in, which was a protest against nuclear arms and which obstructed a highway, which gave access to a United States army barracks in Germany, for 12 minutes every hour. Consistently with all the relevant authorities, the Commission said that it considered that "the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is secured to everyone who organises or participates in a peaceful demonstration." However, it went on to say:

> "the applicant's conviction for having participated in a sit-in can reasonably be considered as necessary in a democratic society for the prevention of disorder and crime. In this respect, the Commission considers especially that the applicant had not been punished for his participation in the demonstration . . . as such, but for particular behaviour in the course of the demonstration, namely the blocking of a public road, thereby causing more obstruction than would normally arise from the exercise of the right of peaceful assembly. The applicant and the other demonstrators had thereby intended to attract broader public attention to their political opinions concerning nuclear armament. However, balancing the public interest in the prevention of disorder and the interest of the applicant and the other demonstrators in choosing the particular form of a sit-in, the applicant's conviction for the criminal offence of unlawful coercion does not appear disproportionate to the aims pursued."

48 The domestic case with the greatest similarity to this case is the Hall case [2011] 1 WLR 504, which was concerned with a protest camp, known as the Democracy Village, on Parliament Square Gardens ("PSG") opposite

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A the Houses of Parliament in London. In that case, at paras 46–47, this court held that it was "to put it at its lowest . . . open to the judge" to conclude that there was

> "a pressing social need not to permit an indefinite camped protest on PSG for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others to access all of PSG and to demonstrate with authorisation but also importantly for the B protection of health . . . and the prevention of crime" as well as to enable "the use of PSG by tourists and visitors, by local workers, by those who want to take advantage of its world renowned setting and by others who want to protest lawfully, is being prevented".

49 It would be unhelpful to attempt to determine whether in these proceedings the City had a stronger or weaker case than the Mayor of C London in the Hall case. Indeed, if the court entered into such a debate, it would risk trespassing into the forbidden territory discussed by the judge in the passages referred to in para 12 above. The essential point in the Hall case and in this case is that, while the protesters' article 10 and 11 rights are undoubtedly engaged, it is very difficult to see how they could ever prevail against the will of the landowner when they are continuously and D exclusively occupying public land, breaching not just the owner's property rights and certain statutory provisions, but significantly interfering with the public and Convention rights of others, and causing other problems (connected with health, nuisance, and the like), particularly in circumstances where the occupation has already continued for months, and is likely to continue indefinitely.

50 During the hearing of the applications, reliance was placed on the E fact that the camp was also used as a place where the homeless could be accommodated. That is a new argument, not raised below. Further, although it may add article 8 of the Convention into the issues, in that it might be said that the orders made below would involve evicting the formerly homeless from their homes, we do not think that the point can possibly assist the defendants. It must be doubtful whether the very F temporary sleeping facilities at the camp afforded to some homeless people results in their article 8 rights being engaged. Even if it does, the defendants' article 10 and 11 (and possibly article 9) rights are not nearly close enough to balancing the factors in favour of making Lindblom J's orders, for the relatively weak article 8 rights in play to have any possibility of tipping the balance the other way.

The argument that the judge should have made more limited orders

51 In reliance on the principle that, even where it concludes that it is appropriate to make an order which interferes with an individual's Convention rights, the court should ensure that it identifies the least intrusive way of effecting such interference, Mr Cooper contends that the orders made by the judge were too extreme. The judge could, and should, he argues, have H made an order which was less intrusive of the defendants' Convention rights than the orders which he made.

52 The first problem with that argument is that only one possible alternative to maintaining the camp in its current state was put to the judge, namely that which he discussed in para 13 above. The judge rejected that possibility for reasons which appear to us to be plainly good, and which were not challenged by Mr Cooper. However, says Mr Cooper, the judge was none the less under a duty to investigate, effectively it would appear on his own initiative, whether there was an order which he could make which would be less intrusive than those that he did make. Furthermore, says Mr Cooper, in reliance on what Lord Bingham said in A v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] 2 AC 68, para 44, if the judge did not perform that duty, the Court of Appeal should do so.

53 We are prepared to assume that in some cases a court may have a duty to investigate whether there is a less intrusive order which could be made, even though this would involve the court taking the point itself (although that assumption seems arguably inconsistent with what the Supreme Court said, albeit on a slightly different point in Manchester City Council v Pinnock (Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government intervening [2011] PTSR 61; [2011] 2 AC 104, para 61). However, as already mentioned, the point was in fact taken by the defendants, and justifiably rejected by the judge. Assuming that the judge's duty none the less required him to consider the question further, it seems to us that it cannot have required him to do more than to raise the issue with the defendants. If they were then to persuade him to make any less intrusive order than he did, they would have had to come up with a specific arrangement which (i) would be workable in practice, (ii) would not give rise, at least to anything like the same degree, as the breaches of statutory provisions and other peoples' rights, as the current state of affairs, and (iii) would be less intrusive of the defendants' Convention rights as the orders made by the judge.

54 The defendants did not put forward a proposal which satisfied any of those criteria to the judge; nor did they put forward any such proposal to the Court of Appeal. In our view, therefore, it was not open to the judge, and it would not be open to the Court of Appeal to make any such less intrusive order. If we had been presented with a proposal which was said to satisfy the three requirements referred to at the end of the previous paragraph, then we would have had to consider whether it was arguably capable of doing so, and if it had been, we would have considered allowing permission to appeal on the basis that the case would be sent back to Lindblom J.

55 However, it is only right to add that we are very sceptical as to whether any such proposal could realistically have been put forward in this case (which may well explain why it has not happened). It is not merely that the tents appear to be an integral part of the message (to use a compendious word) which the Occupy Movement is seeking to maintain through the medium of the camp, and it is impossible to see how they could remain in St Paul's Churchyard. It is also that we think it unlikely that any scheme which satisfied the second and third of the three requirements would have much prospect of satisfying the first.

Mr Moore's application

56 Mr Moore's position is rather different. Although he occupies one of the tents in the churchyard, he is not a member of the Occupy Movement and is a member of a different, smaller group, albeit one whose principles are similar to those of the movement. His case is simply that, although bound by

© 2012 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A the orders as one of the "Persons Unknown" or as a result of Ms Samede representing all those in occupation of the churchyard, he should be allowed to appeal as neither he nor his tent was served with the City's claim form.

57 There is telling evidence to support the view that his tent was served, but the issue is sufficiently debatable for this court to accept that it cannot be decided without proper evidence. However, despite that, we do not consider B that Mr Moore has a good argument for setting the orders made aside, at least so far as they relate to him.

58 First, he saw all the papers relating to the proceedings, and clearly must have appreciated that the City was claiming possession of the land occupied by his tent, and was seeking removal of his tent. That is because, as he fairly told us, he is not unfamiliar with legal proceedings, and had advised the Occupy Movement about the City's claims for possession orders and C injunctive relief, for which purpose he was supplied with all the court papers.

59 Secondly, essentially for the reasons contained in this judgment as to why permission to appeal should be refused to the other defendants, it seems to us that he would have no reasonable prospect of persuading the Court of Appeal that he could possibly succeed in defending the proceedings if they D were re-heard as against him.

Concluding remarks

60 For these reasons, we would refuse all the defendants permission to appeal against the orders made by Lindblom J. There is no chance that any of the criticisms raised by each of the defendants, or even all of those E criticisms taken together, could persuade an appellate court that his decision was wrong. Like Griffith-Williams J at first instance in the Hall case [2010] HRLR 723, in a very clear and careful judgment Lindblom J reached a conclusion which, to put it at its very lowest, he was plainly entitled to reach. Indeed, as Mr Forsdick put it on behalf of the City, this was, on the judge's findings of fact and analysis of the issues, not a marginal case.

61 The hearing of this case took up five days and resulted in a F conspicuously full and careful judgment. The hearing at first instance in the Hall case took eight days and also resulted in a detailed and clear judgment. Each case has now also resulted in a full judgment on the application for permission to appeal. There is now, therefore, guidance available for first instance judges faced with cases of a similar nature; indeed, that is part of the purpose of this judgment.

G 62 Of course, each case turns on its facts, and where Convention rights are engaged, case law indicates that the court must examine the facts under a particularly sharp focus. None the less, in future cases of this nature (where the facts involve a demonstration which involves not merely occupying public land, but doing so for more than a short period and in a way which not only is in breach of statute but substantially interferes with the rights of H others), it should be possible for the hearing to be disposed of at first instance more quickly than in the present case or in the Hall case.

63 For instance, in each case a significant amount of court time was taken up by the defendant protesters explaining to the court the views they were seeking to promote. In strict principle, little if any court time need be taken up with such evidence. The contents of those views should not be in dispute, and, as we have sought to explain, they are very unlikely to be of much significance to the legal issues involved. Of course, any judge hearing such a case will not want to be thought to be muzzling defendants, who want to explain their passionately held views in order to justify their demonstration (and, at least where the defendants are as they are in this case, it is informative and thought provoking to hear those views). Accordingly, while it would be wrong to suggest that in every case such evidence should be excluded, a judge should be ready to exercise available case management powers to ensure that hearings in this sort of case do not take up a disproportionate amount of court time.

64 We recognise, of course, that it is one thing for the Court of Appeal to make that sort of observation about a hypothetical future claim, and that it can be quite another thing for a trial judge, faced with a difficult actual claim, to comply with it. None the less, with the benefit of the guidance given in two first instance judgments and two judgments of the Court of Appeal (and the Strasbourg and domestic decisions referred to above), it is not unreasonable to hope that future cases of this sort will be capable of being disposed of more expeditiously.

65 Not least for that reason, this judgment, like that in the Hall case [2011] 1 WLR 504, may be cited as an authority, notwithstanding that it is a decision refusing permission to appeal.

Applications refused.

THE HONOURABLE MR JUSTICE EADY

Mr Justice Eady :

1. In this libel action the University of Salford sues Dr Gary Duke over a number of blogs published by him towards the end of 2009. He applied to have the action struck out before District Judge Richmond in Manchester on 10 March 2012 on the basis that there was no reasonable prospect of success and/or that the claim was an abuse of process. This application was rejected, however, and permission to appeal was initially refused, both by the District Judge and, on paper, by Hickinbottom J on 27 June last year. A renewed application was granted by Bean J at an oral hearing so as to enable two specific matters to be resolved. The first question was a pure matter of law; namely whether a university can sue for libel at all. On the assumption that it has the capacity to bring such proceedings, the second issue for which permission was granted was whether or not this claim, or any part of it, should be struck out in accordance with the principles outlined by the Court of Appeal in Jameel (Yousef) v Dow Jones Inc [2005] QB 946.

2. I was surprised by the submission that no university has the capacity to sue for libel: see e.g. University of Glasgow v Economist Ltd [1997] EMLR 495 and Hong Kong Polytechnic University v Next Magazine Publishing Ltd [1997] 7 HKPLR 286. I had always understood that a university would be able to sue to protect its reputation (provided the words complained of genuinely referred to the university itself, as opposed to identifiable individuals with responsibilities for its administration) and that they were such as to damage its reputation. Dr Duke, however, wished to revive an argument very similar to, if not identical with, the submission that was rejected by the Hong Kong Court of Appeal in the Next Magazine case. Obviously, the High Court in this jurisdiction is not bound by such a decision, but Dr Duke argues that it should not be followed in any event because, in the first place, it is simply wrong and, secondly, because Hong Kong jurisprudence does not have to take account of Article 10 of the ECHR, which enshrines and protects the rights of citizens to communicate freely and impart information.

3. The argument which Dr Duke wishes to resurrect is that the decision of the House of Lords in Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534 has the effect of preventing universities from suing for libel on the basis that they are to be regarded as public or governmental bodies providing higher education on behalf of central government which has delegated the task to them. This is simply not correct. Mr Rushbrooke, appearing for the University, pointed out that it is not the function of government to administer or provide higher education. He described that as an "Orwellian" prospect.

4. Of course, it is true that universities receive large sums of public money and that they have to comply with various statutory provisions, but that is not to say that they are to be equated with central or local government. The Court of Appeal in Hong Kong held that the Derbyshire case was distinguishable. As it was put by Litton VP at p.291:

> "In my judgment, the consultations which govern a body like a university are far removed from those in the Derbyshire County Council case. In no way does the university take part in the government of Hong Kong. It is not an organ of government, democratically elected or otherwise. If public interest be the > test, I would hold that it strongly favours the protection of the reputation of institutions of learning like the university."

5. In this jurisdiction, if it were decided that as a matter of public policy universities should not have the right to sue for libel, that could only be implemented by the legislature or, perhaps, by the Supreme Court. In this respect, therefore, I would uphold the decision of the District Judge. It follows incidentally that the related argument put forward by Dr Duke, to the effect that a decision adverse to him would open the "floodgates" and lead to a multiplicity of libel actions brought by universities and colleges of higher education, is simply misconceived. No such flood has resulted from the law as it now stands.

6. The important question on the present appeal, therefore, is whether the claim should be struck out as an abuse of process or, as I would formulate it more specifically, whether the words complained of do actually refer to the University or defame it.

7. One can envisage circumstances in which allegations of a general nature about a university could cause genuine damage to its reputation. Such allegations, if they reflect adversely upon its employment practices or admissions policy, might well discourage prospective employees or students from making applications. One can readily understand that such an institution would have a reputation as an employer and as a teaching or research body. What must be of central importance in every case is the extent to which the words do indeed reflect upon the university itself.

8. From time to time, it has been emphasised how important it is for the court to be wary, in cases where a corporate entity is suing for libel, to ensure that it is not being "put up" or used as a protective shield when the real gravamen of the defamatory words is to reflect upon the reputation of an individual or individuals: see e.g. Gatley on Libel and Slander (11th edn) at para 28.4, n.16; Carter-Ruck on Libel and Privacy (6th edn) at para 8.7, n.1; and Duncan & Neill on Defamation (3rd edn) at para 10.05, n.1. Considerations of this kind have a particular resonance in the present case.

9. The words complained of appeared on a website under the name "Rat Catchers of the Sewers". A blog was operated, whereby members of the public or students of the University were encouraged to make contributions to an ongoing discussion either anonymously or by way of pseudonyms. It seems that one of the main functions of the blog was to provide a platform for criticism of various aspects of the University's administration.

10. Dr Duke criticises the lack of particularity, as he sees it, in the words complained of in the particulars of claim, but it is possible to identify the main thrust of the complaints. It would be tedious to set out all of the allegations identified in the pleading, but the publications are identified in sub-paragraphs 7(a)-(j). There is no doubt that the University was referred to in various contexts and criticisms were made as to the way it was being administered. A persistent theme, however, was the focus upon two individuals in particular, namely Dr Adrian Graves and Professor Martin Hall. Professor Hall is the Vice-Chancellor of the University and Dr Graves holds the post of Deputy Vice-Chancellor. Dr Duke told me that he has nothing against the University as such, and indeed that he has considerable respect for its high standards and its accomplishments. His criticisms were directed towards those responsible for its administration. I hasten to add that what Dr Duke himself says about this cannot be determinative. What matters is the import of the words complained of themselves. I have come to the conclusion that any adverse comments about the University are, in context, really incidental to the attacks made upon the conduct attributed to the two individuals.

11. Mr Rushbrooke has submitted that, simply because libellous allegations reflect upon individual members of the academic staff, that does not mean that the University itself cannot also be defamed by the same words. He is quite right about that, of course, as a matter of general principle. What is important, however, is how the court construes the specific words which form the subject of complaint. I regard it as wholly unreal, and indeed an abuse of the court's process, for these proceedings to continue on the basis that the only claimant is the University when the conduct to be examined in any plea of justification or fair comment would be that of Dr Graves and Professor Hall.

12. I need to make good my conclusions by referring in a little detail to the individual passages complained of in paragraph 7.

13. The point is illustrated well by sub-paragraph (a), which refers to a blog under the heading "Registrar and Antipodean: has Dr Deputy made another grave error of judgment?" Dr Graves is referred to as "secretive" and Professor Hall (with, I believe, some irony) as a "vehement human rights activist and social-justice believer". They are said to have "adopted the antediluvian virtues of yester-yore … and have decided that staff and the wider public have a right not to know … the two top university bosses have decided that the less you know the better off we'll all be". If that is defamatory, it seems to me plainly to reflect upon the two identified individuals and the way in which their responsibilities have been discharged. I think it is fair to describe the reference to the University as being "incidental". It is by no means the "villain of the piece"; indeed, it is portrayed almost as a "victim" in the sense that its best interests are being damaged by those identified as the culprits.

14. Sub-paragraph (b) refers to a blog headed "What a load of old bill-hooks". The sentence in question is as follows:

> "This infelicitous posturing by the University big-wigs cuts against the grain of the University's own Information Governance … "

It is said that the natural and ordinary meaning is that the University (and its senior members of staff) have acted inappropriately and have failed to follow the University's rules of governance. This is contrived in the extreme. It makes no sense to say of the University that it has failed to follow its rules of governance. The criticism only makes sense in relation to human beings rather than a corporate entity. It is they who either do or do not follow its rules.

15. Sub-paragraph (c) refers to "these two implacable University bosses" who "regard themselves as immune to the whims of mere legislature in the shape of Parliament, and feel that they can readily cock their metaphorical hind legs at the trifle of English Law whilst offering the universal one-finger salute against the Freedom of Information Act (2000)". The subject of the attack is plainly, yet again, the "University bosses".

16. Sub-paragraph (d) identifies a blog referring to the departure of a personal assistant called Susan Burgess. The suggestion seems to be that the "Graves/Hall Continuum" was wishing to conceal the circumstances of her rather hurried departure and that they authorised "a significant payment … in order to cover a heinous impropriety". This is raised by way of a question, but the implication is clear. At all events, any "heinous impropriety" can only have been brought about by one or more human beings. Again, it makes no sense to suggest that the University was paying money to cover a heinous impropriety. The behaviour described is such as to be ascribable only to human beings.

17. Sub-paragraph (e) refers to a suggestion that "some staff … have likened the current rule of the Strategic Leadership team to the Majis al-shura of Hexbollah … whereas other more cynical types suggest that it is more reflective of the Maglis al-shura al-Karar". It is said that the much vilified Hexbollah might appear to be more democratic, accountable and transparent than "the current ruling regime at Salford". There follows the allegation that "… under the leadership of Hall and Graves the University would seem to be adopting some of the more odious policies of the great Chinese bureaucratic dictatorship that dresses itself in the apparel of 'communism'". Again, the criticism is directed towards the individuals.

18. Sub-paragraph (f) complains of the following passage:

> "With more than a hint of irony, this week, Vice Chancellor Hall has been appointed to the Knowledge Sharing Board … Can Hall successfully square his wish to be open about other peoples research when he is so secretive about information that he ultimately controls, and which should equally be open to those who request it?"

The words speak for themselves.

19. Sub-paragraph (g) attempts to incorporate by reference, as words complained of, the content of a board game which is set out and described in an appendix. Whether that is a satisfactory way of pleading is open to question but, assuming it is, it is quite clear from the meanings pleaded that it is said to convey an imputation of "bullying" and "harassment". There is also reference to false accusations of sexual harassment. The meanings are pleaded at (probably excessive) length, but the point is that the defamatory allegations relate to behaviour that is attributable to individual human beings rather than a corporate entity.

20. Sub-paragraph (h) complains of words written under a heading "Many strings to his bow". The accusation complained of is that there have been "acts of nepotism" and appointments made, not on individual merit, but on the basis of personal relationships. It makes no sense to accuse a corporation of "nepotism". The allegations can only relate to individual human beings. From the context it is clear to whom that criticism is directed.

21. Sub-paragraph (i) refers to criticisms of members of staff being allocated excessive workloads and of lectures and tutorial groups being too large. If that is a criticism which is defamatory at all, it is surely directed towards those individuals who have imposed the excessive workloads or determined the size of tutorial groups.

22. Sub-paragraph (j) complains of an allegation that "senior members of staff" ensure that the findings of the staff mediation service are biased and that members of staff will not be given a fair or impartial hearing. That is plainly an allegation which is defamatory of those who administer the mediation service. Lack of impartiality, or "bias", must refer to human failings.

23. It is in the light of this pleading that I have come to my conclusion that, in substance and reality, this is an action about allegations against individuals rather than against the University itself. The District Judge was of the view that any damages recovered by the University were likely to be modest (although not negligible), but that it was arguable that there was nonetheless a "real and substantial tort" and also that there was a real prospect of its obtaining an injunction. Indeed, it was the injunction which was placed in the forefront of the University's argument on Jameel abuse. (As Dr Duke expresses it, somewhat differently, the proceedings have been brought not to protect the reputation of the University but to achieve the collateral objective of stifling free speech.) I am not convinced that there is a "real and substantial tort", so far as the University is concerned, or that the proceedings should be allowed to continue purely for the purpose of the University's obtaining an injunction to stifle criticism of Dr Graves and Professor Hall (for that is what it is about).

24. It is sometimes said that the appropriate test to apply, on such applications, is whether "the game is worth the candle": see e.g. most recently the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cammish v Hughes [2012] EWCA Civ 1655 at [52] et seq. For the reasons I have given, I am satisfied that in this instance the litigation is not worth pursuing if its sole objective is to protect the reputation of the University (any damage to which is purely incidental) or to obtain an injunction to prevent bloggers criticising Professor Hall and Dr Graves (since they are not parties).

25. Sometimes, where an employee is libelled in relation to the carrying out of his/her duties, it may be legitimate for the employer to support and fund a claim in the name of the relevant individual. If Dr Graves and/or Professor Hall wished to bring an individual libel claim (and were able to surmount any difficulties imposed by the Limitation Act 1980, as amended), it is conceivable that such an action might be supported by University funds. That would be a decision, however, for the appropriate authority to make in the circumstances prevailing when that bridge has to be crossed.

26. I will allow the appeal on the basis of Jameel abuse, because I cannot see that a real or substantive tort has been perpetrated against the University; nor do I foresee any tangible advantage being achieved by way of its reputation being effectively vindicated (even assuming that it has been damaged). In so far as there has been any incidental damage to the corporate reputation, it is not going to be in any real sense vindicated for so long as any defamatory allegations against Professor Hall and Dr Graves with regard to their stewardship are left in the air.

APPROVED JUDGMENT

Mr Justice Sales :

1. This is an application for a possession order made by the University of Sussex in relation to part of the University of Sussex campus known as Bramber House. Bramber House contains various facilities, including seminar rooms, a canteen and a conference centre.

2. The background is that, since early February 2013, there has been an occupation of the third floor at Bramber House in protest at a decision by the university to 'privatise' various services and contract them out. The University tolerated this for a considerable period of time, but, on 25 March, matters escalated and the University applied to the Court for injunctive relief, with a view to securing the University premises and in contemplation of an application being made for a possession order in relation to the entirety of the campus.

3. There is considerable material before me that shows that matters got out of hand. There was damage to property and a degree of intimidation in relation to the occupation of part of the University campus called Sussex House. I have been shown photographs of smashed glass and so forth.

4. On 25 March, Proudman J granted injunctive relief and authorised short and substituted service of the application for a possession order, returnable before herself yesterday, 27 March. There was a further hearing before her yesterday, at which she granted the possession order sought by the University for all parts of the campus save for Bramber House. For the background to the present application, I refer to the note of her judgment given yesterday and approved by her.

5. At the hearing before her yesterday, Proudman J was persuaded that the protesters should be afforded a short additional period of time to prepare for an adjourned hearing in relation to the application for a possession order in relation to Bramber House, which she therefore excluded from the possession order that she made in respect of the rest of the campus, with the adjourned hearing in relation to Bramber House to come on today. The University has come back to Court today, seeking an extension of the possession order to cover Bramber House along with the rest of the University campus.

6. According to the third witness statement of Melissa Thompson, filed on behalf of the University, a further demonstration took place at the university on 27 March 2013. On that occasion, the demonstration marched to Sussex House, where a police presence prevented entry. Miss Thompson says:

> "Save for this, it is considered that the protesters would have reoccupied Sussex House. Instead, they returned to Bramber House."

7. Various witness statements have been put before the Court today from both sides. Those from the University give evidence of a degree of intimidation and damage to property in the course of the protests, including in relation to Bramber House, where it appears that wire cutters and so forth have been used to gain access to certain parts of the premises. Those put before me on behalf of, and in support of, the protesters seek to emphasise the peacefulness of the nature of the occupation of Bramber House.

8. In my judgment, whether the particular occupation of Bramber House has been peaceful or has been attended with a degree of damage to property and intimidation, it is clear that there is no good defence available against the application now made by the University.

9. Mr Bunting of counsel appeared today to contend that the Court should adjourn the present application for seven days to allow the protesters an opportunity to gather further evidence and put together additional legal submissions. In my view, it would not be right to grant such an adjournment. In my judgment, it is clear that there is no arguable defence available to the protesters, nor is there any realistic possibility that one might be developed if the adjournment applied for by Mr Bunting were granted.

10. The two grounds on which Miss Holland QC, for the University, submits that there is no good defence available or in realistic contemplation so far as the protesters are concerned are as follows. The first submission involves facing head on the arguments which might be available to the protesters based on the Convention rights in Articles 10 and 11 of the ECHR. In relation to that possible defence, I am persuaded by Miss Holland's submissions that there is no possible or arguable defence available based on those Convention rights which could defeat the University's right to possession as the owner of property in question.

11. The leading authority from Strasbourg in relation to such a defence is Appleby v United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHRR 38. The critical paragraph in the judgment of the Court is at paragraph 47, which states, in relation to Article 10:

> "That provision, notwithstanding the acknowledged importance of freedom of expression, does not bestow any freedom of forum for the exercise of that right. While it is true that demographic, social, economic and technological developments are changing the ways in which people move around and come into contact with each other, the Court is not persuaded that this requires the automatic creation of rights of entry to private property, or even, necessarily, to all publicly-owned property (Government offices and ministries, for instance). Where however the bar on access to property has the effect of preventing any effective exercise of freedom of expression or it can be said that the essence of the right has been destroyed, the Court would not exclude that a positive obligation could arise for the State to protect the enjoyment of Convention rights by regulating property rights. The corporate town, where the entire municipality was controlled by a private body, might be an example ..."

12. Mr Bunting submitted that the University campus was the equivalent of a "corporate town". He said that this was a case where there was a prevention of any effective exercise of freedom of expression so that the essence of the rights to free expression and free association had been destroyed.

13. In my judgment, that is not a tenable position to adopt on the facts. In particular, I have regard to the third witness statement of Melissa Thompson for the University, at paragraph 25, where she sets out the large number of opportunities and channels for students to express their views other than through the occupation of Bramber House. In my view, it is clear from that evidence that there are many alternative means by which students and protestors are able to express their views, including on the University's premises and within the scope of the conduct of its affairs.

14. Mr Bunting further submitted that these avenues of expression and protest will all be cut off by the injunction granted by Proudman J on 25th March. I am by no means persuaded that that is the case; but, in any event, it is clear that, since the University has adopted the position that these avenues of expression are available, if there were any difficulty about them being pursued by reason of the injunction, that would be a basis on which, first, the protesters could seek to approach the University authorities to agree to modification of the injunction and, secondly, even if that could not be agreed, it would be a basis on which there may be scope for them to apply back to Court for modification of the Order. What I am clear about for present purposes is that it cannot be said that the protesters would be prevented from any effective exercise of freedom of expression if the order sought today were granted. Nor can it be said that the essence of their rights of freedom of expression and free association have been destroyed.

15. Appleby has been followed in a series of domestic authorities, in all of which the rights of property owners to recover their property have been upheld.

16. I was referred to School of Oriental and African Studies v Persons Unknown, unreported, Henderson J, 25 November 2010. In my judgment, the reasons given by the judge in that case, which is closely analogous to the present circumstances, apply with equal force in relation to the case before me in favour of the grant of the possession order which is sought.

17. I was also referred to Sun Street Property Limited v Persons Unknown [2011] EWHC 3432 (Ch), in which Roth J, at paragraphs [29] and following, discussed the Appleby and School of Oriental and African Studies cases. Roth J, again, reached the conclusion that the rights of the property owner should be upheld.

18. Finally on this point, I was referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Mayor Commonality and Citizens of London v Samede [2012] EWCA Civ 160, where the Court of Appeal discussed the proper approach to be adopted in relation to the Occupy Movement's camp outside St Paul's Cathedral. At paragraph [26] the Court referred to Appleby and emphasised the following at paragraph [39]:

> "As the Judge recognised, the answer to the question which he identified at the start of his judgment is inevitably fact-sensitive, and will normally depend on a number of factors. In our view, those factors include (but are not limited to) the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance of the precise location to the > protesters, the duration of the protest, the degree to which the protesters occupy the land, and the extent of the actual interference the protest causes to the rights of others, including the property rights of the owners of the land, and the rights of any members of the public."

At paragraph [42], the Court referred to Appleby and emphasised, in relation to the facts in that case, that:

> "there [are] other places where the applicants could exercise their Article 10 and 11 rights."

The outcome of the case was that the landowner was found to be entitled to recover the property in question.

19. Having regard to the factors at paragraph [39] in the judgment in Samede, I am in no doubt that it is right, in the circumstances of this case, to grant the possession order which is sought. The continuation of the protest, denying the University its property rights, would be in plain breach of domestic law. The importance of the location at Bramber House to the protesters is limited, not least because of the availability to them of the alternative means of expression and ways of protesting against the cuts to which I have referred. The protest has been going on for a long time and, in my view, the University is fully entitled at this stage to seek to recover its property.

20. There is evidence before me of the significant losses that the University has suffered in relation to lost income through loss of business at its conference centre. In my judgment, the University is fully entitled at this stage to seek to bring that situation to an end and to seek a return to normal business. The protesters occupied the entirety of the third floor at Bramber House and have, in substance, completely neutralised the ability of the University to use Bramber House for various activities, including in particular as a conference centre. The interference that the protest causes to the rights of others is thus very considerable. In particular, it involves a major intrusion on the property rights of the University. But it goes wider than that, in my view. The loss of business revenue which the University is now suffering is causing strain to University finances, and ultimately the people that pay the price, if matters are not brought to an end and business resumed, will be staff at the University, who may be at risk of losing their jobs.

21. For all these reasons, I consider that - weighing the relevant factors identified in paragraph [39] of Samede and in paragraph 47 of Appleby - the clearly just and appropriate solution in the present case is that there should be no further adjournments of the application for a possession order and that this Court should order possession.

22. The second submission made by Miss Holland in answer to the suggestion that there may be a defence for the protesters is to refer to what has happened already in relation to the protest. Aspects of the overall protest at Sussex University have plainly not been peaceful. I consider that the evidence I have seen, which goes into detail about protesters moving around the campus between venues where there plainly has been a considerable amount of violence to property such as Sussex House and then back to Bramber House, with individuals being identified as being present from time to time at the two places, indicates that it is not practically feasible to treat the protests going on on the campus as being located in and confined to discrete areas of the campus, with no inter-relationship between different parts of the campus. There is in fact clearly movement by protesters between different areas of the campus and the protest has an overall unity of personnel, purpose and to some degree method throughout the campus.

23. In the light of this, Miss Holland refers me to the Court of Appeal authority in University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301. In that case, a possession order was granted in relation to the whole of a university campus because there was a threat that the protesting students might occupy other parts of the university's premises apart from those which they had up to that time occupied. The reason for the grant of a possession order in relation to the whole of the premises was to ensure the practical effectiveness of the Court's order against a clear risk that, if one part of the university premises or campus had possession granted in relation to it, the students would decamp and move somewhere else within the same campus.

24. In my view, it is in this case clear that the protesters, as part of a single protest, have moved between different parts of the campus in pursuit of the protest which they wish to mount and a sufficient threat they would continue to do so if not prevented. I accept Miss Holland's submission that, in light of the pattern that the protests involving sit-ins and so forth has taken, on the authority of Djemal it is appropriate that a possession order be granted in relation to the whole campus. The practical effect of that is that I should extend the possession order already granted by Proudman J so as to cover Bramber House alongside the rest of the campus.

25. Miss Holland took me to the decision of the Supreme Court in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Meier [2009] All ER (D) 16 (Dec); [2009] UKSC 11. I am satisfied, on a review of the judgments in that case, that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Djemal continues to be regarded as good law. The position, certainly of the majority of the Supreme Court, is summarised in the judgment of Lord Collins at paragraph [97]:

> "But in my opinion University of Essex v Djemal [1980] 1 WLR 1301 represented a sensible and practical solution to the problem faced by the University, and was correctly decided."

26. In forming the view that Djemal remains good law, I am fortified by the judgment of Vos J in University of Sussex v Protesters [2010] PLSCS 105, where he had to consider the point and came to the same conclusion: see in particular paragraphs [8] and [9]. In that case, Vos J considered it appropriate, particularly in circumstances where a moving body of protesters was drifting between university buildings, that a possession order should be made not only in respect of the buildings that had been originally occupied, but in respect of buildings over the entirety of the campus. He said that the Court should be flexible in granting remedies so as to ensure they are effective, referring in particular to the judgment of Lady Hale at paragraph [25] of Meier. In the light of these authorities, I accept Miss Holland's second submission.

27. This is a plain case where there is no possibility of any valid defence being put forward even if an adjournment were granted. For these reasons, I refuse the application for an adjournment and I grant the possession order which is sought.

MISS KATHARINE HOLLAND, Q.C. instructed by SGH Martineau LLP appeared on behalf of the Claimant

(There was no attendance or representation on behalf of any Defendant)

J U D G M E N T

JUDGE PURLE:

1. This is an application to extend a Writ of Possession which I made in February of last year in relation to the Birmingham University Campus. I have been much assisted by Miss Holland QC, who has addressed me since 3 o'clock this afternoon, and it is now 20 to 5. I make no complaint about the lengths to which she has gone or the time that she has taken because she has done so in recognition of her duty on this particular application to be full and frank, the application being made without notice to anyone.

2. The application is supported by a witness statement by the Director of Legal Services at the University of Birmingham, Carolyn Pike. The problem that the University has faced and was facing in February last year was a pattern of disruptive and occupational protests of University buildings across the whole of the University campus, which was having a deleterious effect upon University life generally, both of students and staff, as well as of other lawful visitors.

3. It is apparent from Carolyn Pike's witness statement that there are three well-organised protest groups, all of whom appear to have connections with and support each other. One is called "Stop Fees, Stop Cuts", another is called "Defend Education" and the third is called the "National Campaign Against Fees and Cuts", known as NCAFC for short.

4. Their coordinated protests have grown since 2010, when they were started by "Stop Fees, Stop Cuts". "Defend Education", amongst other things, have advocated that the best way of obtaining their objectives is by closing the University down, which is clearly a step too far.

5. I should emphasise at the outset that the University supports freedom of speech as a fundamental principle, and my attention has been drawn to the Code of Practice of the University, and in particular to the following statement:

   > "The University is an academic community of staff and students. Central to this concept is the ability of all its members to freely challenge prevailing orthodoxies, query the positions and view of others and to put forward ideas that may sometimes be radical in their formulation.
   > It is a core right of the University staff and student staff and students."

6. The protests in this case, on the evidence, have continued since the possession order I made last year at regular intervals (all of which are listed in the witness statement of Miss Pike) in February, March, June, July and November of last year and in January of this year. At one stage in July of last year the High Court bailiffs were asked to help, but by the time they arrived the protest was effectively over and they did not, as they have confirmed in a recent email, then effect repossession of the site. In fact, the practical reality may be that they never will effect repossession of the entire site. They are only called in as and when there is a protest that the police or University authorities themselves are not able to deal with effectively. The activities of the protestors move around the site and their occupation of parts of the campus for protest does not usually embrace all, so that any disruption would be ended by simply clearing the building or part of the site in question. In July 2014 the Strathcona Building was affected, and the protestors had in fact left that building by the time the bailiffs arrived. Even had the bailiffs effected possession of the Strathcona Building, it may be that this would not have amounted to possession of the remainder of the site as indicated on the plan attached to the Possession Order. I do not think that matters, and do not need to decide the point.

7. The question is: have good reasons been shown for extending the Writ of Possession today? Even had the bailiffs taken possession in July 2014, it would still (as Miss Holland demonstrated by reference to Wiltshire County Council v Frazer (No. 2) [1986] 1 WLR 109) be open to the University to seek a Writ of Restitution as and when trouble flares up again. The only limitation would be on the court's discretionary power to issue such a writ.

8. It is clear from the Wiltshire case that where there are connected and coordinated actions of the kind with which the University is presently faced, a Writ of Restitution can properly issue. By parity of reasoning, it is appropriate also to extend a Writ of Possession where it has not been exhausted. The reasoning and justification for doing so are the same as in the case of granting a Writ of Restitution.

9. Student protests are planned. In particular a day of action is planned in the near future by the NCAFC. As I say, this group is connected with other groups, including "Defend Education". The aims of those groups are all to promote free education and to protest against what they regard as the syphoning off of money into the pockets of the Vice-Chancellor and others. I say nothing as to whether those aims are worthy, but they are legitimately within the area of free speech that the University promotes, and the contrary is not suggested.

10. The complaint before me, which was justified a year ago and is still justified, is that the means adopted, of disrupting University life to the extent of closing it down where possible, are not legitimate, and make trespassers of those taking part in protests having that effect. That is the basis upon which the possession order was made. It is still needed, and I will therefore extend the Writ of Possession for a further twelve months. It is appropriate to do so without notice, as that appears to be the process contemplated by the rules (current and previous – it is not entirely clear which apply). Further, the defendants all remain unknown and often appear on site during the more serious of protests masked, and therefore incapable of ready identification. This makes prior notice impracticable.

11. Accordingly, I will grant the order sought.

1. THE JUDGE: This is a renewed application for permission to apply for judicial review to quash a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of Southampton University dated 1 April 2015 upholding a decision of his Chief Operating Officer dated 31 March 2015 to withdraw permission for a conference to be held at the University this weekend, 17-19 April, entitled International Law and the state of Israel: Legitimacy, Responsibility, and Exceptionalism. The claimants also seek an interim mandatory injunction and protective costs order. Permission was refused on the papers by Andrews J on 8 April. It has been renewed orally before me today given the urgency of the matter.

2. The chronology can briefly be summarised from the initial decision of the Chief Operating Officer dated 31 March. There was a call for papers in April 2014 for the conference. The deadline for papers was set as 17 October 2014. The intention was that the conference should be plenary in nature and would consist of invited keynote speakers and panels with substantial time being given for audience participation. In the early stages it was stressed that the conference was an academic conference with the intention being that a balanced view would be presented overall.

3. In mid January 2015 the Head of Faculty Operations of the Faculty of Business and Law raised the issue of whether the conference would be designated under the university's Code of Practice. As an event where there is a reasonable expectation that freedom of speech within the law may be compromised unless appropriate remedial action is taken, a list of speakers and abstracts was provided towards the end of January. In early February 2015, the Vice-Chancellor's office began to receive letters of complaint about the conference. The Chief Operating Officer requested relevant material, speakers, audience programme, risk assessment and so forth, to inform his decision about whether to designate the event or not, and if it was designated, whether to allow it to proceed.

4. By the middle of February, the matter had come to the attention of the Hampshire Constabulary who were expressing interest in the arrangements being made for the conference. A full list of some 50 speakers was made available to the Chief Operating Officer in early March 2015. He took advice from the Director of Estates and Facilities, the Head of Security, the Head of the Safety and Occupational Health, and various external third parties, including Southampton University's Students' Union, and Hampshire Constabulary. On 30 March he received an Event Assessment from the Hampshire Constabulary and held a meeting with the claimants, Professor Oren Ben-Dor and Professor Suleiman Abu-Sharkh, the principal organisers of the conference, both professors at the University of Southampton. The Chief Operating Officer's letter says:

> "As you were made aware, in confidence yesterday, the University received an Event Assessment yesterday from Hampshire Constabulary, and this was explored with you together with other information, while we explored the difficult issue of balancing the University's duty to secure freedom of speech within the law and the duty to guarantee the security and safety of staff and students on the campus.

> Having had full discussions with you yesterday and having reflected on all of the issues overnight, I have decided under section 2.3 of the University's Code of Practice to Secure Freedom of Speech within the law, to withdraw the University's permission to hold the conference: "International Law and the State of Israel and Legitimacy, Responsibility, and Exceptionalism" ("Conference") scheduled for 17th-19th April 2015."

5. I will return to the detail of the rest of the letter in due course. The letter informed the claimants that they had a right of appeal to the Vice-Chancellor. That right of appeal was exercised. The claimants forwarded their own Notice of Appeal together with grounds in support settled by counsel to the Vice-Chancellor. The Vice-Chancellor met with the Head of Security, the Director of Estates and Facilities, and the Head of Safety and Occupational Health on 31 March after receiving a copy of the Chief Operating Officer's decision letter to discuss the matter in the absence of the Chief Operating Officer.

6. The following morning at 10.00 am on 1 April, the Vice-Chancellor met the claimants when he outlined the University's concern, and they were given an opportunity to put forward all of the points that they wished to. After the meeting the Vice-Chancellor took the decision to uphold the decision of the Chief Operating Officer in a letter also dated 1 April.

7. In summary, it is submitted on behalf of the claimants that the University is under a duty to uphold freedom of expression arising under section 43 of the Education (No.2) Act 1986 and article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and in breach of those duties has refused to hold the conference on the grounds that the views to be expressed are controversial, had given rise to complaints, and that any concerns about security and safety were exaggerated and unsubstantiated. It was submitted that the purpose of section 43 was to prevent speakers being banned from campuses where their views might be unacceptable to others in reliance on R v University College London, ex p Riniker [1995] ELR 213.

8. As a preliminary matter the claimants expressed concern as to whether the University had complied with its duty of candour and they sought disclosure of a document which the University had made clear existed but had not been produced by them.

9. Following the renewal of this application for permission to apply for judicial review, the defendant has submitted a bundle containing witness statements and exhibits from Mr White, the Chief Operating Officer, Mr Jackson, the Head of Security and Professor Nutbeam, the Vice-Chancellor. Part of the material produced by way of exhibits comprises the Event Assessment produced by Hampshire Constabulary to which Mr White's decision letter referred, a risk assessment produced by the University as well as other material. In his witness statement at paragraph 29 Mr White states that he gave Professor Sharkh a copy of the risk assessment and sought permission from the police to use the Event Assessment for the purposes of these proceedings. There was an additional document produced and shown to the claimants, however permission to use this for the purposes of these proceedings has been refused, and the defendant places no reliance on it.

10. It was submitted on behalf of the claimants that it was a breach of the [defendant's] duty of candour not to disclose that document, and that the court should order its disclosure before proceeding with dealing with the application for permission and interim relief. I indicated at the time that I was not prepared to order disclosure and that I would give my reasons later. I do so now.

11. In my judgment, there is no evidence of any breach of the duty of candour. The defendant has made it clear from the outset what the basis of the decision is. In short, this is as set out in both Mr White's letter and the Vice-Chancellor's letter, that it is not possible to put in place measures or take remedial action to ensure that good order can be maintained on campus that will safeguard staff and students while the conference is taking place. Those concerns are detailed in Mr White's letter which the Vice-Chancellor agreed with. The material produced on behalf of the defendant comprises the documents which were relied upon by the defendant when reaching those judgments, and witness statements setting out the chronology of the matter and the advice which was given orally that was also taken into account. The only document not produced is the document referred to by Mr White. I am told by counsel that it is a Metropolitan Police report comprising a weekly round-up of intelligence by the extremism intelligence unit. It is not the defendant who is unwilling to disclose it, rather the police. That is hardly surprising given it contains intelligence about the risk of protests. Therefore, the University has disclosed all of the information on which it relies in support of its case here and in so far as there is any further material justifying that decision, the inability to rely upon it is to the disadvantage of the University and not the claimants.

12. It was submitted on behalf of the claimants that it is not for the defendants to say if the material was helpful to them or not. But, in my judgment, in the absence of some credible reason why it might be of assistance to the claimant, and none has been put forward, there is no proper basis on which to order its disclosure.

13. While dealing with documents, I will deal with another preliminary matter that is related. It was submitted on behalf of the claimant that the defendant should not be permitted to rely upon evidence in the three witness statements and the exhibits on the grounds that they elucidate, correct or add to reasons already given. The authorities which indicate the court should be slow to permit that to take place have recently been summarised in the case of Timmins & Anor v Gedling Borough Council [2014] EWHC 654 (Admin) by Green J (see paragraphs 109-114).

14. As I have already said, the evidence sets out the material on which the University relied, the advice that they were given, and a chronology. In my judgment, that was entirely legitimate and indeed some of the material is relied on by the claimant in support of their argument that the decision was arguably unlawful. I accept the submission made on behalf of the defendant that the evidence does not involve filling a gap, but rather is setting out the process by which the decision was reached and was legitimately put forward, particularly in the context of an allegation of bad faith being made, namely that the reasons being put forward by the University for its decision were not in fact the true reasons.

15. Turning to the substance of the challenge, in oral submissions before me today Mr McDonald, counsel for the claimants, has pointed to the paucity of evidence relating to security threat. First of all it is said that reference in documents to it being necessary to take into account the risk of a terrorist attack does not justify the decision that the risk is no more or less than any academic institution faces every day of the week when speakers come to give talks on controversial subjects, and that there is no concrete evidence at all of any terrorist threat. So far as more general threats to public disorder are concerned, detailed submissions have been made about the documentation produced by the University in support of their security concerns.

16. Criticism has been made of what are said to be inconsistencies in the material. In particular in paragraphs 20 and 22 of Mr Jackson's witness statement reference is made to Special Branch expressing concern that there might be a need to provide an armed response team, something which it said came out of the blue. However, there is no reference at all to that in the Event Assessment produced by Hampshire Police on 30 March. Attention was drawn to that document which says this:

> "It is not expected that police will have any uniformed presence within any buildings."

That was also said to be inconsistent with the University's risk assessment which states on page 1 that:

> "Police indicate that 21 suitably equipped police officers per 100 protesters will be deployed on site during the conference to ensure that public order is maintained, and with at least 300 protesters anticipated (at least on 19 April), at least 63 police officers will be required, possibly more."

Later on in the document reference is made to updated information suggesting more protesters might be in attendance in which case more police officers will be on site.

17. It was also submitted that the Event Assessment discloses only one known protest, that being planned by the Sussex Friends of Israel, who are avowedly a peaceful protester, and that insofar as there is any concern that there might be counter protests the only evidence of any possible counter protests came from the English Defence League. It was pointed out that the evidence shows that the last time there was any controversial talk at Southampton University, only five or six English Defence League members came. In all the circumstances, it was submitted that the risk in so far as there was any was easily manageable and there was no evidence to justify cancelling the conference on the grounds of concerns about security.

18. In my judgment, the starting point for consideration of this challenge is the very careful and detailed letter dated 31 March from the Chief Operating Officer. After the passage I have already quoted, the letter continues:

> "I am satisfied that after you notified the Vice-Chancellor's office in July 2014 about the conference and permission, albeit only tacit, was given to you to proceed with the Conference that the University was not facing the circumstances it now faces, which in summary are as follows:
> 1. Speakers and Conference Programme:
>
> 1.1 You made details of the speakers and the programme available to the University in early March 2015. This list has been reviewed and it is noted that the speakers have a distinct leaning towards one point of view, which is not an issue, save that it does not accord with the original intention expressed for the conference.
> 1.2 Further, a number of the speakers are regarded as not extreme but controversial. The effect of this is to provide a focus for protest and with such a large number of speakers being on campus at the same time for one event it provides a significant challenge to the University as to whether it can uphold good order on campus.
> 2. Risk assessment:
>
> 2.1 The risk of protest, intimidation or violence, and injury to staff, students, attendees and speakers, has progressively worsened over the past few weeks and shows an unacceptably high level of risk. This remains the case even after considering measures to reduce the risk as we may reasonably put in place in the run up to and during the Conference.
> 2.2 The University of Southampton Students' Union has expressed a real concern over escalated tension and division between student groups at the University as a result of the Conference.
> 2.3 Whist the University can only pay attention to good order on campus, as part of its risk assessment, the inherent risk of disorder in campus as a result of this Conference must be considered in the light of the increased threat to the UK of terrorist activity and the recent attacks in Paris and Brussels.
> 3 Public Order, Public Safety Assessment:
> 3.1 I have only paid heed to those elements of the Event Assessment from Hampshire Constabulary which refers to elements which the University is expected to be able to control. Even then, the estimated number of protestors ranges between 400 to 1000 people, over multiple sites at the University, from groups who are diverse and polarized and with an increased capacity for the University to be a focal point for mass demonstrations on campus.

3.2 Following our consultation on the morning of the 30th March 2015, you were given the opportunity to respond to this information and to suggest any practical measures which would enable the University to continue with hosting the Conference at this time.

3.3 Following the meeting you suggested by e-mail that you were of the view "that it is very clear from the Police's report that they are more than capable of policing the conference and ensuring the safety of university staff, speakers, delegates, students and property. This should be accepted at face value."

3.4 With respect, I must disagree with your assessment of the Event Assessment. While advising that they are confident they could provide the necessary support to the University, if requested to assist with the mitigation of risk from any protest, the police made it clear that:

- The University and the Principal Organisers should consider the JTAC threat to the UK from terrorist activity as the event has a profile that would for some make the event a legitimate target and considerable thought needs to be given as to how this threat is mitigated against.

- They raised the issue of the University's capacity and experience to deal with protests or activity within the conference, as it is a University event and the University has the responsibility for planning and delivering safe outcomes. The University's small security team will have to be enhanced by additional skilled resources to manage the event; and

- The University is responsible for providing protest areas and clear stewarding.

3.5 Therefore your reading of their report fails to take into account those elements of public order and safety which fall within the University's precincts and for which we are liable.

3.6 I have carefully considered whether there are any other reasonably practicable measures we could take to sufficiently reduce the risk of injury faced by our staff, students and visitors to a tolerable level within the available timescale. In particular I have considered the following: -

Change of location:

All other buildings which have the capacity to seat the event have been considered but given the combustible nature of the groups, a change of venue will not alleviate the difficulty that the security staff at the University (totalling 14 – of whom 5 are committed elsewhere) are too small a group and do not have the appropriate training to deal with demonstrations of this size. In addition, there is concern that they might have to deal with disruptions within the venue and again have not had appropriate training to deal with this.

Securing Areas:

This would require resourcing, planning and specialist arrangements to mitigate the deficiencies in our existing security provision which is not geared up to deal with events such as these. This is particularly the case given the dispersed locations. Preliminary enquiries have been made about additional resourcing and it is doubtful that the appropriate arrangements could be put in place in time given that a suitable security firm would have to be identified and once appointed, would have to conduct their own risk assessment and determine the correct measures to put in place.

Restricting Access to Campus:

In addition to the previous point it is considered that the only way to run the Conference is to lock the campus down. This poses considerable logistical difficulties over the 3 days of the Conference and it is very questionable whether this is a proportionate response, given the needs of students with the examination period coming up. Given the concerns already expressed by the Students' Union over the holding of the conference, it is unlikely that they would consider such action in the best interests of the student body. For a similar weekend, the daily head count, reflecting occupancy at a point in time for the library was in the region of 600 students and the daily gate count of entry to the library ranged from 4,600 to over 5,000.

As the principal Organiser, you have not proposed any measures which might need to be taken in order to safeguard freedom of speech and have only pointed to police involvement being taken at face value which I have already addressed above.

It is my view that the circumstances facing the University are exceptional and that we have, at least over the past decade, never faced a similar set of circumstances.

To date, the University's ability to react swiftly and in an agile manner to allow designated activities on campus to proceed reflects our commitment to take such steps as are reasonably practicable to ensure freedom of speech within the law on campus. This is not an absolute duty and on this occasion, with this set of circumstances I must withdraw permission as set out above for the reasons already enumerated.

The University takes its duty to secure Freedom of Speech within the law very seriously and has an extremely good record in this regard, as you well know. In the past it has always been able to put in place measures to allow designated activities to proceed. Therefore, it is with considerable regret that I have reached the decision that I have. With this in mind, I mentioned to you yesterday that the University is prepared to commission an independent report to establish how a conference of this nature could be held in future; exploring and identifying how the balance between upholding freedom of speech and securing the safety and security of staff and students can be achieved, and the measures needed to achieve this. In our meeting you rejected this offer, but I make it again as a confirmation of the University's continuing commitment to uphold freedom of speech within the law."

19. That letter to my mind demonstrates the following. First, that changes to the anticipated nature of the conference had taken place. Whereas at the outset it was anticipated that the conference would present a balanced point of view, there was now a distinct leaning towards one point of view. Secondly, that the full speaker list which was not provided until early March included a number of speakers who were regarded as controversial. Third, there was a high level of risk of protest. The advice being given was of potentially 400 - 1,000 people as a result of letters of complaint to the University, intelligence provided by the police, and escalated tension and division within student groups at the University. Fourth, that the University gave the claimants an opportunity to consider and deal with the University's concerns and respond with any practical measures that they might be able to suggest in order that the conference could take place safely. However, the only response that came from them was that the police report, which is presumably the Event Assessment, says that the police take the view they are capable of policing the conference. Fifth, the Chief Operating Officer's letter goes on to consider and respond to that in detail, and concludes that the suggestion fails to address the elements of public order and safety which are within the University's precincts and for which they are liable. Sixth, the letter also goes on to consider in detail if there were any other practical measures which could be adopted in order to enable the conference to go ahead but concluded that there were not. Finally, the letter re-iterates an offer made to commission an independent report to identify how such a conference could take place again in the future.

20. In my judgment, there is no contradiction in the material before the court as to the nature of the protest which might take place or the police's response. The fact that the Event Assessment said that there would be no uniformed officers in the building is by no means inconsistent with the need for police officers to be provided outside the buildings and much of the information provided to the University was provided by the police in meetings rather than a risk assessment which was only given to them on 30 March. Whether or not the concerns about protest could be dealt with adequately by University security was a matter for the University. The Event Assessment makes clear that as the event was a private one taking place on private property it was for the University to put in place adequate security measures and that the support that would be provided by the police would be to deal with breaches of the peace.

21. Further, and importantly, in my judgment, the Event Assessment makes clear that many protest groups do not announce their intention to protest in advance because it would defeat the object of causing the maximum disruption so that the fact that the Sussex Friends of Israel were the only group who had announced an intention to attend did not mean that they would be likely to be the only protest group there.

22. So far as terrorism concerns have been raised, reliance was placed on the decision in A & Others [2005] 2 AC 68 which emphasises the importance of constitutional freedoms notwithstanding security risks. In my judgment the circumstances of that case are completely different from those of the present case. Whether a generalised threat of terrorism was sufficient justification to derogate from article 5 which protects the liberty of the person pursuant to article 15 on the grounds that there is a public emergency threatening the life of the nation is very different from whether a potential threat of terrorism is relevant to considerations of public safety when it comes to deciding whether or not to allow a conference to take place. There is no dispute that the current threat level is identified as severe.

23. There have been well publicised terrorist attacks in the last 12 months associated with concerns about Israel, Palestine and the Jewish people. In my judgment, those concerns are plainly relevant to the matters the University have to consider in this case, although clearly they were not determinative, and there is no evidence whatsoever to suggest that the University thought that they were determinative. It was simply one consideration which was quite properly taken into account.

24. Criticism was made that the offer of an independent report to decide how the conference could take place involved kicking the matter into the long grass. In my judgment, that is not a characterisation which is supported by the evidence. The letter from the Chief Operating Officer makes it clear that the University is under a duty to protect freedom of speech. Further, it cannot be said that the problem which has arisen here would be repeated because it is clear from the chronology that concerns about security have only arisen in the weeks leading up to the conference, whereas with sufficient time for planning security issues can be properly addressed.

25. Reliance was placed on the decision of the European Court of Justice in Alekseyev v Russia (Application no.s 4916/07, 25924/08 and 14599/09) where a decision by the Mayor of Moscow to prohibit a gay rally was struck down. However, in my judgment, that case is distinguishable for a number of reasons. First, in paragraphs 77 and 78 the court found that the security concerns expressed were in fact secondary to considerations of public morals. Here, in my judgment, the only evidence is that the University took their decision on the grounds of security concerns.

26. Just pausing there for a moment, it has been suggested that the University was got at, if I can use that phrase, by other organisations opposing the conference and as a result of extensive lobbying in correspondence. There is not a shred of evidence, in my view, on the material that I have seen, that that played any part in the University's decision.

27. The second ground on which Alekseyev is distinguishable is that there the government banned the event completely and repeatedly for a period of three years. Here, the University has not prevented the claimants from holding the event. As Andrews J said, the conference could be organised elsewhere. All that has happened is the University has withdrawn its permission for the conference to be held at the University premises on this occasion. That does not prevent the claimants from publicising their views and those of persons who were to present papers at the conference in any other forum. Moreover, I have already referred to the commitment given by the University to commissioning an independent report to see if it is possible to identify how such a conference could take place in the future.

28. The third ground on which Alekseyev can be distinguished is this. There, the court held that the Government had failed to carry out an adequate assessment of risk by failing to consider the nature of the risk involved and whether arrangements could be made to deal with them. In short, in a city the size of Moscow, the presence of about 100 protesters should be capable of being adequately dealt with by the police. Here, the position is completely different. The conference was to be held on private property where the University were to be responsible for the security. The risk identified was, as I have already said, 400 - 1,000 protesters in circumstances where the Chief Operating Officer carefully considered if it were possible for the safety and security of staff and students to be secured in a number of different ways but concluded in the end that it could not. That is very far from the circumstances which existed in the Alekseyev case.

29. Thus far I have concentrated on the decision of the Chief Operating Officer. His decision was upheld by the Vice-Chancellor in the letter dated 1 April 2015. After referring to the appeal and the meeting earlier that morning the letter states:

> "I would like to thank you for engaging with me in such a thoughtful and considered way. I hope that I made clear from the start that not only do I understand the University's duty in relation to upholding freedom of speech within the law but that I take that duty very seriously. I also was able to draw your attention to the fact that at the University of Southampton, we have a record to be proud of in upholding freedom of speech.
> I reassured you that throughout the process, the only issues under consideration were how to balance the University's duty to uphold freedom of speech within the law with its duty to ensure the safety of staff and students of the University on University premises and these are the only considerations that have weighed in the decision making process.
> I advised you both that I had received advice independently from the Director of Estates and Facilities, the Head of Security and the Head of Safety and Occupational Health on the specific issues arising in relation to the conference. In addition, I have consulted fully on the principles with the University Council, the Senate and the University Academic Executive.
> I have also reviewed and considered the advice we have received from the Police: in particular, the wide media attention (both national and international) that the conference has attracted; the potential for protest and counter protest; the need to consider mitigation against the potential for terrorist attack; and the University's capacity and experience to deal with such matters.
> The University has a small security team who are not trained or resourced to deal with public order matters. They do not have the experience or training to deal with provision of protest areas or clear stewarding. Consideration has been given to obtaining additional skilled resources but I am advised that it would not be possible to get this in place in time for this event.

The purpose of this morning's meeting was to give you an opportunity to present your appeal and make any and all representations to me that you wished to and then I would consider your representations alongside the advice and feedback that I have received as outlined above and make a decision on your appeal.

I completely accept your concern for the University with regard to its obligations to uphold freedom of speech under the law and your desire to promote the best interests of the University and academic learning. At no stage in this process have I had reason to question the sincerity or integrity or either of you and I wish to make it clear that the decision letter from Steve White set out the background and timeline to this issue and was in no way intended to suggest that you did or did not take any particular set of actions.

I have considered the specific grounds of appeal you raised but have not addressed them in detail in this letter in the interests of getting a response to you promptly. Indeed, I understand that you have asked for the outcome to the appeal to be provided to you today so that you are able to take advice about seeking interim relief prior to the Easter bank holiday weekend. Should you wish to see full reasons for the basis of this outcome, please do let us know and we will endeavour to provide them to you within 7 days.

In short, however, my decision, based on the advice that I have received, is that it is not possible to put in place measures or take remedial action to ensure that good order can be maintained on campus that will safeguard staff and students while the conference is taking place. For that reason, and that reason alone, I uphold the decision of the Responsible Officer to withdraw permission to hold the conference at the University from 17th to 19th April, 2015.

The University remains committed to taking such steps as are reasonably practicable to ensure that freedom of speech within the law is secured for staff and students. I was impressed by the commitment you gave this morning to holding a conference reflecting a broad spectrum of views and I would like to confirm the offer that I made when we met that the University would be prepared to work with you to find a venue suitable for a conference of this nature at a later date. I remain committed to the possibility of the event taking place in the future if adequate safeguards can be put in place to minimise the risk to the safety of the university staff and students. Given the short period (sic) time between now and 17th

April, the amount of publicity that the conference has attracted and the consequent risk of protest and counter-protest, I do not believe that such measures could be put in place for the present conference."

30. It is to be noted from that letter that the claimants were given an opportunity to put their case to the Vice-Chancellor orally. He specifically referred to having taken into account all the material available. It refers to the limitations of the University security team and considers getting additional security resources. It is clear from the letter that the Vice-Chancellor has taken into account the University's duty to uphold freedom of speech but that he has concluded it is not possible to put measures in place to ensure good order can be maintained such that the staff and students can be safeguarded. And finally it contains a commitment towards working towards enabling such a conference to be held in the future.

31. The claimants have relied upon a number of authorities which emphasise the importance of academic freedom in the context of freedom of expression. In particular, Erdogan v Turkey (Application no.s 346/04 and 39779/04) where the court said at paragraph 40:

> "It is therefore consistent with the court's case law to submit to careful scrutiny any restrictions on the freedom of academics to carry out research and to publish their findings... This freedom, however, is not restricted to academic or scientific research, but also extends to the academics' freedom to express freely their views and opinions, even if controversial or unpopular, in the areas of their research, professional expertise and competence. This may include an examination of the functioning of public institutions in a given political system, and a criticism thereof."

Similar points were made in Sorguc v Turkey (application no. 17089/03) in paragraphs 34 to 36.

32. As I have already said, it is important to note that the University's decision does not prevent the organisers or their speakers from expressing their opinions, only from doing so at this particular conference. They have the freedom to express those views in any other form and forum that they wish, or indeed at another conference.

33. The claimants have relied on a number of authorities which emphasise the importance of the right to freedom of expression and assembly enshrined in both articles 10 and 11 of the Convention and the common law rights in that regard. The requirements of article 10 have recently been summarised by the Supreme Court in R (Lord Carlile of Berriew and others) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2014] UKSC 60. In the leading judgment of Lord Sumption he states:

> "13. It is well established in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights that the more important the right, the more difficult it will be to justify any interference with it. For this purpose, freedom of expression has always been treated as one of the core rights protected by the Convention. It 'constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment': Sürek v Turkey (1999) 7 BHRC 339, at para 57. The exceptions in article 10(2) must therefore be 'construed strictly and the need of any restrictions must be established convincingly': ibid. In this respect, the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court is substantially at one with the common law as it had developed for many years before the Convention received the force of law in the United Kingdom…"

34. In paragraph 31, Lord Sumption went on to say this:

> "None of this means that in human rights cases a court of review is entitled to substitute its own decision for that of the constitutional decision-maker. However intense or exacting the standard of review in cases where Convention rights are engaged, it stops short of transferring the effective decision-making power to the courts...
> 32. Rather different considerations apply where the question is not what is the constitutional role of the court but what evidential weight is to be placed on the executive's judgment, a question on which the human rights dimension is relevant but less significant…In the first place, although the Human Rights Act requires the courts to treat as relevant many questions which would previously have been immune from scrutiny, including on occasions the international implications of an executive decision, they remain questions of fact. The executive's assessment of the implications of the facts is not conclusive, but may be entitled to great weight, depending on the nature of the decision and the expertise and sources of information of the decision-maker or those who advise her. Secondly, rationality is a minimum condition of proportionality, but is not the whole test. Nonetheless, there are cases where the rationality of a decision is the only criterion which is capable of judicial assessment. This is particularly likely to be true of predictive and other judgmental assessments, especially those of a political nature. Such cases often involve a judgment or prediction of a kind whose rationality can be assessed but whose correctness cannot in the nature of things be tested empirically. Thirdly, where the justification for a decision depends upon a judgment about the future impact of alternative courses of action, there is not necessarily a single 'right' answer. There may be a range of judgments which could be made with equal propriety, in which case the law is satisfied if the judgment under review lies within that range…"

35. Lord Sumption added in paragraph 34 a number of points which I have summarised I hope accurately: that the quality of judicial scrutiny called for will depend on the significance of the right, the degree to which it is interfered with and the range of factors capable of justifying that interference which may be wide-ranging. The court must test the adequacy of the factual basis of the decision and is the ultimate arbiter of the appropriate balance between two incommensurate values but is not usually concerned with re-making the decision-maker's assessment of the evidence if it was an assessment reasonably open to him or her.

36. Applying those principles to the present case, in my judgment, the evidence demonstrates clearly that the reasons for the University's decision to withdraw permission to hold the conference on its premises were as set out in the Vice-Chancellor's letter, namely that it is not possible to put in place measures or take remedial action to ensure that good order can be maintained on campus that will safeguard staff and students while the conference is taking place. By its very nature, that involved, to some extent, a predictive and judgemental assessment. That assessment was based on the very considerable experience of its Head of Security, advice and intelligence from the police, information obtained by the University, and its own risk assessment. The decision to withdraw permission to hold the conference was plainly rationally connected to the objective sought to be achieved. Consideration was given to whether concerns could be overcome in other ways, and a conclusion was reached that they could not.

37. The decision involves the minimum derogation from the right necessary to achieve the objective of safety and security. The decision was restricted to not holding this particular conference at this particular time, without any prohibition on the conference taking place elsewhere. Publication in any other way of material that would otherwise be presented at the conference, and a commitment to commission an independent report to explore how the conference could be held in the future.

38. To conclude, this was obviously a very difficult decision for the University. Nobody could be in any doubt reading the University's decisions that there has been very careful scrutiny of all of the issues. There is no evidence the decision was taken otherwise than in good faith with a conscientious application of the duty to protect free speech. But, for the reasons I have already identified, a decision was reluctantly taken to withdraw permission for the conference. I am quite satisfied that there are no arguable grounds for challenging the decision and accordingly permission is refused. And, in those circumstances, no question of interim relief or any protective costs order arises.

39. MR CAPEWELL: My Lady, we do make an application for our costs. I appreciate that this matter has been dealt with in a slightly unusual way because of the time constraint. Obviously, the ordinary course is that one is not entitled to one's costs in an oral renewal hearing but only for the acknowledgement of service. And it is an exceptional course to take to award costs in respect of an oral hearing for a defendant at permission stage. But we do say here that those exceptional circumstances exist, the reasons essentially being these: that the claim was always very weak but nevertheless has been persisted in after the very clear order of Andrews J made last week. It also involved an allegation of bad faith for which there was no support whatsoever. That was a very serious allegation to make and it did require the University to expend considerable costs in putting together evidence for this hearing. I don't have a schedule but I am instructed that the costs that have been incurred in connection with the application for permission are in the region of £10,000.

40. THE JUDGE: Yes. Has there been any consideration given in the past as to what should happen in cases of urgency where in effect the acknowledge of service stage is bypassed, where costs are concerned?

41. MR CAPEWELL: That I am not sure of, my Lady. I think it is dealt with in the White Book at 54.12.5. And on page 2044 it does say: "The court should not order an unsuccessful claimant to pay the costs --"

42. THE JUDGE: Hold on, I think I have an up-to-date one here now. 54.12.5.

43. MR CAPEWELL: Yes, at page 2044.

44. THE JUDGE: Yes.

45. MR CAPEWELL: The last paragraph of 2044 deals with the ordinary Mount Cook principle which is that a defendant who has filed an acknowledgement of service is ordinarily entitled to the costs of that. Now, we have, of course, filed an acknowledgement of service because we did so yesterday in order to put our evidence before the court. So, on one view, we are entitled to our costs at least of the evidence, which is the acknowledgement of service. And what we say in the acknowledgement of service is that the skeleton argument I prepared for today stands as our summary grounds of resistance. But in so far as the costs of the hearing as well go, it seems to me that that must be governed by the ordinary principles that are set out at the top of 2045, that it is an exceptional course that the circumstances are taken into account. It says: such circumstances may consist in the presence of one or more of the following factors: the hopelessness of the claim; persistence by the claimant in the claim after having been alerted to facts where the law demonstrates its hopelessness; the extent to which the court considers the claimant has sought to abuse the process of judicial review for collateral purposes; and whether, as a result of full argument and deployment of documentary evidence, the claimant has, in effect, had the advantage of an early substantive hearing of the claim.

46. Really, most of those factors are present here. The claim is certainly hopeless. It was persisted in after it was pointed out, both by Andrew J and indeed by us, by the service of the skeleton argument if nothing else, that the claim was hopeless. Has the claimant sought to abuse the process of judicial review? Well, it is perhaps not an abuse of process, but nevertheless a very serious allegation of bad faith was made with nothing to support it. And we have been here all day. So there has, in effect been a substantive hearing of the claim. The claimants intimated that they did not intend to put in any evidence. We wouldn't have put in an evidence beyond what we did put in. So, in those circumstances, my Lady, we do ask for our costs both of the acknowledgement of service and of today's hearing.

47. THE JUDGE: Yes, Mr McDonald.

48. MR McDONALD: My Lady. Exceptional circumstances. It is helpful, albeit this is not a protective costs order, as my Lady said, to look at the principles (Inaudible) where actually compared it with exceptional circumstances as to whether or not this would be a case now. My learned friend conceded that article 10 had been engaged at the start of his skeleton argument, number 1. Number 2, in relation to an alternative reason for cancelling this conference, that was outlined in the initial grounds, it has not been something that I have put forward even in the skeleton argument or in submissions. It is not something that I have relied upon. We have focused upon reasons. To now say some two weeks after those initial grounds when we had renewal grounds after, then a detailed skeleton argument that you are casting bad faith upon the defendants I am afraid flies in the face of effectively what we have been doing all day. It has been focused on the reasons, both letters. At no stage have I gone down the road except in response to my learned friend's submissions where he has raised it both in his skeleton argument -- which is not in our skeleton argument at all -- where he has raised it in oral submissions, where we didn't raise it at all in our oral submissions. So to say, well, hold on here, there has been some aspersion cast upon the defendants is wholly wrong and without merit.

49. More importantly, though, the arguments that have been had today, as my Lady has quite rightly identified in your ruling, had been something that do trigger issues of public importance. My Lady, you weren't with me in relation to my arguments as to whether or not the assessment was correct, whether or not the University were right or not to make the decision that they did. But behind the decision as to whether internationally recognised academics should be allowed to have a conference is an issue of great importance, of public importance, in a democracy. To brush that away and to say that this is simply without merit and how dare they come to court and have this argument, is simply wrong given the plethora of cases that you discussed and addressed throughout the day.

50. The claimants are two professors at a university who are themselves are simply teachers at an institution. Barristers are acting pro bono. The solicitor is acting pro bono. We are all here because we believe that we have an argument, and we still believe that we have an argument. This is not an action that is a waste of time, that it is without merit; it is an action that triggers profound and important issues. My Lady was not with me, of course, but that does not mean that it was not right and proper to have those arguments, it was not right and proper to refer to those authorities that we have done, where these matters have been discussed, more and more now in democratic countries. So, is it an exceptional circumstance? Is this an exception? My Lady, in my respectful submission, it is not an exceptional circumstance. It was right and proper that we have these arguments. And I say that costs should not be ordered, particularly given the urgency of the situation that we were in. And also another factor, and I don't wish to try my Lady's patience, but another factor is, of course this was a conference that was in a year's planning, expense, people flying all over the world, and a decision process that was made in the last two weeks after a whole year of planning the conference, organisation and time and money. And well into planning this conference it was just stopped within the last 10 days. My Lady has found right and properly so that it was stopped, but nevertheless, the hardship and the work that has gone into preparing this conference is obviously considerable. It is only right that we had these arguments here. My Lady.

51. THE JUDGE: All right. Well, I do not think that this is an exceptional case where the defendants should have their costs of the oral hearing but if the case had proceeded in a normal sense, they would have got their costs of the acknowledgement of service. The fact that it was so urgent that matters have been dealt with in the way that they have is not the fault of anybody, it is just the way this sort of case happens. So I think the fairest way of dealing with it is to order that the defendant can have their costs of submitting the written evidence and the skeleton argument but not the costs of attending today.

52. MR McDONALD: Including the one statement that arrived late last night?

53. THE JUDGE: Yes, the written evidence includes that, and the skeleton argument which, as it were, stands as a form of grounds of defence.

54. MR McDONALD: Well, I am sure a schedule will be prepared.

55. THE JUDGE: That will have to be assessed if not agreed.

56. MR McDONALD: Yes.

57. Without attempting at all to go behind my Lady's judgment, but broadly could I just clarify one point. There has not been one single terrorist action in the United Kingdom or in mainland Europe in relation to Israel and Palestine. I know that my Lady mentioned in your ruling. There hasn't been one.

58. THE JUDGE: No, I didn't say they are happening here; I said that over the last 12 months there had been.

59. MR McDONALD: There has been one.

60. THE JUDGE: No, I didn't say there had been any in the UK.

61. MR McDONALD: No, in mainland Europe. Anyway, unless my Lady is referring to the actions in Gaza last summer, there has been nothing.

62. THE JUDGE: Thank you.

THE HONOURABLE MR JUSTICE MORGAN

Mr Justice Morgan:

The applications

1. There are three applications before the court. The first application was made by the Claimants by application notice dated 31 July 2017. Although that application was expressed to be for final injunctions, the application was presented as an application for interim injunctions intended to last until the trial of this action. The background to that application is that on 28 July 2017, I granted the Claimants interim injunctions in similar terms to the orders which are now sought. Those injunctions were granted on the Claimants' ex parte application. I fixed a return date of 12 September 2017 and on that day I heard argument from counsel for the Claimants and from counsel who had been instructed by Mr Boyd and Mr Corré. Mr Boyd and Mr Corré were then joined as the Sixth and Seventh Defendants. On 12 September 2017, I granted interim injunctions which were intended to last for a short period until a further hearing with a time estimate of three days to enable the court to hear argument on the many points which needed to be considered. That hearing took place on 31 October and 1 and 2 November 2017.

2. The second application was made by the Sixth Defendant by application notice dated 6 September 2017. By that application, the Sixth Defendant sought the discharge and/or the variation of the ex parte order I had made on 28 July 2017. The third application was made by the Seventh Defendant by application notice dated 6 September 2017. By that application, the Seventh Defendant sought the discharge of the ex parte order I had made on 28 July 2017. The second and third applications were before the court on 12 September 2017 when I continued the ex parte order and the two applications of 6 September 2017 were presented at the three-day hearing as applications to discharge the ex parte order of 28 July 2017 and the further order which I made on 12 September 2017.

The Claimants

3. There are ten Claimants. The First Claimant is a subsidiary company of the INEOS corporate group, a privately owned global manufacturer of chemicals, speciality chemicals and oil products. The First Claimants commercial activities include shale gas exploration in the UK. It is the lessee of four of the Sites which are the subject of the Claimants' application (Sites 1, 2, 3 and 7). The lessors in relation to these four sites include the Fifth to Tenth Claimants. The Second to Fourth Claimants are companies within the INEOS corporate group. They are the proprietors of Sites 4, 5 and 6 respectively. The Fourth Claimant is the lessee of Site 8 and it has applied to the Land Registry to be registered as the leasehold owner of that site. I will refer to the First to Fourth Claimants as "Ineos" without distinguishing between them. The Fifth to Tenth Claimants are all individuals. The Fifth Claimant is the freeholder of Site 1. The Sixth to Eighth Claimants are the freeholders of Site 2. The Ninth to Tenth Claimants are the freeholders of Site 7. The various sites are described below.

The Sites

4. There are eight sites which are relevant. Site 1 is described as land and buildings on the south side of Dronfield Road, Eckington, Sheffield. Site 2 is described as land and buildings at Carr Farm, Winney Lane, Harthill, Sheffield. Site 3 is described as land and buildings known as Four Topped Oak, Farnworth Road, Penketh, Warrington. Site 4 is described as land and knowns known as land for a Wellhead Site, Givenhead Farm, Ebberston, Snailton, North Yorkshire. Site 5 is described as land and buildings known as Hawkslease, Chapel Lane, Lyndhurst. Site 6 is described as land and buildings known as 38 Hans Crescent, London SW1. Site 7 is described as land and buildings on the south side of Woodsetts Road, Woodsetts, Rotherham, South Yorkshire. Site 8 is described as land and buildings known as Anchor House, 15-19 Britten Street, London. Sites 1, 2, 3, 4 and 7 comprise agricultural land. The buildings on sites 5, 6 and 8 are office buildings.

5. I was given detailed evidence about the planning applications which have been made in relation to some of these sites. I will give a brief summary of that evidence. On 8 May 2017, Ineos applied for planning permission to drill a vertical core well for shale gas exploration on Site 1. That application has been the subject of a public consultation. The position is similar in relation to Site 2 where the application was made on 30 May 2017. It is expected that the application for Site 2 will be considered by the planning committee on 23 November 2017 and it is thought to be likely that the committee will receive a recommendation for refusal of permission on traffic grounds. Ineos would wish to discuss the traffic issues with the local authority with a view to resolving them.

6. Sites 3 and 4 are not the subject of a planning application in relation to shale gas exploration. Site 3 is an existing coalbed methane production site with four wells. Site 4 is a site in Scarborough with two wells on it.

7. As to Site 7, in July 2017, Ineos submitted an Environmental Assessment Screening Report in respect of an intended application for planning permission to drill a vertical core well for shale gas exploration. The local planning authority has since confirmed that it will not require an Environmental Impact Assessment as part of a future planning application for this use. Ineos' evidence stated that it intended to submit such an application at the end of October 2017 but I do not have further information about that matter.

The Defendants

8. There are seven Defendants or groups of Defendants. The first five groups of Defendants are described as persons unknown with, in each case, further wording which is designed to provide a definition of the persons who fall into the group. The First Defendant is described as:

> "Persons unknown entering or remaining without the consent of the Claimant(s) on land and buildings shown shaded red on the plans annexed to the Amended Claim Form".

9. The Second Defendant is described as:

> "Persons unknown interfering with the First and Second claimants' rights to pass and repass with or without vehicles, materials and equipment over private access roads on land shown shaded orange on the plans annexed to the Amended Claim Form without the consent of the Claimant(s)".

10. The Third Defendant is described as

> "Persons unknown interfering with the right of way enjoyed by the Claimant(s) each of its and their agents, servants, contractors, sub-contractors, group companies, licensees, employees, partners, consultants, family members and friends over land shown shaded purple on the plans annexed to the Amended Claim Form".

11. The Fourth Defendant is described as > "Persons unknown pursuing any course of conduct such as amounts to harassment of the Claimants and/or any third party contrary to the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 with the intention set out in paragraph 10 of the [relevant] order".

12. The Fifth Defendant is described as > "Persons unknown combining together to commit the unlawful acts as specified in paragraph 11 of the [relevant] order with the intention set out in paragraph 11 of the [relevant] order".

13. The Sixth Defendant is Mr Boyd. He appeared through counsel at the hearing on 12 September 2017 and was joined as a Defendant. The Seventh Defendant is Mr Corré. He also appeared through counsel at the hearing on 12 September 2017 and was joined as a Defendant.

Shale gas exploration

14. Ineos is engaged, or wishes to be engaged, in the business of shale gas exploration in the United Kingdom. One method of exploration which it wishes to use involves the hydraulic fracturing of rock formations, known as "fracking". Ineos is not the only operator in the United Kingdom engaged in fracking. Indeed, Ineos is a relative newcomer to this industry in the United Kingdom. Fracking has been carried on in the United Kingdom since the early 1990s.

15. Fracking has been, and remains, lawful in England. Exploration for gas in England can only be carried out under licences issued by the Oil and Gas Authority. Fracking requires planning permission from the local planning authority and is subject to various other controls. In order to identify sites where commercial production of shale gas extraction is considered to be profitable, an operator will need to carry out seismic surveys of the relevant land.

16. Fracking is controversial and has generated widespread public concern and opposition. Since 2013, there has been a number of significant protest events linked to fracking and other kinds of exploration. In 2015, the Association of Chief Police Officers published a report entitled: Policing Linked to Onshore Oil and Gas Operations. The report stated that the most significant of the protest events had been at Balcombe in Sussex, Barton Moss in Greater Manchester, Fylde in Lancashire and West Newton and Crawberry Hill in Humberside. Some of the protests involved the establishment of protest camps, the duration of which varied from a few days to several weeks with the numbers of protestors involved varying from single figures to the low hundreds. The police report continued by stating that many of the protest events involved marches, static demonstrations, obstructions of the highway or site accesses, the use of lock-on type devices and office incursions or occupations. The report stated that the vast majority of the actions taken by protestors were peaceful.

The evidence

17. The parties have served a very considerable amount of evidence in relation to these applications. The Claimants filed seven witness statements before the hearing on 28 July 2017, six more before the hearing on 12 September 2017 and three further statements before the most recent hearing. The Sixth Defendant filed 10 witness statements and the Seventh Defendant filed 14 statements. More witness statements came just before or during the hearing itself. There is a core bundle consisting of five lever arch files and that is accompanied by 23 lever arch files of exhibits.

18. The evidence served by the Claimants sought to describe some of the forms of protest against fracking which have taken place in recent times. The Claimants focussed on the forms of protest which, the Claimants contend, involved unlawful acts which were harmful to fracking operators and third party contractors who supply goods or services to fracking operators. Much of the factual material in the evidence served by the Claimants was not contradicted by the Defendants, although the Defendants did join issue with certain of the comments made or the conclusions drawn by the Claimants and some of the detail of the factual material. The Defendants' evidence stressed the generally peaceful character of anti-fracking protests. The Defendants also commented upon the undesirable effects of the injunctions granted in this case in July and September 2017.

19. In this judgment, I will refer to people who are "protestors" against fracking. It must, however, be remembered that all of the individuals in the United Kingdom who are opposed to fracking do not form a homogeneous group but comprise a great range of individuals with different views as to what is appropriate by way of protesting against fracking. The focus of the Claimants' application is on protests which, the Claimants say, involve unlawful acts. In order to describe the persons who, the Claimants say, ought to be the subject of injunctions, I will refer to those persons as "protestors" but that does not mean that I necessarily agree with the Claimants that the threatened protests are unlawful. That question remains to be examined.

20. Part of the Claimants' evidence explained the Claimants' perception of the benefits of fracking exploration. This part of the Claimants' evidence drew evidence in reply from the Defendants who explained their perception that fracking was not in the public interest. It was accepted at the hearing before me that the court was not in a position to form a view as to which of these perceptions was more accurate. Indeed, it was accepted that this area of dispute, whilst important outside the court room, would not have any real impact on the court's decisions on the many issues which were argued on the present applications.

21. The greater part of the evidence from the Claimants relates to protest activities, which they say are unlawful activities, where the direct target of the protest activity was a company other than Ineos. The direct targets of the protest activities fall into two categories. The first category comprises companies who carry out shale gas exploration or drilling. These companies have been active in the industry for some years whereas Ineos is a relative newcomer to the industry. The evidence shows clearly that the protestors object to the whole industry of shale gas exploration and they do not distinguish between some operators and other operators. This indicates to me that what has happened to other operators in the past will happen to Ineos at some point, in the absence of injunctions. Further, the evidence makes it clear that, before the commencement of these proceedings, the protestors were aware of Ineos as an active, or at least an intending, operator in the industry. There is absolutely no reason to think that the protestors will exempt Ineos from their protest activities. Before the commencement of these proceedings, the protestors were also aware of some or all of the sites which are the subject of these proceedings. In addition, the existence of these proceedings has drawn attention to the eight Sites described earlier.

22. The second category of companies which are the direct targets of protest activities are companies which form part of the supply chain to the operators who carry on shale gas exploration. The evidence makes it clear that the object of the protestors is to cause those companies to withdraw from supplying shale gas operators. Indeed, the protestors have reason to believe that they might succeed with this object. The supply companies do not themselves carry out shale gas exploration and may be able to seek work and contracts in other industries. If the protestors' actions targeting the supply companies convince them that the costs and burdens of those actions are too great, then the supply companies may choose to give up supplying shale gas operators and may not themselves seek relief from the courts to prevent the protestors' actions.

23. In his second witness statement dated 26 July 2017, Mr Talfan Davies, the solicitor for the Claimants, described in detail earlier acts of trespass on the land of other fracking operators. This evidence has been summarised in the skeleton argument for the Claimants as follows:

> "Case Study 1: Preston New Road, Cuadrilla Resources Ltd. Cuadrilla obtained planning permission on 16 1 16. From 14 8 14 to date there have been numerous serious instances of trespass resulting in court proceedings for possession and injunctive relief.
> Case Study 2: Leith Hill, Europa Oil & Gas (UK) Ltd. Europa was granted planning permission in August 2015. On about 29 10 16, prior to works commencing, protestors moved on to the site and established a "protection camp". Protestors dug tunnels and built tree houses on the proposed drill site, again resulting in court proceedings.
> Case Study 3: Daneshill, Dart Energy Ltd. A camp was set up outside the site and there have been acts of trespass onto the site.
> Case Study 4: Dutton's Lane, Upton, IGas Energy plc. In May 2013, IGas was granted planning permission to begin exploratory drilling. In April 2014 protestors set up camp on the site. There were court proceedings. It took 20 months for eviction to be achieved and the process took the police and bailiffs 9 hours. Protestors locked themselves into structures, hid in underground tunnels and even set their hands in concrete.

Case Study 5: Barton Moss/Barton Bridge, IGas Energy plc. In June 2014 an extension to a planning permission was sought. The site was occupied by protestors.

Case Study 6: Crawberry Hill, Walkinton, Rathlin Energy (UK) Limited. In May 2014 a permit to undertake exploratory drilling was obtained. A matter of days later, a number of protestors, including D6, unlawfully trespassed on the site, and set up a protest camp, on which they constructed a small fortress from wooden pallets. This was not dismantled for some 3 months and upon being dismantled a further small fortress was constructed by protestors on adjoining land. This remained in-situ for some 6 months.

These acts of trespass have frequently been of an aggravated nature. They have required protracted and expensive proceedings to clear the sites, and have given rise to extremely dangerous conditions posing a serious risk of harm to both protestors and others. The history of activity at these sites demonstrates that trespassing protestors against hydraulic fracturing are typically well-organized, coordinated, determined. Such protestors have shown themselves not to be deterred by the prospect, some months down the line, of being the subject of eviction proceedings."

24. In his second witness statement, Mr Talfan Davies described the actions of protestors attempting to block the primary access way to operators' sites (and the sites of their contractors) either by standing or parking in front of the site entrances or by attaching themselves to the entrances. The Claimants' skeleton argument summarised this evidence (together with later evidence which updated it) as follows:

"In the period January-August 2017, at Cuadrilla's Preston New Road site, protestors locked themselves to fencing outside the site entrance; obstructed a lorry; congregated on the public highway, forcing its closure; and engaged in numerous "lock-on" protests outside the site entrance. D6 played a key role in these protests. The protestors continue to congregate at the site on a daily basis with the purpose of blocking access, resulting in a number of road closures over the past months.

On 6 2 17, protestors blocked access to a quarry operated by a supplier to the shale gas industry, Armstrong Aggregates, resulting in the termination of the company's supply to Cuadrilla.

On 10 3 17, AE Yates, a supplier of Cuadrilla, was subjected to a "slow walk" on the public highway outside the entrance of its > depot in Bolton. The company suffered a "lock on" protest at the entrance to the depot on 3 4 17.

> On 27 3 17, protestors targeted a supplier of the shale gas industry, Tarmac and Aggregate Industries, with an 11-hour blockade.
> On 30 3 17, anti-hydraulic fracturing protestors blocked the entrance to Eddie Stobart's Orford Depot. They engaged in slow walking outside the depot on 3 4 17.
> On 6 4 17, a supplier of Cuadrilla, Lomas Distribution, was subjected to a "slow walk", leading to protestors being arrested on suspicion of an offence under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980.
> On 25 April 2017, a number of protestors blockaded access to a site operated by Third Energy UK Gas Ltd near Kirby Misperton, North Yorkshire. This protest camp is situated on private farmland off a main road, being the main road via which access is afforded to Third Energy's site. The ongoing protestor activity has escalated since the 12 September 2017 hearing. The recent activity (covering the period up to 11 October 2017) is set out in detail in the seventh witness statement of Mr Talfan Davies."

25. In his second witness statement, Mr Talfan Davies gave evidence as to the actions of protestors which were aimed directly at contractors providing services to fracking operators, where the actions were designed to force or persuade the contractors to cease to provide those services. Mr Talfan Davies referred to a large number of matters of which the following is a selection:

(1) on 10 March 2017, protestors congregated outside the depot of A E Yates, a supplier of Cuadrilla, and engaged in a slow walk in order to delay vehicles leaving the depot; on 3 May 2017, protestors engaged in a lock on at this supplier's depot in Bolton;

(2) on 3 February 2017, protestors obstructed a Moore Readymix lorry on its way to Cuadrilla's site in Preston New Road;

(3) on 6 April 2017, protestors engaged in a slow walk outside the depot of Lomas Distribution, a supplier of Cuadrilla;

(4) on 18 February 2017, protestors entered the offices of MediaZoo, PR consultants for Ineos and chained themselves to piping in the lobby of the offices;

(5) in early 2017, protestors engaged in an event called "Break the Chain" intended to break the supply chain to fracking operators; the protestors targeted Tarmac & Aggregate Industries, Yorkshire Water, Centrica, A E Yates and Bell Pottinger;

(6) on 30 March 2017, protestors blocked the entranceway to Eddie Stobart's depot in Cheshire and engaged in slow walking in front of their lorries at Appleton Thorn;

(7) on 7 April 2017, protestors targeted the drilling company P R Marriott, a shale gas industry supplier; the protestors chained themselves to the gates of P R Marriott's depot; there were further incidents concerning P R Marriott on 23 May 2017, 1 July 2017, 13 July 2017 and 18 July 2017.

26. The Claimants also rely on a witness statement dated 5 September 2017 from Mr Hobday of P R Marriott in which he gave more detail as to the nature of the protests aimed at his company and the effect of those protests on his business. In addition to many incidents of blocking the entrance to its depot and slow walking in front of its lorries, Mr Hobday refers to incidents of lock-ons and protestors climbing on to the roof of lorries to prevent them moving and trespass on to the depot itself. He also refers to the setting up during the night on 30 June 2017 of a protest camp on land near to the company's depot; the land is owned by a third party and not P R Marriott.

27. In his fifth witness statement dated 5 September 2017, Mr Talfan Davies gave further evidence of protestors' activity, trespassing on private land, blocking the entrance to the operators' sites and targeting the businesses of suppliers to operators. Mr Talfan Davies provided further detailed evidence on these matters in his seventh witness statement dated 19 October 2017 and in his eighth witness statement dated 25 October 2017.

28. On 5 September 2017, Assistant Chief Constable Terry Woods wrote to the Chief Executive of United Kingdom Onshore Oil and Gas with information as to the nature and extent of protestor activity in relation to fracking. He made the following points:

(1) there were at that date six occupied anti-fracking camps in England and Wales;

(2) in early 2016, an initial increase in oil and gas exploration activity prompted a corresponding increase in anti-fracking campaigns and protest activity;

(3) since the beginning of 2017, there had been a significant uplift in anti-fracking protests directed at active drilling sites involving community-based protestors and more established environmental protest groups;

(4) although protests had mainly been peaceful, 2017 saw a significant increase in direct action with a sizeable number of arrests; the vast majority of arrests were for obstruction of the highway and of the police, infringement of section 14 of the Public Order Act, criminal damage, threatening behaviour and assault on the police;

(5) during the first three months of 2017, there were 60 arrests of anti-fracking protestors, a considerable increase on the 2016 figures;

(6) in the second quarter of 2017, there were 138 related arrests;

(7) in the third quarter of 2017, the figures for arrests were likely to be similar to the second quarter;

(8) a small number of anti-fracking activists were willing to engage in criminality and direct action;

(9) the protests have required significant policing operations;

(10) the tactics used by some protestors included:

a. slow walking;

b. placing bicycles and cars in the path of vehicles;

c. placing placards in front of drivers' windscreens;

d. climbing onto haulage tankers;

e. haulage vehicles being followed back to the depot to identify the contractor involved;

f. parking across site gates;

g. the impeding of site workers;

h. lock-on blockades of site entrances;

i. lock-ons to the underside of vehicles;

j. the targeting of secondary and tertiary supply companies.

(11) there were protestor activities at Little Plumpton in Lancashire on 22 days in July 2017 alone, leading to multiple arrests;

(12) the above-mentioned protests in July 2017 have had a significant adverse impact on the local area, businesses, public services and the police service, in the latter case with a significant financial impact on the police budget.

29. The evidence shows clearly that there is a considerable degree of organisation and exchange of information via social media between some groups of protestors. The evidence from social media shows that the identity of Ineos is well known to many potential protestors. That evidence also shows that groups of protestors were aware of areas of land in which Ineos has an interest and where it will wish to carry out seismic testing and/or drilling. I will give some examples of these matters.

30. The website "Drill or Drop" identified Site 1 in January 2017. The same website identified Site 2 in March 2017. There were acts of trespass on Site 1 in January 2017; it is possible that these acts were by protestors against fracking but I could not find on the balance of probabilities that that was the case. There were protests against Ineos' contractor at or near Site 2 on 21 July 2017.

31. Sites 3 and 4 potentially raise different considerations. Site 3 is an existing coalbed methane production site with four wells. Site 3 has not been a target for protestors but Ineos consider that there is a risk of a breach of security at Site 3. Acts of trespass on Site 3 would pose a risk to trespassers. Site 4 is a site in Scarborough with two well cellars on it. Site 4 has been the subject of trespass in the past and has been the subject of threats on social media. Site 4 would also pose a risk to trespassers upon it.

32. In August 2017, there were significant exchanges on social media when two protestors exchanged information about vehicles used by Ineos, including descriptions and registrations. Also in August 2017, following the granting of the ex parte injunctions, one protestor suggested visiting Ineos' office at Site 6 to "test the injunction".

33. There is clear evidence that persons opposed to seismic testing and drilling have stolen or tampered with seismic testing equipment on various of the Ineos sites.

34. I referred earlier to the fact that, on 18 February 2017, protestors entered the offices of MediaZoo, PR consultants for Ineos and chained themselves to piping in the lobby of the offices.

35. Ineos' seismic testing equipment has been stored at the P R Marriott depot which has been the subject of sustained protests.

Matters requiring consideration

36. I heard detailed submissions on a large number of matters which were said to be relevant to my decision in this case. I will consider those matters in the following order:

    (1) The acts which are alleged to be unlawful;

    (2) Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms;

    (3) The test for an interim injunction;

    (4) Quia timet injunctions;

    (5) The likely result at a trial;

    (6) Persons unknown;

    (7) The duty of candour on an ex parte application;

    (8) The need for clarity and precision; and

    (9) Whether I should grant any injunctions.

The acts which are alleged to be unlawful

37. The Claimants' case is that the evidence to which I have referred shows that anti-fracking protestors have in the past, to a considerable extent, committed many serious unlawful acts as part of their protests. The Claimants say that they themselves have been the subject of some of these unlawful acts but their principal concern is as to the future. They do not wish to be subjected to serious and extensive unlawful acts in the future and they submit that the court should be prepared to intervene to prevent such unlawful acts and to allow Ineos to carry out its lawful business without such interference.

38. The Claimants have identified the following causes of action in relation to the unlawful acts to which they refer. The causes of action are:

(1) trespass on private land;

(2) actionable interference with private rights of way;

(3) public nuisance caused by interference with the Claimants' right to pass and repass on the highway, where the Claimants are able to show they have suffered particular damage over and above the ordinary damage suffered by the public at large;

(4) harassment contrary to the Protection from Harassment Act 1997; and

(5) conspiracy to injure the Claimants by unlawful means, namely, various criminal offences which are:

a. intimidation by annoyance or violence contrary to section 241(1) of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992;

b. criminal damage contrary to section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971;

c. theft contrary to section 1 of the Theft Act 1968;

d. obstruction of the highway contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980;

e. causing danger to road-users contrary to section 22A of the Road Traffic Act 1988.

39. Leaving aside the present context which involves various forms of protest in relation to a matter which is of genuine public concern, there is not much dispute between the parties as to the ingredients of the causes of action relied upon by the Claimants. I will briefly describe those causes of action in a little more detail without regard, in the first instance, to Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and then I will consider the potential impact of Articles 10 and 11 in this case.

Trespass

40. The cause of action for trespass on private land needs no further exposition in this case.

Private nuisance

41. As to the cause of action for interference with a private easement, where the cause of action is in private nuisance, the position was described by Mummery LJ in West v Sharp (1999) 79 P&CR 327 at 332, as follows:

> "Not every interference with an easement, such as a right of way, is actionable. There must be a substantial interference with the enjoyment of it. There is no actionable interference with a right of way if it can be substantially and practically exercised as conveniently after as before the occurrence of the alleged obstruction. Thus, the grant of a right of way in law in respect of every part of a defined area does not involve the proposition that the grantee can in fact object to anything done on any part of the area which would obstruct passage over that part. He can only object to such activities, including obstruction, as substantially interfere with the exercise of the defined right as for the time being is reasonably required by him."

Public nuisance

42. In relation to the cause of action for obstruction of the highway, the Claimants put their case in public nuisance. However, I note that Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 21st ed., at para. 20-180 states that the right of an owner of land adjoining the highway to gain access to the highway is a private common law right distinct from the right of the owner of the land to use the highway itself as a member of the public.

43. Some obstructions of the highway will amount to a public nuisance. I did not hear detailed submissions as to what amounts to a sufficient obstruction of the highway for the purposes of public nuisance. Instead I heard submissions as to what would amount to an obstruction of the highway for the purposes of the criminal offence created by section 137 of the Highways Act 1980. The parties assumed that the same basic principles applied to the public nuisance and to the criminal offence.

44. The position in relation to actions which amount to an obstruction of the highway, for the purposes of public nuisance, is described in Halsbury's Laws, 5th ed. (2012) at para. 325 where it is said:

(1) whether an obstruction amounts to a nuisance is a question of fact;

(2) an obstruction may be so inappreciable or so temporary as not to amount to a nuisance;

(3) generally, it is a nuisance to interfere with any part of the highway; and

(4) it is not a defence to show that although the act complained of is a nuisance with regard to the highway it is in other respects beneficial to the public.

The notes to para. 325 contain references to cases where the test for obstruction is variously described. Thus, it has been said that any wrongful act or omission upon or near a highway whereby the public is prevented from freely, safely and conveniently passing along the highway is a nuisance. An obstruction is caused where the highway is rendered impassable or more difficult to pass along by reason of some physical obstacle.

45. In Harper v G N Haden & Sons [1933] Ch 298 at 320, Romer LJ said:

> "The law relating to the user of highways is in truth the law of give and take. Those who use them must in doing so have reasonable regard to the convenience and comfort of others, and must not themselves expect a degree of convenience and comfort only obtainable by disregarding that of other people. They must expect to be obstructed occasionally. It is the price they pay for the privilege of obstructing others."

46. A member of the public has a right to sue for a public nuisance if he has suffered particular damage over and above the ordinary damage suffered by the public at large: see R v Rimmington [2006] 1 AC 459 at [7] and [44].

The Protection from Harassment Act 1997

47. In relation to the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, as amended by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (I will refer to the 1997 Act as amended as "the 1997 Act"), it is helpful to distinguish between a claim under the 1997 Act brought by an individual and a claim brought by a company. This is because section 7(5) provides that references in the 1997 Act to "a person", in the context of the harassment of a person, are references to a person who is an individual. Other references in the 1997 Act to "a person" can therefore include a company.

48. In the case of an individual, such as the Fifth to Tenth Claimants, such a person has a cause of action, under sections 1(1) and 3(1), where he or she is the victim of a course of conduct pursued by another person which course of conduct amounts to harassment of the victim and which the other person knows or ought to know amounts to harassment of the victim.

49. In the case of a company, such as the First to Fourth Claimants, such a person may have a cause of action pursuant to sections 1(1A) and 3A. Section 1A of the 1997 Act provides that a person must not pursue a course of conduct:

> "(a) which involves harassment of two or more persons, and
> (b) which he knows or ought to know involves harassment of those persons; and
> (c) by which he intends to persuade any person (whether or not those mentioned above) (i) not to do something that he is entitled to or required to do; or (ii) to do something that he is not under any obligation to do."

50. Accordingly, pursuant to section 1(1A) and 3A, Ineos can sue a defendant who pursues a course of conduct which the defendant knows or ought to know involves harassment of two or more individuals, who are (for example) members of the staff of Ineos, by which the defendant intends to persuade those members of staff or anyone else (such as Ineos itself) not to do something which it is entitled to do or to do something which it is not under an obligation to do. Similarly, Ineos can sue a defendant who pursues a course of conduct which the defendant knows or ought to know involves harassment of two or more individuals, who are (for example) members of the staff of PR Marriott, by which the defendant intends to persuade those members of staff or anyone else (such as PR Marriott or Ineos itself) not to do something which it is entitled to do or to do something which it is not under an obligation to do.

51. Both sections 1(1) and 1(1A) are subject to section 1(3) which provides that those provisions do not apply to a course of conduct if the person who pursued it shows:

> "(a) that it was pursued for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime,
> (b) that it was pursued under any enactment or rule of law or to comply with any condition or requirement imposed by any person under any enactment; or
> (c) that in the particular circumstances the pursuit of the course was reasonable".

Section 1(3)(c) of the 1997 Act imposes an objective test of reasonableness: see also R v Colohan [2001] 2 FLR 757.

52. Section 7(2) of the 1997 Act provides that: "references to harassing a person include alarming the person or causing the person distress". This is a non-exhaustive definition. In Thomas v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2002] EMLR 78 at [30], Lord Phillips MR said that: ""Harassment is … a word which is generally understood".

53. More assistance as to the scope of "harassment" is provided by Majrowski v Guy's and St Thomas' NHS Trust [2007] 1 AC 224. In that case, Lord Nicholls said at [30]:

> "Courts are well able to separate the wheat from the chaff at an early stage of the proceedings. They should be astute to do so. In most cases courts should have little difficulty in applying the "close connection" test. Where the claim meets that requirement, and the quality of the conduct said to constitute harassment is being examined, courts will have in mind that irritations, annoyances, even a measure of upset, arise at times in everybody's day-to-day dealings with other people. Courts are well able to recognise the boundary between conduct which is unattractive, even unreasonable, and conduct which is oppressive and unacceptable. To cross the boundary from the regrettable to the unacceptable the gravity of the misconduct must be of an order which would sustain criminal liability under section 2 ."

In the same case, Baroness Hale referred to the aim of the 1997 Act as being to deter, to punish and to encourage the perpetrator to mend his ways. She referred to "the sort of specific prohibitions which may be helpfully contained in an injunction". She then said at [66]:

> "If this was the aim, it is easy to see why the definition of harassment was left deliberately wide and open-ended. It does require a course of conduct, but this can be shown by conduct on at least two occasions (or since 2005 by conduct on one occasion to each of two or more people): section 7(3) . All sorts of conduct may amount to harassment. It includes alarming a person or causing her distress: section 7(2) . But conduct might be harassment even if no alarm or distress were in fact caused. A great deal is left to the wisdom of the courts to draw sensible lines between the ordinary banter and badinage of life and genuinely offensive and unacceptable behaviour."

54. Section 7(3) of the 1997 Act provides that: "a 'course of conduct' must involve ... (b) in the case of conduct in relation to two or more persons, conduct on at least one occasion in relation to each of those persons". Section 7(3A) of the 1997 Act provides that:

> "[a] person's conduct on any occasion shall be taken, if aided, abetted, counselled or procured by another –
> (a) to be conduct on that occasion of the other (as well as conduct of the person whose conduct it is); and
> (b). to be conduct in relation to which the other's knowledge and purpose, and what he ought to have known, are the same as they were in relation to what was contemplated or reasonably foreseeable at the time of the aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring."

55. Section 2 of the 1997 Act creates the crime of harassment. Sections 3 and 3A create the statutory tort. The only difference between the tort and the crime is in the standard of proof required: Ferguson v British Gas Trading Ltd [2009] 3 All ER 304. Sections 3 and 3A refer to the possibility of the court granting an injunction in relation to "an actual or apprehended breach" of sections 1(1) or 1(1A) and to the consequences of the grant of such an injunction.

Conspiracy

56. The type of conspiracy alleged by the Claimants is a conspiracy to injure by unlawful means. They do not seek to rely upon a conspiracy using lawful means, where the predominant intent is to injure the Claimants.

57. For there to be a conspiracy to injure by unlawful means, there must be:

    (1) a combination by two or more persons;

    (2) to undertake an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means;

    (3) with the intention to injure the claimant; and

    (4) causing loss and damage to the claimant.

58. The unlawful acts asserted by the Claimants are said to be criminal offences. It was not disputed before me that the criminal acts which are asserted by the Claimants in this case constitute unlawful acts for the purposes of this tort: see JSC BTA Bank v Ablayazov (No 14) [2017] QB 853 at [46]-[47] and [53]-[54].

59. The Claimants rely on the tort of conspiracy to deal with the problem, as they perceive it, that the unlawful acts intended to be committed by the protestors will have a direct impact upon the supply chain of goods and services to Ineos but where the real target of the acts will be Ineos itself. The tort of conspiracy allows a victim of a conspiracy to sue where the acts are aimed at that victim even where the unlawful behaviour has its most direct impact on a third party. The other value of the tort of conspiracy from the Claimants' point of view is that it enables them to claim a remedy in a civil court for breach of a criminal statute where the conduct in question does not, absent a conspiracy, lead to civil liability.

60. The criminal offences which are asserted by the Claimants are:

(1) intimidation by annoyance or violence contrary to section 241(1) of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992;

(2) criminal damage contrary to section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971;

(3) theft contrary to section 1 of the Theft Act 1968;

(4) obstruction of the highway contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980; and

(5) causing danger to road-users contrary to section 22A of the Road Traffic Act 1988.

61. Section 241(1) of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992 provides:

> "(1) A person commits an offence who, with a view to compelling another person to abstain from doing or to do any act which that person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority –
> (a) uses violence to or intimidates that person or his spouse or civil partner or children, or injures his property,
> (b) persistently follows that person about from place to place,
> (c) hides any tools, clothes or other property owned or used by that person, or deprives him of or hinders him in the use thereof,
> (d) watches or besets the house or other place where that person resides, works, carries on business or happens to be, or the approach to any such house or place, or

> (e) follows that person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road."

62. This offence is not confined to the context of industrial disputes, and can be committed by protestors: DPP v Todd [1966] Crim LR 344. The word "wrongfully" requires that the offending conduct under s.241(1) be independently unlawful as a civil wrong: Blackstone's Criminal Practice 2017 at B11.140, B11.144. The words "intimidates", "persistently follows" and "in a disorderly manner" are to be given their ordinary, natural meaning. The essence of "watching and besetting" is preventing access to and egress from somewhere: Blackstone's Criminal Practice 2017 at B11.144.

63. Criminal damage and theft do not require any exposition in this case.

64. Section 137(1) of the Highways Act 1980 is in these terms:

> "If a person, without lawful authority or excuse, in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway he is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine …".

65. In order for there to be an offence under section 137 of the 1980 Act, it must be shown that:

    (1) there is an obstruction of the highway which is more than de minimis; occupation of a part of a road, thus interfering with people having the use of the whole of the road, is an obstruction: Nagy v Weston [1965] 1 All ER 78 at 80 B-C;

    (2) the obstruction must be wilful, i.e. deliberate;

    (3) the obstruction must be without lawful authority or excuse; "without lawful excuse" may be the same thing as "unreasonably" or it may be that it must in addition be shown that the obstruction is unreasonable.

66. It is helpful to refer to four cases involving protest on the highway, namely, Hubbard v Pitt [1976] QB 142, Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (1987) 85 CR App Rep 143, DPP v Jones [1999] 2 AC 240 and Birch v DPP [2000] Crim LR 301.

67. In Hubbard v Pitt, in relation to a claim for an interim injunction to restrain picketing outside an estate agency, Lord Denning held (applying Nagy v Weston) that the picketing was a reasonable use of the highway. There is an important passage in his judgment at pages 178-179, which I will not set out, which discussed the legal position (even before Articles 10 and 11) as to the right to demonstrate and the right to protest. He said that such demonstrations and protests were not prohibited "[a]s long as all is done peaceably and in good order, without threats or incitement to violence or obstruction to traffic". This was a dissenting judgment in that the majority of the court granted an injunction on the basis of a claim in private nuisance. However, the parts of Lord Denning's judgment to which I have referred have been approved in later cases.

68. In Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, it was held that the phrase "without lawful authority or excuse" covered activities otherwise lawful in themselves which might be reasonable in all the circumstances. The court approved a passage in Nagy v Weston (not itself a case involving demonstrations or protests) which referred to the length of time taken up by the obstruction, the place where it occurred, the purpose for which it was done and whether it caused an actual obstruction rather than a potential obstruction. It was also said that the activity causing the obstruction must be inherently lawful. An obstruction caused by unlawful picketing in pursuance of a trade dispute would be "without lawful excuse".

69. In DPP v Jones, the issue was as to the scope of the public's rights of access to the public highway and whether those rights of access were restricted so that they precluded any right of peaceful assembly on the highway: see per Lord Irvine of Lairg at page 251D-E. The argument for the prosecutor in that case was that the public's right of access was restricted to a right to pass and repass and other incidental activities; any wider use of the highway was said to be a trespass. The argument arose in the context of section 14A of the Public Order Act 1986 which referred to a "trespassory assembly". This argument was rejected. Lord Irvine reviewed the cases where actions on the highway were held to exceed the public's rights of access to the highway. At page 254G-255A, he said:

> "The question to which this appeal gives rise is whether the law today should recognise that the public highway is a public place, on which all manner of reasonable activities may go on. For the reasons I set out below in my judgment it should. Provided these activities are reasonable, do not involve the commission of a public or private nuisance, and do not amount to an obstruction of the highway unreasonably impeding the primary right of the general public to pass and repass, they should not constitute a trespass. Subject to these qualifications, therefore, there would be a public right of peaceful assembly on the public highway."

70. Later in his speech in DPP v Jones, Lord Irvine considered section 137 of the Highways Act and the earlier cases including Hirst and Agu with which he obviously agreed. Lord Clyde agreed with Lord Irvine and he stated at page 281E-F:

> "I am not persuaded that in any case where there is a peaceful non-obstructive assembly it will necessarily exceed the public's right of access to the highway. The question then is, as in this kind of case it may often turn out to be, whether on the facts here the limit was passed and the exceeding of it established. The test then is not one which can be defined in general terms but has to depend upon the circumstances as a matter of degree. It requires a careful assessment of the nature and extent of the activity in question. If the purpose of the activity becomes the predominant purpose of the occupation of the highway, or if the occupation becomes more than reasonably transitional in terms of either time or space, then it may come to exceed the right to use the highway."

Lord Hutton agreed with Lord Irvine.

71. The issue in DPP v Jones related to what amounted to a trespass on the highway and the majority in the House of Lords stressed that the assembly in that case was not obstructive. Nonetheless, the majority did approve Hirst and Agu which had considered section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 and held that it is possible to have an obstruction of the highway which is reasonable and therefore has a lawful excuse for the purposes of that section.

72. In Birch v DPP, a peaceful demonstration involved protestors sitting on the road blocking the traffic. It was held that no one was permitted unreasonably to obstruct the highway and that there was no right to demonstrate in a way which did obstruct the highway.

73. Section 22A(1) and (2) of the Road Traffic Act 1988 provides:

> "(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he intentionally and without lawful authority or reasonable cause -
> (a) causes anything to be on or over a road, or
> (b) interferes with a motor vehicle, trailer or cycle, or
> (c) interferes (directly or indirectly) with traffic equipment,
> in such circumstances that it would be obvious to a reasonable person that to do so would be dangerous.
> (2) In subsection (1) above 'dangerous' refers to danger either of injury to any person while on or near a road, or of serious damage to property on or near a road; and in determining for the purposes of that subsection what would be obvious to a reasonable person in a particular case, regard shall be had not only to the circumstances of which he could be expected to be aware but also to any circumstances shown to have been within the knowledge of the accused."

Articles 10 and 11

74. As I explained earlier, I have so far considered the causes of action relied upon by the Claimants without explicit regard being paid to Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. It is agreed that these Articles are engaged on the facts of this case even though none of the Claimants is a public authority.

75. Article 10 provides:

> "(1). Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. …

> (2). The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

76. Article 11 provides:

> "(1). Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.
> (2). No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. This Article shall not prevent the exercise of these rights by members of the armed forced, or the police, or of the administration of the State."

77. The demonstrations and protests in this case do involve the expressions of opinions and assembly and association with others. Both Articles confer qualified, rather than absolute, rights. Both Articles are qualified in relation to matters which involve public safety, matters needed for the prevention of disorder or crime and for the protection of the rights of others.

78. Ms Williams QC, for the Sixth Defendant made a number of submissions as to the significance of Articles 10 and 11 and cited a number of relevant authorities. In particular, she submitted:

(1) freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, one of the basic conditions for its progress and the development of every man;

(2) freedom of expression is available for ideas which offend, shock or disturb the State or any sector of the population;

(3) although Article 11 refers to "peaceful assembly" the only type of assembly which did not qualify were those in which the organisers and participants intended to use violence or where they denied the foundations of a democratic society; use by a small number of protestors of violence did not lead to the whole assembly being branded as non-peaceful;

(4) direct action protests can fall within Articles 10 and 11; such protests can include lock-ons, sit ins, protest camps and long term occupations;

(5) although Articles 10 and 11 do not justify criminality or breaches of the law, these Articles do extend to direct action protest activity which deliberately intends to cause annoyance, offence or disruption;

(6) whether the Articles confer a right to carry on direct action protest activity in a particular case will depend upon whether the rival right which is said to qualify Articles 10 and 11, for example the criminal law or the rights of others, satisfies the threefold test referred to below;

(7) the threefold test is that the matter relied upon to restrict or qualify the rights conferred by these Articles, must be:

a) prescribed by law; and

b) necessary in a democratic society; and

c) pursue one or more of the legitimate aims specified in Article 10(2) or 11(2), as the case may be.

(8) a matter is prescribed by law only if it satisfies the established principles as to certainty and legality;

(9) whether something is necessary in a democratic society requires the court to consider whether the interference with the Article 10 or Article 11 right corresponds to a pressing social need and whether it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued; restraints on freedom of expression are acceptable only to the extent that they are necessary and justified by compelling reasons; the need for restraint must be convincingly established; this submission applied not only as to whether Articles 10(2) and 11(2) restricted the rights to freedom of expression and assembly by reference to the rights of others but also extended to the question whether the rights of others should be protected by the criminal law or additionally protected by the grant of an injunction.

79. In addition to a number of leading Strasbourg cases which established the above propositions, Ms Williams cited a number of domestic decisions, namely, Westminster CC v Haw [2002] EWHC 2073 (QB), Tabernacle v Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWCA Civ 23, Mayor of London v Hall [2010] EWCA Civ 817, [2011] 1 WLR 504 and City of London v Samede [2012] EWCA Civ 160, [2012] 2 All ER 1039 which are relevant in the present case as they concerned protests involving direct action.

80. In Westminster CC v Haw, the highway authority sought a final injunction to remove Mr Haw who was camping on the pavement opposite the Houses of Parliament. The court (Gray J) applied the authorities to which I have earlier referred as to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 and asked whether Mr Haw's obstruction of the pavement was unreasonable. The court had regard to the duration, place, purpose and effect of the obstruction as well as the fact that Mr Haw was exercising his right to freedom of expression under Article 10. It was held that the obstruction was reasonable.

81. In Tabernacle v Secretary of State for Defence, the Court of Appeal considered an application for judicial review of a bye-law made by the Secretary of State for Defence which would have the effect of banning a protest camp at Aldermaston. The court asked itself whether the Secretary of State had justified the bye-law in a way which satisfied the requirements of Articles 10 and 11. It was held that he had not done so as the suggested justification was limited to dealing with possible nuisance created by the camp. Laws LJ then said at [43]:

> "Rights worth having are unruly things. Demonstrations and protests are liable to be a nuisance. They are liable to be inconvenient and tiresome, or at least perceived as such by others who are out of sympathy with them. Sometimes they are wrong-headed and misconceived. Sometimes they betray a kind of arrogance: an arrogance which assumes that spreading the word is always more important than the mess which, often literally, the exercise leaves behind. In that case, firm but balanced regulation may be well justified. In this case there is no substantial factor of that kind. As for the rest, whether or not the AWPC's cause is wrong-headed or misconceived is neither here nor there, and if their activities are inconvenient or tiresome, the Secretary of State's shoulders are surely broad enough to cope."

82. In Mayor of London v Hall, the Court of Appeal refused permission to appeal to a group of protestors who were camping on Parliament Square against an order for possession and an injunction requiring their removal from the Square. The court regarded the location of the protest as significant (in the protestors' favour) for the purpose of Articles 10 and 11. The court was required to balance the protestors' rights to protest against other matters referred to in Articles 10(2) and 11(2), including the rights of others. The trial judge had referred to issues as to public health and the prevention of criminal damage; he also referred to the rights of others to use the Square. He held that the balancing exercise resulted in it being appropriate to make the order for possession and grant the injunction. The Court of Appeal added into the balancing exercise the rights of different protestors to demonstrate on the Square. The decision in Tabernacle was distinguished. A different result was reached in relation to Mr Haw and a supporter of his and their cases were remitted for further consideration.

83. In City of London v Samede, the Court of Appeal refused permission to appeal to a group of protestors against a possession order and an injunction requiring their removal from St Paul's Churchyard. The protestors relied on Articles 10 and 11 and submitted that the judge had reached the wrong conclusion when carrying out the balancing exercise required by Articles 10 and 11. Referring to the question, posed by the judge, as to the limits to the right of lawful assembly and protest on the highway, Lord Neuberger MR (giving the judgment of the court) said at [39]:

> "As the judge recognised, the answer to the question which he identified at the start of his judgment is inevitably fact sensitive, and will normally depend on a number of factors. In our view, those factors include (but are not limited to) the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance of the precise location to the > protesters, the duration of the protest, the degree to which the protesters occupy the land, and the extent of the actual interference the protest causes to the rights of others, including the property rights of the owners of the land, and the rights of any members of the public."

As to the extent to which the court should take into account the views being expressed by the protestors, Lord Neuberger said at [41]:

> " … we accept that it can be appropriate to take into account the general character of the views whose expression the Convention is being invoked to protect. For instance, political and economic views are at the top end of the scale, and pornography and vapid tittle-tattle is towards the bottom. In this case the judge accepted that the topics of concern to the Occupy Movement were "of very great political importance": para 155. In our view, that was something which could fairly be taken into account. However, it cannot be a factor which trumps all others, and indeed it is unlikely to be a particularly weighty factor: otherwise judges would find themselves according greater protection to views which they think important, or with which they agree."

The test for an interim injunction

84. I will now address the test which I should apply to an application for an interim injunction. Normally, the test is that stated in American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] AC 396 which requires that there be at least a serious question to be tried and then refers to the adequacy of damages for either party and the balance of justice (or convenience). The Defendants say that this does not identify the appropriate test in the present case and that the right test to apply is that laid down in section 12 of the Human Rights Act 1998 which provides:

> "12(1) This section applies if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression.
> (2) If the person against whom the application for relief is made ("the respondent") is neither present nor represented, no such relief is to be granted unless the court is satisfied— (a) that the applicant has taken all practicable steps to notify the respondent; or (b) that there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified.
> (3) No such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed."

85. The meaning of "likely" in section 12(3) was considered in Cream Holdings Ltd v Banerjee [2005] 1 AC 253, in particular at [22] per Lord Nicholls. I do not think that any of the special considerations referred to by Lord Nicholls apply in the circumstances of the present case. I consider that in this case "likely" can simply be taken to mean "more likely than not".

86. The parties did not agree as to whether section 12(3) applies in this case. I am satisfied that it does. I have to ask whether the order I am asked to make "might" affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression. As I am not granting a final injunction after a trial and as I have not therefore made a final determination as to the extent of the Defendants' rights as to freedom of expression, an interim order which restricts demonstrations and protests "might" affect the Defendants' rights to freedom of expression.

Quia timet injunctions

87. The interim injunctions which are sought are mostly, but not exclusively, claimed on a quia timet basis. There are respects in which the Claimants can argue that there have already been interferences with their rights and so the injunctions are to prevent repetitions of those interferences and are not therefore claimed on a quia timet basis. Examples of interferences in the past are said to be acts on trespass on Site 1, theft of, and criminal damage to, seismic testing equipment and various acts of harassment. However, the greater part of the relief is claimed on the basis that the Claimants reasonably apprehend the commission of unlawful acts in the future and they wish to have the protection of orders from the court at this stage to prevent those acts being committed. Accordingly, I will approach the present applications as if they are made solely on the quia timet basis.

88. The general test to be applied by a court faced with an application for a quia timet injunction at trial is quite clear. The court must be satisfied that the risk of an infringement of the claimant's rights causing loss and damage is both imminent and real. The position was described in London Borough of Islington v Elliott [2012] EWCA Civ 56, per Patten LJ at 29, as follows:

> "29 The court has an undoubted jurisdiction to grant injunctive relief on a quia timet basis when that is necessary in order to prevent a threatened or apprehended act of nuisance. But because this kind of relief ordinarily involves an interference with the rights and property of the defendant and may (as in this case) take a mandatory form requiring positive action and expenditure, the practice of the court has necessarily been to proceed with caution and to require to be satisfied that the risk of actual damage occurring is both imminent and real. That is particularly so when, as in this case, the injunction sought is a permanent injunction at trial rather than an interlocutory order granted on American Cyanamid principles having regard to the balance of convenience. A permanent injunction can only be granted if the claimant has proved at the trial that there will be an actual infringement of his rights unless the injunction is granted."

89. In London Borough of Islington v Elliott, the court considered a number of earlier authorities. The authorities concerned claims to quia timet injunctions at the trial of the action. In such cases, particularly where the injunction claimed is a mandatory injunction, the court acts with caution in view of the possibility that the contemplated unlawful act, or the contemplated damage from it, might not occur and a mandatory order, or the full extent of the mandatory order, might not be necessary. Even where the injunction claimed is a prohibitory injunction, it is not enough for the claimant to say that the injunction only restrains the defendant from doing something which he is not entitled to do and causes him no harm: see Paul (KS) (Printing Machinery) v Southern Instruments (Communications) [1964] RPC 118 at 122; there must still be a real risk of the unlawful act being committed. As to whether the contemplated harm is "imminent", this word is used in the sense that the circumstances must be such that the remedy sought is not premature: see Hooper v Rogers [1975] Ch 43 at 49-50. Further, there is the general consideration that "Preventing justice excelleth punishing justice": see Graigola Merthyr Co Ltd v Swansea Corporation [1928] Ch 235 at 242, quoting the Second Institute of Sir Edward Coke at page 299.

90. In the present case, the Claimants are applying for quia timet injunctions on an interim basis, rather than at trial. The passage quoted above from London Borough of Islington v Elliott indicated that different considerations might arise on an interim application. The passage might be read as suggesting that it might be easier to obtain a quia timet injunction on an interim basis. That might be so in a case where the court applies the test in American Cyanamid where all that has to be shown is a serious issue to be tried and then the court considers the adequacy of damages and the balance of justice. Conversely, on an interim application, the court is concerned to deal with the position prior to a trial and at a time when it does not know who will be held to be ultimately right as to the underlying dispute. That might lead the court to be less ready to grant quia timet relief particularly of a mandatory character on an interim basis.

91. I consider that the correct approach to a claim to a quia timet injunction on an interim basis is, normally, to apply the test in American Cyanamid. The parts of the test dealing with the adequacy of damages and the balance of justice, applied to the relevant time period, will deal with most if not all cases where there is argument about whether a claimant needs the protection of the court. However, in the present case, I do have to apply section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998 and ask what order the court is likely to make at a trial of the claim.

92. I have dealt with the question of quia timet relief in a little detail because it was the subject of extensive argument. However, that should not obscure the fact that the decision in this case as to the grant of quia timet relief on an interim basis is not an unduly difficult one.

93. What is the situation here? On the assumption that the evidence does not yet show that protestors have sought to subject Ineos to their direct action protests, I consider that the evidence makes it plain that (in the absence of injunctions) the protestors will seek to do so. The protestors have taken direct action against other fracking operators and there is no reason why they would not include Ineos in the future. The only reason that other operators have been the subject of protests in the past and Ineos has not been (if it has not been) is that Ineos is a more recent entrant into the industry. There is no reason to think that (absent injunctions) Ineos will be treated any differently in the future from the way in which the other fracking operators have been treated in the past. I therefore consider that the risk of the infringement of Ineos' rights is real.

94. The next question is whether the risk of infringement of Ineos' rights is imminent. I have described earlier the sites where Ineos wish to carry out seismic testing and drilling. It seems likely that drilling will not commence in a matter of weeks or even months. However, there have been acts of trespass in other cases on land intended to be used for fracking even before planning permission for fracking had been granted and fracking had begun. I consider that the risk of trespass on Ineos' land by protestors is sufficiently imminent to justify appropriate intervention by the court. Further, there have already been extensive protests outside the depots of third party contractors providing services to fracking operators. One of those contractors is P R Marriott. Ineos uses and intends to use the services of P R Marriott. Accordingly, absent injunctions, there is a continuing risk of obstruction of the highway outside P R Marriott's depot and when that contractor is engaged to provide services to Ineos, those obstructions will harm Ineos.

95. To hold that the risk of an infringement of the rights of Ineos is not imminent with the result that the court did not intervene with injunctions at this stage would leave Ineos in a position where the time at which the protestors might take action against it would be left to the free choice of the protestors without Ineos having any protection from an order of the court. I do not consider that Ineos should be told to wait until it suffers harm from unlawful actions and then react at that time. This particularly applies to the injunctions to restrain trespass on land. If protestors were to set up a protest camp on Ineos' land, the evidence shows that it will take a considerable amount of time before Ineos will be able to recover possession of such land. In addition, Ineos has stated in its evidence on its application that it wishes to have clarity as to what is permitted by way of protest and what is not. That seems to me to be a reasonable request and if the court is able to give that clarity that would seem to be helpful to the Claimants and it ought to have been considered to be helpful by the Defendants. A clear injunction would allow the protestors to know what is permitted and what is not.

96. At this point, I will comment on a slightly different but related point. Was it premature for Ineos to seek ex parte relief in this case on 28 July 2017? The Defendants say that I was misled on the ex parte application into believing that an interference with Ineos's rights was so imminent that it was appropriate for Ineos to apply to the court on an urgent ex parte basis. In fact, I did not grant the injunction ex parte on the basis of alleged urgency. I did not form the view that the order had to be made on 28 July 2017 and could not wait for a day or so to allow the Defendants to be given notice of the hearing. Instead, I took the view that the giving of notice of the application to the Defendants would tip them off as to what might happen at a hearing of the application which might have led them to take some of the action which the injunctions which were sought were intended to prevent. The evidence did show that it was possible for protestors to trespass on land and set up protest camps on short notice.

The likely result at a trial

97. In this case, I am not asked to grant a final injunction but am asked to grant an interim injunction until trial or further order. I recognise however that the grant of an interim injunction is likely to have a significant effect on some of the methods the Defendants wish to use in order to protest against Ineos' intended fracking operations. I cannot predict whether this case will ever go to trial.

98. I have considered above the test to be applied for the grant of an interim injunction ("more likely than not") and the test for a quia timet injunction at trial ("imminent and real risk of harm"). I will now address the question as to what a court would be likely to do if this were an application for a final injunction and the court accepted the evidence put forward by the Claimants.

99. Before addressing the legal points which arise, I will make my findings as to which of the risks apprehended by the Claimants would be considered to be imminent and real. I consider that on the evidence before me there is an imminent and real risk of:

    (1) trespass on the Claimants' land;

    (2) interference with equipment on the Claimants' land;

    (3) substantial interference with the private rights of way enjoyed by some of the Claimants;

    (4) action to prevent the Claimants leaving their land and passing and repassing on the highway; and

    (5) action to prevent third party contractors leaving their land and passing and repassing on the highway.

100. I referred earlier to the police report as to the types of direct action which the police have noted in the past. Based on how matters are there described, I consider that there is an imminent and real risk of specific actions such as:

    (1) trespass on land;

    (2) slow walking;

    (3) protestors placing themselves and things such as bicycles and cars and other objects in the path of vehicles;

    (4) placing placards in front of drivers' windscreens;

    (5) climbing onto vehicles;

    (6) parking across site gates;

    (7) the impeding of site workers;

    (8) lock-on blockades of site entrances;

    (9) lock-ons to the underside of vehicles; and

    (10) the targeting of secondary and tertiary supply companies.

101. I consider that the particular causes of action which need to be explored to consider the remedy which might be appropriate for these risks are:

    (1) trespass to land;

(2) damage to, and theft of, equipment on the Claimants' land;

(3) actionable interference with an easement;

(4) interference with the common law right to access the highway from private land;

(5) obstruction of the highway as an actionable public nuisance; and

(6) conspiracy to injure Ineos by means of the matters in (1) to (5) above in relation to third party contractors supplying goods and services to Ineos.

102. For the reasons which I will give later in this judgment, I do not favour the grant of an injunction against "harassment" largely because of the lack of clarity of that term for the purposes of being included in an injunction. Further, if it is appropriate to grant injunctions against the specific matters referred to in paragraphs 99 and 100 using the causes of action referred to in paragraph 101 above, then that is preferable to an injunction designed to restrain "harassment" without further specification. I take a similar view in relation to some of the generally expressed terms of section 241(1) of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992.

103. As regards the cause of action in trespass, the right to freedom of expression and the right of assembly under Articles 10 and 11 are relevant. However, there is clear authority as to how those Articles should be applied in cases where the claim is for trespass to private land. I was referred to Appleby v United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHHR 783, School of Oriental and African Studies v Persons Unknown [2010] EWHC 3977 (Ch) and Sun Street Property Ltd v Persons Unknown [2011] EWHC 3432 (Ch). Although the law is quite clear and the result of applying it in the present case was not really in dispute before me, I will refer further to the last of these three cases as it is relevant to submissions I will later deal with as to whether I was misled when I granted injunctions ex parte on 28 July 2017.

104. In Sun Street, the judge (Roth J) referred to Articles 10 and 11 and to the earlier cases of Appleby and School of Oriental and African Studies. He also referred to Mayor of London v Hall and quoted two paragraphs ([37] and [38]) from that case which referred to a number of relevant matters when balancing competing rights for the purposes of Articles 10 and 11. Roth J then contrasted the position of a prominent public space with private land. On the facts of the particular case, Roth J said at [32] in relation to submissions as to Article 10:

> "Those submissions confuse the question of whether taking over the bank's property is a more convenient or even more effective means of the Occupiers expressing their views with the question whether if the bank, or, more accurately, its subsidiary, recovered possession, the Occupiers would be prevented from exercising any effective exercise of their freedom to express their views so that, in the words of the Strasbourg Court, the essence of their freedom would be destroyed. When the correct question is asked, it admits of only one answer. The individuals or groups currently in the Property can manifestly communicate their views about waste of > resources or the practices of one or more banks without being in occupation of this building complex. No one is seeking to prevent them from coming together to campaign or promulgate those views. I need hardly add that the fact that the occupation gives them a valuable platform for publicity cannot in itself provide a basis for overriding the respondent's own right as regards its property."

105. In the present case, if a final injunction were sought on the basis of the evidence presented on this interim application, the court is (to put it no higher) likely to grant an injunction to restrain the protestors from trespassing on the land of the Claimants. The land is private land and the rights of the Claimants in relation to it are to be given proper weight and protection under Articles 10(2) and 11(2). The Claimants' rights are prescribed by law, namely the law of trespass, and that law is clear and predictable. The protection of private rights of ownership is necessary in a democratic society and the grant of an injunction to restrain trespass is proportionate having regard to the fact that the protestors are free to express their opinions and to assemble elsewhere. There would also be concerns as to safety in the case of trespass on the Claimants' land at a time when that land was an operational site for shale gas exploration.

106. I take the same view as to the claim in private nuisance to prevent a substantial interference with the private rights of way enjoyed in relation to Sites 3 and 4. I would not distinguish for present purposes between the claim in trespass to protect the possession of private land and the claim in private nuisance to protect the enjoyment of a private right of way over private land.

107. The Claimants' claim in relation to obstruction of the highway outside Sites 1 to 8 is put in public nuisance. However, as indicated earlier, based on the passage in Clerk & Lindsell referred to above, the Claimants have a private common law right to access the highway from their land which fronts upon the highway but I will assume in favour of the protestors that if they were carrying on a reasonable use of the highway which impacted on the Claimants' right to access the highway, that would not be an infringement of the right of access to the highway.

108. Two matters need to be considered as to the use of the highway. The first is as to whether the actions of the protestors amount to a reasonable use of the highway and the second is as to the application of Articles 10 and 11. I will proceed on the basis that these matters should be dealt with in the same way for the purposes of the law as to public nuisance as they do in relation to the criminal offence under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980.

109. It is clear from the authorities that, to some extent, demonstrations and protests on the highway can be a reasonable use of the highway. The question is whether direct action of the kind used in the present case would be held to be reasonable use. The particular direct action of which there are examples in the present case are slow walking, lock-ons and other obstructions of the highway.

110. I have seen video footage of the way in which slow walking has been carried out as part of anti-fracking protests. One type of slow walking involved a number of protestors walking on the main road in front of a vehicle, with the result that the vehicle and all of the traffic backed up behind it was forced to proceed at the pace of the walkers. The "walking" by the protestors was at an unnaturally slow pace. Anyone who was out for a walk or who wanted to get somewhere would not have walked at the pace shown in the video evidence. The pace of the walking was as slow as possible so as not to amount to the protestors being stationary on the highway. Another example of slow walking shown by the video evidence was where the protestors walked in front of vehicles trying to leave a depot of one of the fracking operators. Again, the pace of the walking was the bare minimum so as not to amount to the protestors being stationary on the highway.

111. It is perhaps implicit in the protestors' wish not to remain stationary on the highway that they recognised that to do so would have amounted to an unreasonable use of the highway. In any event, I think that it is likely that on an application for a final injunction, a court would take the view that standing still in order to block the passage of vehicles on the highway because the vehicles are being used for a purpose to which the protestor objects would not be a reasonable use of the highway. If so, I simply do not see that the somewhat token amount of movement involved in slow walking would change the legal assessment of the protestors' actions.

112. The lock-ons in the present case involve protestors being locked-on to each other or to something which cannot easily be moved. The idea is that when the police wish to remove the protestors, the process of removal will take much longer because of the need to cut through the means by which the protestors are locked-on. If the protestors are lying on the highway in a way which obstructs the traffic then the additional element of locking-on is designed to prolong the period of such obstruction. On an application for a final injunction, I think that it is likely that a court would hold that the act of lying in the road to obstruct traffic particularly with the additional delay in removal caused by locking-on to someone else or to something would not be regarded as a reasonable use of the highway.

113. I reach these conclusions as to what would amount to reasonable use of the highway by paying proper attention to the facts of the earlier cases which accepted that demonstrations and protests on the highway could be considered to be a reasonable use of the highway. The degree of obstruction of the highway which was contemplated in those cases as being potentially reasonable was strikingly more limited than what has been involved in the direct action protests of the anti-fracking protestors in this case.

114. Accordingly, if on the application for a final injunction, it is likely that a court would hold that the direct action protests on the highway amounted to a public nuisance and a criminal offence under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980, what then would be the result of an application of Articles 10 and 11? As explained in Mayor of London v Hall and Samede, that question is fact sensitive. The court has regard to number of factors which include the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance of the location of the protest to the protestors, the duration of the protest and the extent of the actual interference with the rights of others, including the public. I consider that a court considering whether to grant a final injunction would take the view that the rights of the fracking operators should prevail over the claims of the protestors to be entitled to do what they do under Articles 10 and 11. The protestors are doing much more than expressing their opinions about the undesirability of fracking. They are taking direct action against the fracking operators in an attempt to make them stop their fracking activities. It would not be surprising in such a case that the court would take the view that balancing the entitlement to freedom of expression and assembly against the rights of others, the balance should be struck in favour of protecting the rights of others from a direct interference with those rights. As to the location of the protests, the location of the direct action is chosen as the best place to interfere with the activities of the fracking operators rather than (as in Parliament Square or St Paul's Churchyard) the best place to express opinions to the general public. As to the duration of the obstruction of the highway and the interference with the rights of others, the duration is intended to be long enough to have an adverse impact on the activities of the fracking operators.

115. As explained above, there are a number of ingredients to the tort of conspiracy to injure by unlawful means. I will start by considering the unlawful means. Theft and criminal damage are plainly unlawful means. There is clear evidence as to criminal offences under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 aimed at third party contractors providing services to fracking operators. There is also evidence which shows that there have been activities contrary to section 22A of the Road Traffic Act 1988. Locking-on to a vehicle is an interference with the vehicle which is dangerous.

116. As to the combination by protestors to commit unlawful acts, there is clear evidence as to such a combination. In particular, the offences under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 involved a number of protestors acting together in a way which must have been planned and were not coincidence. Further, the evidence shows that the protestors intended to injure the fracking operator whether the protests took place in relation to the premises and vehicles of the operator or of the third party contractors.

Persons unknown

117. I am asked to grant interim injunctions against five categories of "Persons Unknown". In paragraphs 8 - 12 above, I have set out the descriptions of the first five sets of Defendants, variously described as Persons Unknown.

118. The Claimants submit that the joinder of parties as "Persons Unknown" is now an established and permissible way to proceed. Accordingly, they submit that they are able to use that procedure in this case and no special justification for using it needs to be shown. They say that they do not have to show that it is impossible for them to ascertain the names of any of the protestors who might be involved in the conduct which is to be restrained by the injunctions. They say that they do not have to use the different procedural rules whereby a claimant can sue a named defendant as a representative of others with the same interest: see CPR rule 19.6.

119. At the inter partes hearing in September 2017, I heard submissions from the Defendants on the procedure used by the Claimants in this respect. I was concerned at the idea that the court might be asked to grant a quia timet injunction against persons who had not yet committed the acts which the injunction would prevent them from doing but yet they would be defined as defendants as Persons Unknown who have committed such acts. For example, the First Defendants are defined as Persons Unknown entering or remaining on specified areas of land but when the proceedings were issued and the ex parte injunctions were granted, no one had entered on the specified land as a trespasser (subject to the possibility that there might have been a trespass on Site 1). Proceeding in this way would seem to produce the result that at the time when the court made its order there were no persons within the defined category of Persons Unknown. How then, later, did some persons come within that category and become subject to the court's order? Did they become parties by their unilateral action which was action forbidden by the court's order?

120. The first case which permitted a claimant to sue persons unknown defined by other words of description (without specific statutory authority for that procedure) was Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2003] 1 WLR 1633. In that case, the judge (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C) said at [21] that it was not material that the description of persons unknown might apply to no one. In Hampshire Waste Services Ltd v Intended Trespassers [2004] Env LR 196, the same judge granted a quia timet injunction to restrain future trespass by protestors. The judge amended the description of the persons unknown in that case so that it referred to persons entering or remaining on the relevant land without the consent of the owner of it. The judge did not favour a description which involved a legal concept such as "trespass" nor did he favour a description which involved a person's subjective state of mind, for example, his intentions. These two cases were discussed with approval by Lord Rodger of Earlsferry in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Meier [2009] 1 WLR 2780 at [2].

121. Before the development of the law in Bloomsbury Publishing, in 1991, Parliament had introduced a new section, section 187B, into the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 which provided for the making of rules of court so as to permit a local authority in certain cases to obtain injunctive relief against persons unknown. Those powers were considered by the Court of Appeal in South Cambridgeshire DC v Gammell [2006] 1 WLR 658. At [32], Sir Anthony Clarke MR described the position where an injunction had been granted against persons unknown of a certain description and following that order a person had done the thing which the order provided should not be done. It was held that when that person did the thing forbidden by that order, that person became a party to the proceedings and committed a breach of the order. It was not necessary to make a further order of the court adding that person as a party.

122. Although, in Hampshire Waste, the judge did not favour a description of persons unknown which included a reference to their intentions (and the same view was taken in South Cambridgeshire DC v Persons Unknown [2004] EWCA Civ 1280) there have been later cases where words such as "intending" or "proposing" have been used.

123. Since Bloomsbury Publishing, there have been many cases where the courts have been asked to grant, and have granted, injunctions against persons unknown. As it happens, many of these involved injunctions against various kinds of protestors. I consider that the position has now been reached that the procedure adopted by the Claimants in the present case is a course which was open to them. Although the Defendants made detailed submissions calling into question the use of this procedure, the Defendants did not focus on the words of description which were used in this case and did not suggest modifications to the wording adopted by the Claimants.

The duty of candour on an ex parte application

124. Before considering whether to grant injunctions in this case and, if so, the terms of any injunctions, it is necessary to consider the submission made by the Defendants which criticised the Claimants' conduct of the ex parte application made to the court on 28 July 2017. The Defendants submitted that the Claimants had not conducted that application in a fair way, informing the court in a full and frank way of the points which were available to the Defendants and which could have been put forward by the Defendants if they had been given proper notice of that hearing.

125. There was no real dispute as to the relevant legal principles. The problem, as always in this area, was said to arise in relation to the application of those principles. The Claimants said that there had been no breach of the duty of candour in relation to the ex parte application. The Defendants said that there were several grave breaches of the duty of candour and that the right response from the court would be to discharge the ex parte injunctions (and the continuation of them in September 2017) and to refuse to grant to the Claimants any injunctive relief prior to the trial of the action.

126. Although there was no real dispute as to the legal principles which are well known, it is helpful to set out an often quoted summary of the principles together with some more recent comments since that summary was first provided. The summary is in the judgment of Mr Boyle QC sitting as a Deputy High Court Judge in The Arena Corporation Ltd v Schroeder [2003] EWHC 1089 (Ch) at [213] in these terms:

> "(1) If the court finds that there have been breaches of the duty of full and fair disclosure on the ex parte application, the general rule is that it should discharge the order obtained in breach and refuse to renew the order until trial.
> (2) Notwithstanding that general rule, the court has jurisdiction to continue or re-grant the order.
> (3) That jurisdiction should be exercised sparingly, and should take account of the need to protect the administration of justice and uphold the public interest in requiring full and fair disclosure.
> (4) The Court should assess the degree and extent of the culpability with regard to non-disclosure. It is relevant that the breach was innocent, but there is no general rule that an innocent breach will not attract the sanction of discharge of the order. Equally, there is no general rule that a deliberate breach will attract that sanction.
> (5) The Court should assess the importance and significance to the outcome of the application for an injunction of the matters which were not disclosed to the court. In making this assessment, the fact that the judge might have made the order anyway is of little if any importance.

> (6) The Court can weigh the merits of the plaintiff's claim, but should not conduct a simple balancing exercise in which the strength of the plaintiff's case is allowed to undermine the policy objective of the principle.
> (7) The application of the principle should not be carried to extreme lengths or be allowed to become the instrument of injustice.
> (8) The jurisdiction is penal in nature and the court should therefore have regard to the proportionality between the punishment and the offence.
> (9) There are no hard and fast rules as to whether the discretion to continue or re-grant the order should be exercised, and the court should take into account all relevant circumstances."

127. That summary was cited by Christopher Clarke J in Re OJSC ANK Yugraneft [2008] EWHC 2614 (Ch), [2010] BCC 475 and he added his own comments at [103]-[106], as follows:

> "103 I regard that as a helpful review of the applicable principles, subject to the overriding principle, reflected in proposition (9), that the question of whether, in the absence of full and fair disclosure, an order should be set aside and, if so, whether it should be renewed either in the same or in an altered form, is pre-eminently a matter for the court's discretion, to which (as Mr Boyle observes at [180]) the facts (if they be such) that the non-disclosure was innocent and that an injunction or other order could properly have been granted if the relevant facts had been disclosed, are relevant. In exercising that discretion the court, like Janus, looks both backwards and forwards.
> 104 The court will look back at what has happened and examine whether, and if so, to what extent, it was not fully informed, and why, in order to decide what sanction to impose in consequence. The obligation of full disclosure, an obligation owed to the court itself, exists in order to secure the integrity of the court's process and to protect the interests of those potentially affected by whatever order the court is invited to make. The court's ability to set its order aside, and to refuse to renew it, is the sanction by which that obligation is enforced and others are deterred from breaking it. Such is the importance of the duty that, in the event of any substantial breach, the court strongly inclines towards setting its order aside and not renewing it, so as to deprive the defaulting party of any advantage that the order may have given him. This is particularly so in the case of freezing and seizure orders.

> 105 As to the future, the court may well be faced with a situation in which, in the light of all the material to hand after the non-disclosure has become apparent, there remains a case, possibly a strong case, for continuing or re-granting the relief sought. Whilst a strong case can never justify non disclosure, the court will not be blind to the fact that a refusal to continue or renew an order may work a real injustice, which it may wish to avoid.
> 106 As with all discretionary considerations, much depends on the facts. The more serious or culpable the non-disclosure, the more likely the court is to set its order aside and not renew it, however prejudicial the consequences. The stronger the case for the order sought and the less serious or culpable the non-disclosure, the more likely it is that the court may be persuaded to continue or re-grant the order originally obtained. In complicated cases it may be just to allow some margin of error. It is often easier to spot what should have been disclosed in retrospect, and after argument from those alleging non-disclosure, than it was at the time when the question of disclosure first arose."

128. Thus, if the court finds that an applicant has obtained ex parte relief but has failed to comply with the duty or candour or of full and frank disclosure, the court can respond in a number of ways. One response is to discharge the ex parte order which was obtained. If the court does discharge the ex parte order, the court needs to consider whether to grant the same or a similar order following an inter partes hearing. The fact that the court has discharged the ex parte order by reason of the non-disclosure can be enough to persuade the court not to make an inter partes order to which the applicant would otherwise be entitled but a refusal to make an inter partes order does not automatically follow from a decision to discharge the ex parte order.

129. Ms Williams on behalf of the Sixth Defendant made the following principal submissions:

(1) The relief sought on an ex parte basis was in wide sweeping terms;

(2) There was no genuine urgency;

(3) The Claimants had spent an enormous amount of time in preparing the application;

(4) The voluminous extent of the exhibits meant that the court would be heavily reliant on the Claimants' summaries of what the evidence showed;

(5) There was a heavy onus on the Claimants to ensure that the summaries of the evidence did not overstate the evidential position;

(6) The Claimants misled the court in relation to matters of law, as follows:

a) The Claimants did not inform the court that there would only be an actionable obstruction of the highway, or the criminal offence of obstruction of the highway, if the use of the highway was unreasonable;

b) The Claimants' description of the three-pronged test to be applied pursuant to Articles 10 and 11 was inadequate; and

c) The Claimants failed to identify the correct test as to the right to protest on public land;

(7) The Claimants misled the court in relation to factual assertions, as follows:

a) The court was misled as to the alleged urgency of the application;

b) The evidence materially overstated the allegedly imminent risk of injury death or harm and the nature of Ineos' duties in that respect;

c) The selections from social media were unrepresentative;

d) The court was played an unrepresentative 10 minutes of video evidence;

e) The Claimants did not make it clear that the vast majority of anti fracking protests were peaceful and lawful;

f) The Claimants did not make it clear that peaceful protest activity had already taken place in relation to Sites 1 and 2;

g) Mr Fellows' witness statement was unfair in its description of what happened at a meeting in January 2017 in relation to Site 1;

h) Mr Pickering overstated the extent to which there was a consensus that fracking was safe;

i) The Claimants did not make it clear that there was usually, but not always, a delay between the grant of planning permission for drilling on land and the occupation of that land;

j) The experiences of other fracking companies was misdescribed in Mr Talfan Davies' second witness statement; and

k) There were other examples of the facts being misdescribed.

130. Ms Harrison QC for the Seventh Defendant made the following submissions on this part of the case:

(1) At no point was there any inkling of the court being told what could have been said by someone acting for a potential defendant;

(2) The material provided to the court at the ex parte hearing was very extensive; the draft order ran to many pages; there was a 37-page skeleton argument; there were seven witness statements with three lever arch files of exhibits; there was six hours of video footage;

(3) The court was heavily dependent on the material put before it by the Claimants so that the duty of candour on the Claimants was particularly high;

(4) The Claimants misled the court into thinking there was an imminent threat of tortious conduct;

(5) The Claimants referred to "militant protestor activity" and "a recent escalation of unlawful activity";

(6) The Claimants should have told the court that there had been peaceful protests;

(7) The Claim Form stated that the case did not raise any issues under the Human Rights Act 1998;

(8) The court was misled as to the position in relation to Articles 10 and 11;

(9) The court was misled as to the right to protest on the highway and DPP v Jones was not cited;

(10) There was no mention of Article 8;

(11) The description of the position under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 was inadequate;

(12) The Claimants misrepresented the controversial nature of fracking;

(13) Ineos did not tell the court of its safety failings at other sites;

(14) The Claimants did not explain the rural nature of the drilling sites and the effect of fracking on the local community;

(15) The Claimants falsely alleged that the police supported the application for injunctions; and

(16) The Claimants did not tell the court that posting up notices of the injunction would be a criminal offence of fly-posting.

131. As can be seen, the Defendants' criticisms of the Claimants' conduct of the ex parte application are very extensive. I am quite clear that as regards many of the matters which are now raised by the Defendants, I was not misled. As regards some of the other contentions that the court was misled as to the facts, I consider that it is not appropriate on the Defendants' applications to discharge an ex parte injunction for the court to engage with the underlying disputes of fact. The duty of candour requires the court to be told the crucial facts or the material facts. As to which facts are material, that is judged in a broad sense. The court must preserve a sense of proportion in reacting to a complaint that it was misled. It must not allow the argument to descend into such a degree of detail that it is in danger of not being able to see the wood for the trees. Further, an application to discharge an ex parte injunction on the ground of non-disclosure ought to be capable of being dealt with reasonably concisely. One of the things which normally cannot be done is to determine what the disputed facts are in order to assess whether the court was misled as to the facts. The position is otherwise if the facts are truly so plain that they can be readily and summarily established. The resolution of disputes as to the facts is normally a matter for the trial rather than for an application to discharge an ex parte injunction. In making the comments in this paragraph, I have followed the guidance given in Kazakhstan Kagazy plc v Arip [2004] EWCA Civ 381 at [36].

132. I will now deal with the allegation that I was misled as to the facts in accordance with the above guidance. By this stage, I have spent a considerable amount of time absorbing what is said in the various witness statements and the exhibits so that I am familiar with all of that material. I have re-read the 37-page skeleton argument which was before me on 28 July 2017. I have also read a transcript of that hearing. The ex parte application was a heavy application. The court was provided with an enormous amount of material. However, the witness statements themselves were not unmanageable, although still lengthy. Whether the exhibits fully supported the statements made by the witnesses is not a question which can be adjudicated upon on the applications to discharge the ex parte injunctions. It is certainly not plain and obvious that they did not. I have of course considered in a general way the allegations of misleading facts but my overall assessment is that the court was not misled.

133. I turn then to consider the submissions that I was misled as to the law to be applied. I deal first with the submission that I was misled as to the civil and criminal law as to what amounts to an obstruction of the highway and the extent to which protests on the highway are lawful. The skeleton argument prepared for the ex parte hearing referred to the law as to public nuisance and, separately, as to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980. In relation to section 137, the skeleton argument referred to the defence of lawful authority and excuse and separately to the question whether a defendant's use of the highway was reasonable, citing both Westminster CC v Haw and Nagy v Weston. The former of those cases cited both Hurst and Agu and DPP v Jones. I consider that the skeleton adequately directed me to the point that some protest activity on the highway could be a reasonable use of the highway. I considered at the ex parte hearing that it was likely (see section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998) that at trial the Claimants would establish that the obstructions of the highway complained of in this case were actionable and an infringement of section 137. Following the three day inter partes hearing, I plainly have an even deeper understanding of what the case law says about non-obstructive protests on the highway but I remain of the view that the present case is a clear one that the direct action protests on the highway in this case go well beyond lawful reasonable use of the highway.

134. As to the position under the Human Rights Act 1998, the ex parte application was presented on the basis that Articles 10 and 11 were engaged and that section 12(3) applied. As to the potential application of Articles 10 and 11, it was submitted:

> "The Relevance of t D f d t ' Co v to Rg t to the Applicable Test

23. For the purpose of the present application only, Cs accept that the court must be satisfied that any relief granted by it would not amount to a disproportionate interference with Ds' Convention rights under Articles 10 and 11 of the European Convention, when balanced against Cs' rights to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions (including their real property, personal property and corporate goodwill) under Article 1 of Protocol 1 of the European Convention ("A1P1"). These rights are all qualified rights.

24. A corporate entity's goodwill and intangible assets are possessions which qualify for protection under A1P1, albeit that an entity's expected or anticipated future income is not a possession: Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights (2nd Ed, 2009) at 18.22, citing R (Countryside Alliance) v Attorney-General [2008] 1 AC 719; [2007] UKHL 52 at 747C-G ([22]), per Lord Bingham.

25. Cs' case is that Ds' have no defence to this application based on their Convention rights, as:

a. in the balancing exercise between Cs' A1P1 rights and Ds' Convention rights, Article 10 has no presumptive priority over other qualified Convention rights, including A1P1: Thames Cleaning and Support Services Ltd v United Voices of the World [2016] EWHC 1310 (QB) at [35], per Warby J.

b. when a private landowner's A1P1 rights are to be balanced against protesters' rights under Articles 10 and 11 of the European Convention, the latter will only be capable of altering the position which would obtain under domestic law where the failure to restrict the landowner's property rights would prevent any effective exercise of freedom of expression, or where the essence of the right would be destroyed: Appleby v United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHRR 38 at [47], applied in Sun Street Property Ltd v Persons Unknown [2011] EWHC 3432 at [32]-[33], per Roth J; and Manchester Ship Canal Developments Ltd v Persons Unknown [2014] EWHC 646 (Ch) at [37], per HHJ Pelling QC.

c. there can be no argument that the injunction sought by Cs would have this effect, as Cs seek no more than to prevent Ds engaging in activities which are unlawful under domestic law."

135. In Thames Cleaning, the judge (Warby J) dealt with Articles 10 and 11 and section 12(3) in four short paragraphs. It might be said that his discussion on those matters was not a full exposition of the relevant principles but, conversely, the Claimants can say that their description of the legal position was not inadequate because it was at least as thorough as the judge's in that case.

136. At the ex parte hearing, I was specifically taken to the decision in Sun Street where the judge (Roth J) set out the full text of Articles 10 and 11 and the decision in Appleby. Sun Street also referred to Mayor of London v Hall and I was provided with a copy of the decision at first instance in that case. Earlier in this judgment, I have described what was decided in that case. It was argued at the inter partes hearing that the decision in Sun Street only deals with the right to possession of private land and therefore has nothing to say about the right to protest on the highway. Although this was not argued before me, it may be that Sun Street is a potentially relevant authority even when the "rights of others" referred to in Article 10(2) or 11(2) are the rights of a private operator, who is not a public authority, to carry on a lawful business (with or without goodwill) and so that the authority is not restricted to a case where the right in question is a right to the possession of private land.

137. Of course, after three days of an inter partes hearing with lengthy skeleton arguments, the citation of many authorities and oral submissions from four leading counsel, my understanding as to the operation of Articles 10 and 11 is now deeper than it was on 28 July 2017. However, on 28 July 2017, I was not misled as to the importance of the rights conferred by Articles 10 and 11. Further, much of the case law on these Articles to which I was referred by Ms Williams is an elaboration of the words of the Articles and many of the principles are clear enough from the wording of Articles 10(2) and 11(2). Further, I was aware from the authorities cited to me on 28 July 2017 that Articles 10 and 11 extended to direct action protests and involved a fact sensitive assessment. I also bear in mind that after the detailed exposition from the Defendants as to Articles 10 and 11, the case remains a clear one where I consider that it is not open to the Defendants to rely on Articles 10 and 11 in an attempt to justify direct action for the purpose of harming the Claimants with a view to forcing them to give up their lawful business. I consider that I was not misled as to the basic principles as to Articles 10 and 11 by reason of any breach by the Claimants of their duty of candour.

138. For the sake of completeness, the fact that the Claimants' solicitor ticked the box on the Claim Form saying that there were no issues under the Human Rights Act 1998 has no significance, particularly in the light of the way matters were described in the skeleton argument.

139. As to the position under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, the matter was not very clearly presented initially at the ex parte hearing but during the hearing, I was taken to the basic provisions of the 1997 Act and the distinction between a case where the victim of the harassment is an individual and a case was made within section 1(1A) and section 3A. Also, I raised the question whether it was appropriate to grant an injunction against "harassment" without further specification and with some hesitation, I made such an order.

140. Having considered the applications to discharge the ex parte injunction and the order in September 2017 which continued it, I am not persuaded that the Claimants did break their duty of candour to the court. If I had been persuaded that there was a breach of that duty, based on the submissions made to me, I would not have refused to grant an injunction until trial on account of the earlier breach of duty. Applying the approach in paragraphs [103]-[106] of OJSC Ank Yugraneft, I would have held that any breach was innocent and insubstantial and the case for an injunction was strong.

That would have led me to grant an injunction until trial even if the facts of this case had crossed the line into being a breach of the duty of candour.

The need for clarity and precision

141. It is important in this case that any injunction granted must be expressed in clear and precise terms. There is a general requirement to that effect, as explained in A-G v Punch Ltd [2003] 1 AC 1046 per Lord Nicholls at [35]:

> "35 Here arises the practical difficulty of devising a suitable form of words. An interlocutory injunction, like any other injunction, must be expressed in terms which are clear and certain. The injunction must define precisely what acts are prohibited. The court must ensure that the language of its order makes plain what is permitted and what is prohibited. This is a well established, soundly-based principle. A person should not be put at risk of being in contempt of court by an ambiguous prohibition, or a prohibition the scope of which is obviously open to dispute. An order expressed to restrain publication of "confidential information" or "information whose disclosure risks damaging national security" would be undesirable for this reason."

Should I grant injunctions and if so, in what terms

142. I have held that there is an imminent and real risk that, in the absence of injunctions, the Defendants will interfere with the legal rights of the Claimants. Further, in the absence of injunctions, it is unlikely that the Claimants will receive any legal redress or compensation for the infringement of their rights. Ineos's business activities are lawful. The Defendants wish Ineos to stop carrying on those activities and wish to put pressure on Ineos to stop. However, on my findings in this judgment, the Defendants' means of putting pressure on Ineos involve unlawful behaviour on their part, including criminal acts. I have also held, applying section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998, that it is likely that the court following a trial would grant a permanent injunction to restrain the interferences with the Claimants' legal rights. The normal response of a court to this state of affairs would be to grant similar interim injunctions without further ado.

143. The Defendants submit that this is not a proper case in which the court should intervene by granting interim injunctions. It is said that the civil courts should leave it to the criminal law and to the police to deal with any criminal behaviour which arises. Put that way, I am not attracted to that submission. The fact that the same conduct might involve criminal offences as well as wrongdoing which is actionable in a civil court is not usually a reason to deny a claimant in a civil court an injunction to restrain interference with his legal rights. The detection and prosecution of alleged criminal offenders is generally left to public authorities but there is no reason for a civil court to deny to a claimant the advantages which ought to flow from the grant to it of an injunction. It was also suggested that if Ineos were granted injunctions that would complicate the position of the police and would result in Ineos being in a position to tell the police what to do and contrary to the wishes of the police. I do not see how that would be so. If the injunctions are complied with then the result ought to be that there would be less need for the police to be involved. If the injunctions are not complied with and the police are involved, then they will be free to form their own decisions as to the appropriate response to the situation as they find it. It is not appropriate for me to try to predict whether any injunctions which are granted will be obeyed. I was not asked to refuse to grant injunctions on the ground that they would not be obeyed and it would not be right to refuse relief on that ground. Equally, it is not appropriate for me to speculate as to the ease or difficulty which the Claimants would have in seeking to enforce any clearly expressed injunction.

144. I conclude that I ought to grant injunctions in this case provided that they can be expressed in clear terms having regard to the matters emphasised in Attorney General v Punch Ltd.

145. In relation to the injunctions to restrain trespass on Sites 1, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 8 (where there are no public footpaths) are concerned, it is a straightforward matter to grant an injunction in terms which prevent the Defendants entering or remaining on that land without the consent of the relevant Claimants. The Defendants say that such an order would go too far as it would prevent the Defendants attending on such a site, for example the offices of Ineos, to hand in a petition against fracking. The Defendants say that they are entitled to enter Ineos' offices for such a purpose as part of their rights under Articles 10 and 11. They also submit that they are entitled to go on to Ineos' land to stand there with a placard. I do not agree with these submissions. At the lowest, I consider that it is likely that a court asked to grant a final injunction against trespass would hold that the Defendants were not so entitled.

146. In the case of Sites 2 and 7, there is a public footpath across the sites. The orders granted in July and September 2017 provided that the injunction was not to prevent a member of the public using those footpaths. The Defendants made a number of practical points about what is involved in using a public footpath. A public footpath will have a particular width in legal terms although there may be a lack of clarity both in fact and in law as to what that width is. Further, there will be occasions when a walker will leave the footpath without causing any harm to anyone but yet leaving the footpath will result in an act of trespass and a breach of an order restraining trespass. An obvious example would be where the walker is pulled off the path by his dog or he goes off the path to retrieve his dog. My view is that the order should continue to provide as it did in July and September 2017. It is not sensible to start drafting elaborate wording dealing with various practical problems which walkers face when asked to keep to a public footpath. Conversely, it is not sensible to refuse to grant an injunction against trespassing on Sites 2 and 7 on account of what is suggested to be a particular difficulty in this respect.

147. Another point raised as to the public footpaths is that it was submitted that the legal principles as to reasonable use of a highway should apply equally to reasonable use of a public footpath. Thus, it is submitted, if the public are entitled to protest on a highway, they are entitled to protest on a public footpath. I consider that I do not need to rule on this submission. The injunction in relation to trespassing on Sites 2 and 7 will permit the public to use the public footpaths in accordance with their rights to do so, whatever they are. If members of the public wish to use the footpath to protest against fracking but without otherwise trespassing on Sites 2 and 7, then it remains to be seen whether there will be any complaint about such protests. If there are complaints, then at that stage they can be raised and determined.

148. I will also grant injunctions to restrain the Defendants from causing damage to, or removal of, equipment on Sites 1, 2, 3, 4 and 7. It will not be necessary to join a new class of Defendants for this purpose as they will be the First Defendants because they have entered upon those Sites.

149. As regards the injunctions to restrain interference with the private rights of way in the case of Sites 3 and 4, I will grant the injunctions in the terms granted in September 2017. The injunctions will prevent "substantial interference" with the rights of way. I was not asked to include any definition of what would amount to substantial interference and I do not think that it is appropriate to do so. The concept of substantial interference with a right of way is simple enough and is well established.

150. I now turn to consider what restrictions, if any, should be placed on protestors' activities on the highway. In September 2017, the injunction referred to the Defendants “unreasonably interfering and/or interfering without lawful authority or excuse” with the right to pass and repass. I consider that it is appropriate for any order to be more clear as to what is not allowed. I will restrain any obstruction which prevents the Claimants accessing the highway from any of their Sites, with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay. Given that there has been argument about slow walking on the highway, I consider that the injunctions should expressly state that walking in front of vehicles with the object of slowing then down and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay is not permitted. Other activities which are not to be permitted are blocking the highway with persons or things when done with a view to slowing down or stopping the traffic and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay. Similarly, I will restrain the climbing by protestors on to vehicles being used by the Claimants (which would be a trespass to such vehicles).

151. There will also be an injunction to restrain a combination, with the intent of causing injury to Ineos, where the combination is to commit any of the modes of obstructing access to the highway or use of the highway referred to above, the access and use in question being by a third party contractor engaged to supply goods or services to Ineos. The injunction will name the contractors intended to be embraced by this order.

152. That brings me finally to the injunctions sought in relation to harassment. The principal injunction which is sought in respect of harassment relates to the corporate claimants rather than the individuals. In relation to the corporate claimants, the ingredients of the statutory tort are a little complicated and require a claimant to show that a defendant has carried on a course of conduct (as defined in section 7) with the relevant knowledge (as defined in section 1(2)) which involves harassment of two or more persons by which he intends to persuade any person not to do something which he is entitled or required to do or to do something that he is not under an obligation to do. Accordingly, any injunction granted to prevent the commission of the statutory tort would have to be expressed to refer to all of the necessary ingredients of the tort. Such an injunction would involve a considerable measure of complication.

153. I consider that there is a further difficulty with the harassment injunction in this case. As explained earlier, "harassment" is not defined by the 1997 Act. The authorities say that the court can be expected to distinguish between things which are, and which are not, harassment. However, this produces the result that an order which simply restrains "harassment" without more would not be as certain as is desirable as a defendant would not know in advance what the court's decision would ultimately be. This is a particularly acute problem where the courts have explained that behaviour which is annoying and irritating may not be harassment. In the present context, of protest on a matter of public importance, there are likely to be strongly expressed objections to fracking. The expression of those objections may lead to the making of abusive and insulting comments about Ineos (and indeed about the individual Claimants who have made their land available to Ineos) where there might be real difficulty in knowing whether the conduct amounts to harassment. It would be unfortunate if any order made by the court did not enable a Defendant to know what was being restrained. If the order is not clear, a Defendant might commit a breach of it whilst believing that he was complying with the order. There would also be the risk of a chilling effect if a Defendant felt constrained not to do something which he was lawfully entitled to do for fear of finding himself in breach of a court order.

154. The order put forward by the Claimants does not provide any information as to what is and is not permitted beyond the use of the word "harassment". The draft order does contain a qualification as to the intention with which the "harassment" is done but a Defendant who does wish to harm Ineos still has to know whether his intended conduct will or will not amount to harassment and breach the order.

155. In Majrowski, Lady Hale referred to an injunction under the 1997 Act "specifying" the matters to be restrained by the injunction. I was shown a large number of cases where courts have granted injunctions restraining harassment. Many of these cases involved injunctions against protestors wishing to pursue various kinds of protests. In many of these cases, the orders granted spelt out the behaviour which was to be restrained. It is true that in such cases, it was normal for the order to add a general prohibition on "harassment" although I have some reservations as to the appropriateness of doing so. In Heathrow Airport Ltd v Garman [2007] EWHC 1957 (QB), the judge (Swift J) declined to grant an injunction against harassment under the 1997 Act in a case involving public protest: see at [99]. She was influenced, as I am, by the lack of clarity as to what is forbidden and what is not forbidden by such an order.

156. In the present case, I have identified what the Claimants have established in relation to an imminent and real risk of harm. The matters established primarily relate to trespass on land and obstructions of the highway. If those matters are restrained, as I hold that they can be, by an order which is clear and precise, I do not consider that the Claimants have demonstrated a need for the court to make an order against harassment within the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, where there is no clear definition to what is restrained and what is permitted. I consider than such an order could have undesirable consequences which the court would wish to avoid. However, I will give the Claimants permission to apply in the future for an injunction against harassment expressed in clear and precise terms specifying the matters which are restrained by such an order if the Claimants can demonstrate that there is a need for such an order in addition to the other orders which are in force.

157. Having made these findings, the Claimants in the first instance will need to draft an order to give effect to them. If the terms of an order are not agreed, I will determine any outstanding matters following the hand down of this judgment.

Court of Appeal

Ineos Upstream Ltd and others v Persons Unknown and others (Friends of the Earth intervening)

[2019] EWCA Civ 515

2019 March 5, 6; April 3 Longmore, David Richards, Leggatt LJJ

Practice — Parties — Persons unknown — Injunction — Claimants seeking injunctions on quia timet basis to prevent anticipated unlawful "fracking" protests against various classes of unknown defendants — Whether injunctions properly granted — Guidance as to granting of injunction as against persons unknown

The claimants were a group of companies and various individuals connected with the business of shale and gas exploration by the hydraulic fracturing of rock formations, a procedure colloquially known as "fracking". Concerned that anticipated protests against the fracking operations might cross the boundary between legitimate and illegitimate activity, the claimants sought, inter alia, injunctions on a quia timet basis to restrain potentially unlawful acts of protest before they occurred. The first to fifth defendants were described as groups of "persons unknown" with, in each case, further wording relating to identified locations and potential actions designed to provide a definition of the persons falling within the group. The judge granted injunctions against the first to third and the fifth defendants so identified. No order was made against the sixth and seventh defendants, identified individuals. Expressing concern as to the width of the orders granted against the unknown defendants, the sixth and seventh defendants appealed.

On the appeal—

Held, allowing the appeal in part, that, while there was no conceptual or legal prohibition on suing persons unknown who were not currently in existence but would come into existence when they committed the prohibited tort, the court should be inherently cautious about granting injunctions against unknown persons since the reach of such an injunction was necessarily difficult to assess in advance; that, although it was not easy to formulate the broad principles on which an injunction against unknown persons could properly be granted, the following requirements might be thought necessary before such an order could be made, namely (i) there had to have been shown a sufficiently real and imminent risk of a tort being committed to justify a quia timet injunction, (ii) it had to have been impossible to name the persons who were likely to commit the tort unless restrained, (iii) it had to be possible to give effective notice of the injunction and for the method of such notice to be set out in the order, (iv) the terms of the injunction had to correspond to the threatened tort and not be so wide that they prohibited lawful conduct, (v) the terms of the injunction had to be sufficiently clear and precise as to enable persons potentially affected to know what they had not to do, and (vi) the injunction ought to have clear geographical and temporal limits; that, on the facts, the first three requirements presented no difficulty, but the remaining requirements were more problematic where the injunctions made against the third and fifth defendants had been drafted too widely and lacked the necessary degree of certainty; and that, accordingly, those injunctions would be discharged, and the claims against the third and fifth defendants dismissed; but that the injunctions against the first and second defendants would be maintained pending remission to the judge to reconsider (i) whether interim relief ought to be granted in the light of section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998, and (ii) if the injunctions were to be continued against the first and second defendants, what would be the appropriate temporal limit (post, paras 29–34, 35, 39–42, 43, 47–51, 52, 53).

The claimants, Ineos Upstream Ltd, Ineos 120 Exploration Ltd, Ineos Properties Ltd, Ineos Industries Ltd, John Barrie Palfreyman, Alan John Skepper, Janette Mary Skepper, Steven John Skepper, John Ambrose Hollingworth and Linda Katharina Hollingworth, were a group of companies and individuals connected with the business of shale and gas exploration by the hydraulic fracturing of rock formations, a procedure colloquially known as "fracking". Concerned that anticipated protests against the fracking operations might cross the boundary between legitimate and illegitimate activity, the claimants sought, inter alia, injunctions to restrain potentially unlawful conduct against the first to fifth defendants, each described as a group of persons unknown engaging in various defined activities, the sixth defendant, Joseph Boyd, and the seventh defendant, Joseph Corré. By a decision dated 23 November 2017 Morgan J, sitting in the Chancery Division (Property, Trusts and Probate), granted injunctions against the first to third and the fifth defendants so identified [2017] EWHC 2945 (Ch). No order was made against the sixth and seventh defendants.

By an appellant's notice and with the permission of the Court of Appeal the sixth and seventh defendants appealed on the grounds: (1) whether the judge had been right to grant injunctions against persons unknown; (2) whether the judge had failed adequately or at all to apply section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998, which required a judge making an interim order in a case, in which article 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was engaged, to assess whether the claimants would be likely to obtain the relief sought at trial; and (3) whether the judge had been right to grant an injunction restraining conspiracy to harm the claimants by the commission of unlawful acts against contractors engaged by the claimants.

Friends of the Earth were given permission to intervene by written submissions only.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Longmore LJ, post, para 1–11.

Heather Williams QC, Blinne Ní Ghrálaigh and Jennifer Robinson (instructed by Leigh Day) for the sixth defendant.

Stephanie Harrison QC and Stephen Simblet (instructed by Bhatt Murphy Solicitors) for the seventh defendant.

Alan Maclean QC and Jason Pobjoy (instructed by Fieldfisher llp) for the claimants.

Henry Blaxland QC and Stephen Clark (instructed by Bhatt Murphy) for the intervener, by written submissions only.

The court took time for consideration.

3 April 2019. The following judgments were handed down.

LONGMORE LJ

Introduction

1 This is an appeal from Morgan J [2017] EWHC 2945 (Ch) who has granted injunctions to Ineos Upstream Ltd and various subsidiaries of the Ineos Group ("the Ineos companies") as well as certain individuals. The injunctions were granted against persons unknown who are thought to be likely to become protesters at sites selected by those companies for the purpose of exploration for shale gas by hydraulic fracturing of rock formations, a procedure more commonly known as "fracking".

2 Fracking, which is lawful in England but not in every country in the world, is a controversial process partly because it is said to give rise to (inter alia) seismic activity, water contamination and methane clouds, and to be liable to injure people and buildings, but also because shale gas, which is a fossil fuel considered by many to contribute to global warming and in due course unsustainable climate change. For these reasons (and no doubt others) people want to protest against any fracking activity both where it may be taking place and elsewhere. In the view of the Ineos companies these protests will often cross the boundary between legitimate and illegitimate activity as indeed they have in the past when other companies have sought to operate planning permissions which they have obtained for exploration for shale gas by fracking. The Ineos companies have therefore sought injunctions to restrain potentially unlawful acts of protest before they have occurred.

3 The judge's order extends to 8 relevant sites described in detail in paras 4–7 of his judgment [2017] EWHC 2945 (Ch); sites 1–4 and 7 consist of agricultural or other land where it is intended that fracking will take place; sites 5, 6 and 8 are office buildings from which the Ineos companies conduct their business.

The claimants

4 There are ten claimants. The first claimant is a subsidiary company of the Ineos corporate group, a privately owned global manufacturer of chemicals, speciality chemicals and oil products. The first claimant's commercial activities include shale gas exploration in the United Kingdom. It is the lessee of four of the sites which are the subject of the claimants' application (sites 1, 2, 3 and 7). The lessors in relation to these four sites include the fifth to tenth claimants. The second to fourth claimants are companies within the Ineos corporate group. They are the proprietors of sites 4, 5 and 6 respectively. The fourth claimant is the lessee of site 8 and it has applied to the Land Registry to be registered as the leasehold owner of that site. I will refer to the first to fourth claimants as "Ineos" without distinguishing between them. The fifth to tenth claimants are all individuals. The fifth claimant is the freeholder of site 1. The sixth to eighth claimants are the freeholders of site 2. The ninth to tenth claimants are the freeholders of site 7.

The defendants

5 The first five defendants are described as groups of "Persons unknown" with, in each case, further wording designed to provide a definition of the persons falling within the group. The first defendant is described as: "Persons unknown entering or remaining without the consent of the claimant(s) on land and buildings shown shaded red on the plans annexed to the amended claim form."

6 The second defendant is described as:

> "Persons unknown interfering with the first and second claimants' rights to pass and repass with or without vehicles, materials and equipment over private access roads on land shown shaded orange on the plans annexed to the amended claim form without the consent of the claimant(s)."

7 The third defendant is described as:

> "Persons unknown interfering with the right of way enjoyed by the claimant(s) each of its and their agents, servants, contractors, sub-contractors, group companies, licensees, employees, partners, consultants, family members and friends over land shown shaded purple on the plans annexed to the amended claim form."

8 The fourth defendant is described as: "Persons unknown pursuing conduct amounting to harassment". The judge declined to make any order against this group which, accordingly, falls out of the picture.

9 The fifth defendant is described as: "Persons unknown combining together to commit the unlawful acts as specified in para 10 of the [relevant] order with the intention set out in para 10 of the [relevant] order."

10 The sixth defendant is Mr Boyd. He appeared through counsel at a hearing before the judge on 12 September 2017 and was joined as a defendant. The seventh defendant is Mr Corré. He also appeared through counsel at the hearing on 12 September 2017 and was joined as a defendant. The judge had originally granted ex parte relief on 28 July 2017 against the first five defendants until a return date fixed for 12 September 2017. On that date a new return date with a three-day estimate was then fixed for 31 October 2017 to enable Mr Boyd and Mr Corré to file evidence and instruct counsel to make submissions on their behalf.

11 As is to some extent evident from the descriptions of the respective defendants, the potentially unlawful activities which Ineos wishes to restrain are: (1) trespass to land; (2) private nuisance; (3) public nuisance; and (4) conspiracy to injure by unlawful means. This last group is included because protesters have in the past targeted companies which form part of the supply chain to the operators who carry on shale gas exploration. The protesters' aim has been to cause those companies to withdraw from supplying the operators with equipment or other items for the supply of which the operators have entered into contracts with such companies.

The judgment

12 The judge (to whose command of the voluminous documentation before him I would pay tribute) absorbed a considerable body of evidence contained in 28 lever arch files including at least 16 witness statements and their accompanying exhibits. He said of this evidence, at para 18 [2017] EWHC 2945 (Ch), which related largely to the experiences of fracking companies other than Ineos, which is a newcomer to the field:

© 2019. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

> "Much of the factual material in the evidence served by the claimants was not contradicted by the defendants, although the defendants did join issue with certain of the comments made or the conclusions drawn by the claimants and some of the detail of the factual material."

In the light of this comment and the limited grounds of appeal for which permission has been granted, we have been spared much of this voluminous documentation.

13 The judge then commented, at para 21:

> "The evidence shows clearly that the protestors object to the whole industry of shale gas exploration and they do not distinguish between some operators and other operators. This indicates to me that what has happened to other operators in the past will happen to Ineos at some point, in the absence of injunctions. Further, the evidence makes it clear that, before the commencement of these proceedings, the protestors were aware of Ineos as an active, or at least an intending, operator in the industry. There is absolutely no reason to think that the protestors will exempt Ineos from their protest activities. Before the commencement of these proceedings, the protestors were also aware of some or all of the sites which are the subject of these proceedings. In addition, the existence of these proceedings has drawn attention to the eight Sites described earlier."

14 The judge then proceeded to consider the evidence, expressed himself satisfied that there was a real and imminent threat of unlawful activity if he did not make an interim order pending trial and that a similar order would be made at that trial. He accordingly made the orders requested by the claimants apart from that relating to harassment. The orders were in summary that: (1) the first defendants were restrained from trespassing at any of the sites; (2) the second defendants were restrained from interfering with access to sites 3 and 4, which were accessed by identified private access roads; (3) the third defendants were restrained from interfering with access to public rights of way by road, path or bridleway to sites 1–4 and 7–8, such interference being defined as (a) blocking the highway; (b) slow walking; (c) climbing onto vehicles; (d) unreasonably preventing access to or egress from the Sites; and (e) unreasonably obstructing the highway; (4) the fifth defendants were restrained from combining together to (a) commit an offence under section 241(1) of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consultation) Act 1992; (b) commit an offence of criminal damage under section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 or of theft under section 1 of the Theft Act 1968; (c) obstruct free passage along a public highway, including "slow walking", blocking the highway, climbing onto vehicles and otherwise obstructing the highway with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay; and (d) cause anything to be done on a road or interfere with any motor vehicle or other traffic equipment "in such circumstances that it would or could be obvious to a reasonable person that to do so would or could be dangerous" all with the intention of damaging the claimants.

15 These separate orders related, therefore, to causes of action in trespass, private nuisance, public nuisance and causing loss by unlawful means.

16 It is a curiosity of the case that the judge made no order against either Mr Boyd or Mr Corré but they have each sought and obtained permission to appeal against the orders made in respect of the persons unknown and they have each instructed separate solicitors, junior counsel and leading counsel to challenge the orders. They profess to be concerned about the width of the orders and seek to be heard on behalf of the unknown persons who are the subject matters of the judge's order. Friends of the Earth are similarly concerned and have been permitted to intervene by way of written submissions. Any concern about the locus standi of Mr Boyd and Mr Corré to make submissions to the court has been dissipated by the assistance to the court which Ms Heather Williams QC and Ms Stephanie Harrison QC have been able to provide.

This appeal

17 Permission to appeal has been granted on three grounds:

(1) whether the judge was correct to grant injunctions against persons unknown;

(2) whether the judge failed adequately or at all to apply section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998 ("HRA") which requires a judge making an interim order in a case, in which article 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("ECHR") is engaged, to assess whether the claimants would be likely to obtain the relief sought at trial; and

© 2019. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

(3) whether the judge was right to grant an injunction restraining conspiracy to harm the claimants by the commission of unlawful acts against contractors engaged by the claimants.

Persons unknown: the law

18 Under the Rules of the Supreme Court ("RSC"), a writ had to name a defendant: see Friern Barnet Urban District Council v Adams [1927] 2 Ch 25. Accordingly, Stamp J held in In re Wykeham Terrace, Brighton, Sussex, Ex p Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association for the South East [1971] Ch 204 that no proceedings could take place for recovery of possession of land occupied by squatters unless they were named as defendants. RSC Ord 113 was then introduced to ensure that such relief could be granted: see McPhail v Persons, Names Unknown [1973] Ch 447, 458 per Lord Denning MR. There are also statutory provisions enabling local authorities to take enforcement proceedings against persons such as squatters or travellers contained in section 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 ("the 1990 Act").

19 Since the advent of the Civil Procedure Rules, there has been no requirement to name a defendant in a claim form and orders have been made against "Persons Unknown" in appropriate cases. The first such case seems to have been Bloomsbury Publishing Group plc v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2003] EWHC 1205 (Ch); [2003] 1 WLR 1633 in which unknown persons had illicitly obtained copies of the yet to be published book "Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix" and were trying to sell them (or parts of them) to various newspapers. Sir Andrew Morritt V-C made an order against the person or persons who had offered the publishers of the Sun, the Daily Mail and the Daily Mirror copies of the book or any part thereof and the person or persons who had physical possession of a copy of the book. The theft and touting of the copies had, of course, already happened and the injunction was therefore aimed at persons who had already obtained copies of the book illicitly.

20 Sir Andrew Morritt V-C followed his own decision in Hampshire Waste Services Ltd v Intending Trespassers Upon Chineham Incinerator Site [2003] EWHC 1738 (Ch); [2004] Env LR 9. In that case, similarly to this, there had been in the past a number of incidents of environmental protesters trespassing on waste incineration sites. There was to be a "Global Day of Action Against Incinerators" on 14 July 2003 and the claimants applied for an injunction restraining persons from entering or remaining at named waste incineration sites without the claimant's consent. Sir Andrew observed that it would be wrong for the defendants' description to include a legal conclusion such as was implicit in the use of a description with the word "trespass" and that it was likewise undesirable to use a description with the word "intending" since that depended on the subjective intention of the individual concerned which would not be known to the claimants and was susceptible of change. He therefore made an order against persons entering or remaining on the sites without the consent of the claimants in connection with the Global Day of Action.

21 Both these authorities were referred to without disapproval in Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs v Meier [2009] UKSC 11; [2009] 1 WLR 2780, para 2.

22 In the present case, the judge held, at para 121, that since Bloomsbury there had been many cases where injunctions had been granted against persons unknown and many of those injunctions had been granted against protesters. For understandable reasons, those cases (unidentified) do not appear to have been taken to an appellate court. Ms Harrison on behalf of Mr Corré submitted that the procedure sanctioned by Sir Andrew Morritt V-C without adverse argument was contrary to principle unless expressly permitted by statute, as by the 1990 Act (section 187B, as inserted by section 3 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 during the subsistence of the RSC which would otherwise have prohibited it) or by the Civil Procedure Rules (eg CPR r 19.6 dealing with representative actions or CPR r 55.3(4), the successor to the RSC Ord 113). The principles on which she relied for this purpose were that a court cannot bind a person who is not a party to the action in which such an order is made and that it was wrong that someone, who had to commit the tort (and thus be liable to proceedings for contempt) before he became a party to the action, should have no opportunity to submit the order should not have been made before he was in contempt of it.

23 She pointed out that when the statutory powers of the 1990 Act were invoked that was precisely the position and she submitted that that could only be explained by the existence of the statute. This was most clearly apparent from the South Cambridgeshire litigation in which the Court of Appeal in September 2004 granted an injunction against persons unknown restraining them from (inter alia) causing or permitting the deposit of hardcore or other materials at Smithy Fen, Cottenham or causing or permitting the entry of caravans or mobile accommodation on that land for residential or other non-agricultural purposes, see South Cambridgeshire District Council v Persons Unknown [2004] EWCA Civ 1280; [2004] 4 P LR 88. Brooke LJ cited both Bloomsbury and Hampshire Waste as illustrations of the way in which the power to grant relief against persons unknown had been used under the CPR.

24 On 20 April 2005 Ms Gammell stationed her caravan on the site; the injunction was served on her and its effect was explained to her on 21 April 2005; she did not leave and the council applied to commit her for contempt. Judge Plumstead on 11 July 2005 joined her as a defendant to the action and held that she was in contempt, refusing to consider Ms Gammell's rights under article 8 of the ECHR at that stage and adjourned sentence pending an appeal. On 31 October 2005 the Court of Appeal dismissed her appeal and upheld the finding of contempt, holding that the authority of South Buckinghamshire District Council v Porter [2003] UKHL 26; [2003] 2 AC 558, which required the court to consider the personal circumstances of the defendant under article 8 before an injunction was granted, only applied when the defendants were in occupation of a site and were named as defendants in the original proceedings: see South Cambridgeshire District Council v Gammell [2005] EWCA Civ 1429; [2006] 1 WLR 658. Sir Anthony Clarke MR (with whom Rix and Moore-Bick LJJ agreed) held, at para 32, that Ms Gammell became a party to the proceedings when she did an act which brought her within the definition of the defendant in the particular case and, at para 33, that, by the time of the committal proceedings she was a defendant, was in breach of the injunction and, given her state of knowledge, was in contempt of court. He then summarised the legal position:

> "(1) The principles in the South Buckinghamshire case set out above apply when the court is considering whether to grant an injunction against named defendants. (2) They do not apply in full when a court is considering whether or not to grant an injunction against persons unknown because the relevant personal information would, ex hypothesi, not be available. However this fact makes it important for courts only to grant such injunctions in cases where it is not possible for the applicant to identify the persons concerned or likely to be concerned. (3) The correct course for a person who learns that he is enjoined and who wishes to take further action, which is or would be in breach of the injunction, and thus in contempt of court, is not to take such action but to apply to the court for an order varying or setting aside the order. On such an application the court should apply the principles in the South Buckinghamshire case. (4) The correct course for a person who appreciates that he is infringing the injunction when he learns of it is to apply to the court forthwith for an order varying or setting aside the injunction. On such an application the court should again apply the principles in the South Buckinghamshire case. (5) A person who takes action in breach of the injunction in the knowledge that he is in breach may apply to the court to vary the injunction for the future. He should acknowledge that he is in breach and explain why he took the action knowing of the injunction. The court will then take account of all the circumstances of the case, including the reasons for the injunction, the reasons for the breach and the applicant's personal circumstances, in deciding whether to vary the injunction for the future and in deciding what, if any, penalty the court should impose for a contempt committed when he took the action in breach of the injunction. In the first case the court will apply the principles in the South Buckinghamshire case and in the Mid Bedfordshire District Council v Brown [2004] EWCA Civ 1709; [2005] 1 WLR 1460. (6) In cases where the injunction was granted at a without notice hearing a defendant can apply to set aside the injunction as well as to vary it for the future. Where, however, a defendant has acted in breach of the injunction in knowledge of its existence before the setting aside, he remains in breach of the injunction for the past and in contempt of court even if the injunction is subsequently set aside or varied. (7) The principles in the South Buckinghamshire case are irrelevant to the question whether or not a person is in breach of an injunction and/or whether he is in contempt of court, because the sole question in such a case is whether he is in breach and/or whether he is in contempt of court."

25 Ms Harrison said that this was unacceptable unless sanctioned by statute or rules of court contained in the CPR, because the persons unknown had no opportunity, before the injunction was granted, to submit that no order should be made on the grounds of possible infringements of the right to freedom of expression and the right peaceably to assemble granted by articles 10 and 11 of the ECHR or, indeed, any other grounds.

26 Ms Harrison further relied on the recent case of Cameron v Hussain [2019] UKSC 6; [2019] 1 WLR 1471 in which the Supreme Court held that it was not permissible to sue an unknown driver of a car which had collided with the claimant's car for the purpose of then suing that unknown driver's insurance company, pursuant to the provisions of the Road Traffic Act 1988 requiring the insurance company to satisfy a judgment against the driver once the driver's liability has been established in legal proceedings. Lord Sumption (with whom Lord Reed DPSC, Lord Carnwath, Lord Hodge and Lady Black JJSC agreed) began his judgment by saying that the question on the appeal was in what circumstances was it permissible to sue an unnamed defendant but added that it arose in a rather special context. He answered that question by concluding, at para 26, that a person, such as the driver of the Micra car in that case, "who is not just anonymous but cannot be identified with any particular person, cannot be sued under a pseudonym or description, unless the circumstances are such that the service of the claim form can be effected or properly dispensed with".

27 In the course of his judgment he said, at para 12, that the CPR neither expressly authorise nor expressly prohibit exceptions to the general rule that actions against unnamed parties are permissible only against trespassers; the critical question was what, as a matter of law, was the basis of the court's jurisdiction over parties and in what (if any) circumstances jurisdiction can be exercised on that basis against persons who cannot be named. He then said, at para 13, that it was necessary to distinguish two categories of cases to which different considerations applied: the first category being anonymous defendants who are identifiable but whose names are unknown; the second being anonymous defendants who cannot even be identified, such as most hit and run drivers.

> "The distinction is that in the first category the defendant is described in a way that makes it possible in principle to locate or communicate with him and to know without further inquiry whether he is the same as the person described in the claim form, whereas in the second category it is not."

Those in the second category could not therefore be sued because to do so would be contrary to the fundamental principle that a person cannot be made subject to the jurisdiction of the court without having such notice of the proceedings as would enable him to be heard: para 17.

28 Ms Harrison submitted that these categories were exclusive categories of unnamed or unknown defendants and that the defendants as described in the present case did not fall within the first category since they are not described in a way that makes it possible to locate or communicate with them, let alone to know whether they are the same as the persons described in the claim form, because until they committed the torts enjoined, they did not even exist. To the extent that they fell within the second category they cannot be sued as unknown or unnamed persons.

29 Despite the persuasive manner in which these arguments were advanced, I cannot accept them. In my judgment it is too absolutist to say that a claimant can never sue persons unknown unless they are identifiable at the time the claim form is issued. That was done in both the Bloomsbury and the Hampshire Waste cases and no one has hitherto suggested that they were wrongly decided. Ms Harrison shrank from submitting that Bloomsbury was wrongly decided since it so obviously met the justice of the case but she did submit that Hampshire Waste was wrongly decided. She submitted that there was a distinction between injunctions against persons who existed but could not be identified and injunctions against persons who did not exist and would only come into existence when they breached the injunction. But the supposedly absolute prohibition on suing unidentifiable persons is already being departed from. Lord Sumption's two categories apply to persons who do exist, some of whom are identifiable and some of whom are not. But he was not considering persons who do not exist at all and will only come into existence in the future. I do not consider that he was intending to say anything adverse about suing such persons. On the contrary, he referred (para 11) to one context of the invocation of the jurisdiction to sue unknown persons as being trespassers and other torts committed by protesters and demonstrators and observed that in some of those cases proceedings were allowed in support of an application for a quia timet injunction "where the defendant could be identified only as those persons who might in future commit the relevant acts". But he did not refer in terms to these cases again and they do not appear to fit into either of the categories he used for the purpose of deciding the Cameron case. He appeared rather to approve them provided that proper notice of the court order can be given and that the fundamental principle of justice on which he relied for the purpose of negating the ability to sue a "hit and run" driver (namely that a person cannot be made subject to the court's jurisdiction without having such notice as will enable him to be heard) was not infringed. That is because he said this, at para 15:

© 2019. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

> "Where an interim injunction is granted and can be specifically enforced against some property or by notice to third parties who would necessarily be involved in any contempt, the process of enforcing it will sometimes be enough to bring the proceedings to the defendant's attention. In Bloomsbury Publishing Group, for example, the unnamed defendants would have had to identify themselves as the persons in physical possession of copies of the book if they had sought to do the prohibited act, namely disclose it to people (such as newspapers) who had been notified of the injunction. The Court of Appeal has held that where proceedings were brought against unnamed persons and interim relief was granted to restrain specified acts, a person became both a defendant and a person to whom the injunction was addressed by doing one of those acts: South Cambridgeshire District Council v Gammell, para 32. In the case of anonymous but identifiable defendants, these procedures for service are now well established, and there is no reason to doubt their juridical basis."

30 This amounts at least to an express approval of Bloomsbury and no express disapproval of Hampshire Waste. I would, therefore, hold that there is no conceptual or legal prohibition on suing persons unknown who are not currently in existence but will come into existence when they commit the prohibited tort.

31 That is by no means to say that the injunctions granted by Morgan J should be upheld without more ado. A court should be inherently cautious about granting injunctions against unknown persons since the reach of such an injunction is necessarily difficult to assess in advance.

32 It is not easy to formulate the broad principles on which an injunction against unknown persons can properly be granted. Ms Harrison's fall-back position was that they should only be granted when it was necessary to do so and that it was never necessary to do so if an individual could be found who could be sued. In the present case notice and service of the injunction was ordered to be given to the potentially interested parties listed in Schedule 21 of the order. This listed Key Organisations, Local Action Groups and Frack Free Organisations all of whom could have been, according to her, named as defendants, rendering it unnecessary to sue persons unknown. This strikes me as hopelessly unrealistic. The judge was satisfied that unknown persons were likely to commit the relevant torts and that there was a real and imminent risk of their doing so; it is most unlikely that there was a real and imminent risk of the Schedule 21 organisations doing so and I cannot believe that, if it is possible to sue one or more such entities, it is wrong to sue persons unknown.

33 Ms Williams for Mr Boyd, in addition to submitting that the judge had failed to apply properly or at all section 12(3) of the HRA, submitted that the injunction should not, in any event, have been granted against the fifth defendants (conspiring to cause damage to the claimants by unlawful means) because the term of the injunctions were neither framed to catch only those who were committing the tort nor clear and precise in their scope. There is, to my mind, considerable force in this submission and the principles behind that submission can usefully be built into the requirements necessary for the grant of the injunction against unknown persons, whether in the context of the common law or in the context of the ECHR.

34 I would tentatively frame those requirements in the following way: (1) there must be a sufficiently real and imminent risk of a tort being committed to justify quia timet relief; (2) it is impossible to name the persons who are likely to commit the tort unless restrained; (3) it is possible to give effective notice of the injunction and for the method of such notice to be set out in the order; (4) the terms of the injunction must correspond to the threatened tort and not be so wide that they prohibit lawful conduct; (5) the terms of the injunction must be sufficiently clear and precise as to enable persons potentially affected to know what they must not do; and (6) the injunction should have clear geographical and temporal limits.

Application of the law to this case

35 In the present case there is no difficulty about the first three requirements. The judge held that there was a real and imminent risk of the commission of the relevant torts and permission has not been granted to challenge that on appeal. He also found that there were persons likely to commit the torts who could not be named and was right to do so; there are clear provisions in the order about service of the injunctions and there is no reason to suppose that these provisions will not constitute effective notice of the injunction. The remaining requirements are more problematic.

Width and clarity of the injunctions granted by the judge

36 The right to freedom of peaceful assembly is guaranteed by both the common law and article 11 of the ECHR. It is against that background that the injunctions have to be assessed. But this right, important as it is, does not include any right to trespass on private property. Professor Dicey in his Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th ed (1959) devoted an entire chapter of his seminal work to what he called the right of public meeting saying this at p 271:

> "No better instance can indeed be found of the way in which in England the constitution is built up upon individual rights than our rules as to public assemblies. The right of assembling is nothing more than a result of the view taken by the courts as to individual liberty of person and individual liberty of speech. There is no special law allowing A, B and C to meet together either in the open air or elsewhere for a lawful purpose, but the right of A to go where he pleases so that he does not commit a trespass, and to say what he likes to B so that his talk is not libellous or seditious, the right of B to do the like, and the existence of the same rights of C, D, E, and F, and so on ad infinitum, lead to the consequence that A, B, C, D, and a thousand or ten thousand other persons, may (as a general rule) meet together in any place where otherwise they each have a right to be for a lawful purpose and in a lawful manner."

37 This neatly states the common law as it was in 195: see Oxford Edition (2013), p 154, I do not think it has changed since. There is no difficulty about defining the tort of trespass and an injunction not to trespass can be framed in clear and precise terms, as indeed Morgan J has done. I would, therefore, uphold the injunction against trespass given against the first defendants subject to one possible drafting point and always subject to the point about section 12(3) of the HRA. I would likewise uphold the injunction against the second defendants described as interfering with private rights of way shaded orange on the plans of the relevant sites. It is of course the law that interference with a private right of way has to be substantial before it is actionable and the judge has built that qualification into his orders. He was not asked to include any definition of the word substantial and said, at para 149, that it was not appropriate to do so since the concept of substantial interference was simple enough and well established. I agree.

38 The one possible drafting point that arises is that it was said by Ms Harrison that, as drafted, the injunctions would catch an innocent dog-walker exercising a public right of way over the claimants' land whose dog escaped onto the land and had to be recovered by its owner trespassing on that land. It was accepted that this was not a particularly likely scenario in the context of a fracking protest but it was said that the injunction might well have a chilling effect so as to prevent dog-walkers exercising their rights in the first place. I regard this as fanciful. I can see that an ordinary dog-walker exercising a public right of way might be chilled by the existence of an anti-fracking protest and thus be deterred from exercising his normal rights but, if he is not deterred by that, he is not going to be deterred instead by thoughts of possible proceedings for contempt for an inadvertent trespass while he is recovering his wandering animal. If this were really considered an important point, it could, no doubt, be cured by adding some such words as "in connection with the activities of the claimants" to the order but like the judge (in para 146) I do not consider it necessary to deal with this minor problem. Overall, this case raises much more important points than wandering dogs.

39 Those important points about the width and the clarity of the injunctions are critical when it comes to considering the injunctions relating to public rights of way and the supply chain in connection with conspiracy to cause damage by unlawful means. They are perhaps most clearly seen in relation to the supply chain. The judge has made an immensely detailed order (in no doubt a highly laudable attempt to ensure that the terms of the injunction correspond to the threatened tort) but has produced an order that is, in my view, both too wide and insufficiently clear. In short, he has attempted to do the impossible. He has, for example, restrained the fifth defendants from combining together to commit the act or offence of obstructing free passage along a public highway (or to access to or from a public highway) by ((c)(ii)) slow walking in front of the vehicles with the object of slowing them down and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay or ((c)(iv)) otherwise unreasonably and/or without lawful authority or excuse obstructing the highway with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay, all with the intention of damaging the claimants.

40 As Ms Williams pointed out in her submissions, supported in this respect by Friends of the Earth, there are several problems with a quia timet order in this form. First, it is of the essence of the tort that it must cause damage. While that cannot of itself be an objection to the grant of quia timet relief, the requirement that it cause damage can only be incorporated into the order by reference to the defendants' intention which, as Sir Andrew Morritt said in Hampshire Waste, depends on the subjective intention of the individual which is not necessarily known to the outside world (and in particular to the claimants) and is susceptible of change and, for that reason, should not be incorporated into the order. Secondly, the concept of slow walking in front of vehicles or, more generally, obstructing the highway may not result in any damage to the claimants at all. Thirdly, slow walking is not itself defined and is too wide: how slow is slow? Any speed slower than a normal walking speed of two miles per hour? One does not know. Fourthly, the concept of "unreasonably" obstructing the highway is not susceptible of advance definition. It is, of course, the law that for an obstruction of the highway to be unlawful it must be an unreasonable obstruction (see Director of Public Prosecutions v Jones (Margaret) [1999] 2 AC 240), but that is a question of fact and degree that can only be assessed in an actual situation and not in advance. A person faced with such an injunction may well be chilled into not obstructing the highway at all. Fifthly, it is wrong to build the concept of "without lawful authority or excuse" into an injunction since an ordinary person exercising legitimate rights of protest is most unlikely to have any clear idea of what would constitute lawful authority or excuse. If he is not clear about what he can and cannot do, that may well have a chilling effect also.

41 Many of the same objections apply to the injunction granted in relation to the exclusion zones shaded purple on the plans annexed to the order, which comprise public access ways to sites 1–4, 7 and 8 and public footpaths or bridleways over sites 2 and 7. The defendants are restrained from: (a) blocking the highway when done with a view to slowing down or stopping traffic; (b) slow walking; and (c) unreasonably; and/or without lawful authority or excuse preventing the claimants from access to or egress from any of the sites. These orders are likewise too wide and too uncertain in ambit to be properly the subject of quia timet relief.

42 Mr Alan Maclean QC for the claimants submitted that the court should grant advance relief of this kind in appropriate cases in order to save time and much energy later devoted to legal proceedings after the events have happened. But it is only when events have happened which can in retrospect be seen to have been illegal that, in my view, wide ranging injunctions of the kind granted against the third and fifth defendants should be granted. The citizen's right of protest is not to be diminished by advance fear of committal except in the clearest of cases, of which trespass is perhaps the best example.

Geographical and temporal limits

43 The injunctions granted by the judge against the first and second defendants have acceptable geographical limits but there is no temporal limit. That is unsatisfactory.

Section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act

44 Section 12 of the HRA 1998 provides:

> "(1) This section applies if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression.
> "(2) If the person against whom the application for relief is made ('the respondent') is neither present nor represented, no such relief is to be granted unless the court is satisfied— (a) that the applicant has taken all practicable steps to notify the respondent; or (b) that there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified.
> "(3) No such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed."

45 Ms Williams submitted that the judge had failed to apply section 12(3) because the claimants had failed to establish that they would be likely to establish at trial that publication should not be allowed. She relied in particular on the manner in which the judge had expressed himself [2017] EWHC 2945 (Ch), para 98:

> "I have considered above the test to be applied for the grant of an interim injunction ('more likely than not') and the test for a quia timet injunction at trial ('imminent and real risk of harm'). I will now address the question as to what a court would be likely to do if this were an application for a final injunction and the court accepted the evidence put forward by the claimants."

She submitted that it was not correct to ask what a trial judge would be likely to do "if the court accepted the evidence put forward by the claimants". The whole point of the subsection is that it was the duty of the court to test the claimants' evidence, not to assume that it would be accepted.

© 2019. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

46 Ms Williams then suggested many things which the judge failed (according to her) to take into account and submitted that it was not enough for Mr Maclean to point to the earlier passage (para 18) in the judgment where the judge had said that the factual evidence of the claimants was not contradicted by the defendants because he had added: "although the defendants did join issue with certain of the comments made or the conclusions drawn by the claimants and some of the detail of the factual material." There was, she said, no assessment of Mr Boyd's or Mr Corré's challenges to the inferences which the claimants invited the judge to draw or to the conclusions drawn by them, let alone analysis of the (admittedly small) amount of factual contradiction.

47 This submission has to be assessed on the basis (if my Lords agree) that the injunctions relating to public nuisance and the supply chain will be discharged. The only injunctions left are those restraining trespass and interfering with the claimants' rights of way and it will be rather easier therefore for the claimants to establish that at trial publication of views by trespassers on the claimants' property should not be allowed.

48 Nevertheless, I consider that there is force in Ms Williams's submission. It is not just the trespass that has to be shown to be likely to be established; by way of example, it is also the nature of the threat. For the purposes of interim relief, the judge has held that the threat of trespass is imminent and real but he has given little or no consideration (at any rate expressly) to the question whether that is likely to be established at trial. This is particularly striking in relation to site 7 where it is said that planning permission for fracking has twice been refused and sites 3 and 4 where planning permission has not yet been sought.

49 A number of other matters are identified in para 8 of Ms Williams's skeleton argument. We did not permit Ms Williams to advance any argument on the facts which contravened the judge's findings on the matters relevant to the grant of interim relief, apart from section 12(3) HRA considerations, and those findings will stand. Nevertheless, some of those matters may in addition be relevant to the likelihood of the trial court granting final relief. It is accepted that this court is in no position to apply the section 12(3) HRA test and that, if Ms Williams's submissions of principle are accepted, the matter will have to be remitted to the judge for him to re-consider, in the light of our judgments, whether the court at trial is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed.

Disposal

50 I would therefore discharge the injunctions made against the third and fifth defendants and dismiss the claims against those defendants. I would maintain the injunctions against the first and second defendants pending remission to the judge to reconsider: (1) whether interim relief should be granted in the light of section 12(3) HRA; and (2) if the injunctions are to be continued against the first and second defendants what temporal limit is appropriate.

Conclusion

51 To the extent indicated above, I would allow this appeal.

Cuadrilla Bowland Ltd and others v Persons Unknown and others

[2020] EWCA Civ 9

2019 Dec 10, 11; 2020 Jan 23 Underhill, David Richards, Leggatt LJJ

Contempt of court — Committal proceedings — Appeal — Protestors deliberately disobeying injunction found guilty of contempt and sentenced to imprisonment — Whether injunction insufficiently clear and certain to allow committal — Whether suspended orders for imprisonment appropriate sanction

The claimants were a group of companies and various individuals connected with the business of shale and gas exploration by the hydraulic fracturing of rock formations, a procedure colloquially known as "fracking". The claimants had been granted an injunction against the first to third defendants, who were described as groups of "persons unknown" with, in each case, further wording relating to identified locations and potential actions designed to provide a definition of the persons falling within the group, to prevent trespass on the claimants' land, unlawful interference with the claimants' rights of passage to and from their land and unlawful interference with the supply chain of the first claimant. The judge subsequently made an order committing three protestors to prison for contempt of court. Their contempt consisted in deliberately disobeying the injunction and as punishment for two deliberate breaches of the injunction, the judge committed one of the protestors to prison for two months plus four weeks. The other two were both committed to prison for four weeks. In each case execution of the committal order was suspended on condition that each obeyed the injunction for a period of two years. The protestors appealed against the committal orders contending that the judge erred in committing them under two paragraphs of the injunction—paragraph 4 (trespass) and paragraph 7 (unlawful means conspiracy)—as those paragraphs were insufficiently clear and certain because they included references to intention; (2) alternatively, the judge erred by imposing an inappropriate sanction (consisting of suspended orders for imprisonment) which was too harsh.

On the appeal—

Held, dismissing the appeal in part, (1) that the terms of an injunction might be unclear if a term was ambiguous in that the words used had more than one meaning, vague in so far as there were borderline cases to which it was inherently uncertain whether the term applied, or by its language too convoluted, technical or otherwise opaque to be readily understandable by the person(s) to whom the injunction was addressed; that all those kinds of clarity (or lack of it) were relevant at the stage of deciding whether to grant an injunction and, if so, in what terms; that they were also relevant where an application was made to enforce compliance or punish breach of an injunction by seeking an order for committal; that, in principle, people should not be at risk of being penalised for breach of a court order if they acted in a way which the order did not clearly prohibit so that a person should not be held to be in contempt of court if it was unclear whether their conduct was covered by the terms of the order; that that was so whether the term in question was unclear because it was ambiguous, vague or inaccessible and it was important to note that whether a term of an order was unclear in any of those ways was dependent on context; that there was nothing objectionable in principle about including a requirement of intention in an injunction, nor was there was anything in such a requirement which was inherently unclear or which required any legal training or knowledge to comprehend; that it was not in fact correct that the requirement of the tort of conspiracy to show damage could only be incorporated into a quia timet injunction by reference to the defendant's intention, since it was perfectly possible to frame a prohibition which applied only to future conduct that actually caused damage; that it was, however, correct that, in order to make the terms of the injunction correspond to the tort and avoid prohibiting conduct that was lawful, it was necessary to include a requirement that the defendant's conduct was intended to cause damage to the claimant and there was nothing ambiguous, vague or difficult to understand about such a requirement; that limiting the scope of a prohibition by reference to the intention required to make the act wrongful avoided restraining conduct that was lawful; that in so far as it created difficulty of proof, that was a difficulty for the claimant and not for a person accused of breaching the injunction—for whom the need to prove the specified intention provided an additional protection; and that, accordingly, although the inclusion of multiple references to intention risked introducing an undesirable degree of complexity, there was no reason in principle why references to intention should not be incorporated into an order or that the inclusion of such references in the terms of the injunction in the present case provided a reason not to enforce it by committal (post, paras 57–60, 65, 69, 74, 110, 111, 112).

Dicta of Longmore LJ in Ineos Upstream Ltd and others v Persons Unknown and others (Friends of the Earth intervening) [2019] 4 WLR 100, para 40 not followed.

(2) That it was clear from the case law that, even where protest took the form of intentional disruption of the lawful activities of others, as it did here, such protest still fell within the scope of articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; that any restrictions imposed on such protestors were therefore lawful only if they satisfied the requirements set out in articles 10(2) and 11(2) and that was so even where the protestors' actions involved disobeying a court order; that although the protestors' rights to freedom of expression and assembly had already been taken into account in deciding whether to make the order which they disobeyed, imposing a sanction for such disobedience involved a further and separate restriction of their rights which also required justification in accordance with articles 10(2) and 11(2); that the judge was entitled to conclude that the restrictions which he imposed on the liberty of the protestors by making suspended orders for their committal to prison were in any event justified by the need to protect the rights of the claimants and to maintain the court's authority, which was an aim specifically identified in article 10(2), and to prevent disorder as identified in both articles 10(2) and 11(2); that in deciding what sanctions were appropriate, the judge had approached the decision, correctly, by considering both the culpability of the protestors and the harm caused, intended, or likely to be caused by their breaches of the injunction; that there was no merit in the protestors' argument that, in making that assessment, he had misapplied the Sentencing Council guideline on sentencing for breach of a criminal behaviour order; and that, as to the sanction applied, the court would vary the committal order made in relation to the first protestor by substituting for the period of imprisonment of two months a period of four weeks (post, paras 100–102, 110, 111, 112).

Per curiam. While it is undoubtedly desirable that the terms of an injunction should correspond to the threatened tort and not be so wide that they prohibit lawful conduct, this cannot be regarded as an absolute rule (post, para 50, 111, 112).

APPEAL from Judge Pelling QC, sitting as a judge of the High Court

Pursuant to an application by Cuadrilla Bowland Ltd and others for an injunction to prevent trespass on the claimants' land, unlawful interference with the claimants' rights of passage to and from their land and unlawful interference with the supply chain of the first claimant, Judge Pelling QC, sitting as a judge of the High Court granted an injunction on 11 July 2018 to run until 1 June 2020 against persons unknown.

On 3 September 2019 the judge made an order to commit three protestors, Katrina Lawrie, Lee Walsh and Christopher Wilson to prison for contempt of court. As punishment for two deliberate breaches of the injunction, the judge committed the first protestor to prison for two months plus four weeks. The other two protestors were both committed to prison for four weeks. In each case execution of the committal order was suspended on condition that they obeyed the injunction for a period of two years.

By an appellant's notice dated 24 September 2019, the protestors sought permission to appeal against the committal order with appeal to follow. The grounds of appeal were that, in relation to the two incidents on which the order for committal was based: (1) the judge had erred in committing the protestors under paragraphs 4 (nuisance) and 7 (unlawful means conspiracy) of the injunction, as those paragraphs were insufficiently clear and certain because they included references to intention; (2) alternatively, the judge had erred by imposing an inappropriate sanction (consisting of suspended orders for imprisonment) which was too harsh.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Leggatt LJ, post, paras 3–23.

Kirsty Brimelow QC, Adam Wagner and Richard Brigden (instructed by Robert Lizar Solicitors, Manchester) for the protestors.

LEGGATT LJ

Introduction

1 On 3 September 2019 Judge Pelling QC, sitting as a judge of the High Court, made an order committing the three appellants to prison for contempt of court. Their contempt consisted in deliberately disobeying an earlier court order, which I will refer to as "the Injunction", made on 11 July 2018 with the aim of preventing trespass on the claimants' land, unlawful interference with the claimants' rights of passage to and from their land and unlawful interference with the supply chain of the first claimant ("Cuadrilla"). As punishment for two deliberate breaches of the Injunction, the judge committed one of the appellants, Katrina Lawrie, to prison for two months plus four weeks. The other appellants, Lee Walsh and Christopher Wilson, were both committed to prison for four weeks. In each case execution of the committal order was suspended on condition that the appellant obeys the Injunction for a period of two years.

2 The appellants have exercised their rights of appeal against the committal order. They appeal on the grounds (1) that the relevant terms of the Injunction were insufficiently clear and certain to be enforceable by committal because those terms made the question whether conduct was prohibited depend on the intention of the person concerned; and (2) that imposing the sanction of imprisonment (albeit suspended) was inappropriate and unduly harsh in the circumstances of this case. Relevant circumstances include the facts that the Injunction was granted, not against the appellants as named individuals, but against "persons unknown" who committed specified acts, and that the acts done by the appellants in breach of the Injunction were part of a campaign of protest involving "direct action" designed to disrupt Cuadrilla's activities. This context is one in which the appellants' rights to freedom of expression and assembly are engaged.

Background

3 Cuadrilla and the other claimants own an area of land off the Preston New Road (A583), near Blackpool in Lancashire, on which Cuadrilla has engaged in the hydraulic fracturing, or "fracking", of rock deep underground for the purpose of extracting shale gas. It is not in dispute that all Cuadrilla's activities have been carried out in accordance with the law. Equally, there is no dispute that Cuadrilla's activities are controversial and that a significant number of people, including the appellants, have sincere and strongly held views that fracking ought not to take place because of its impact on the environment. It is also common ground that the appellants, like everyone else, have the right to express their views and to protest against an activity to which they object subject only to such restrictions as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society for (amongst other legitimate aims) the prevention of disorder or crime or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. The right of protest is protected both by the common law of England and Wales and by articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (the "Human Rights Convention") which is incorporated into UK law by the Human Rights Act 1998.

4 Protests on and near Cuadrilla's site started in 2014, well before any drilling or preparatory work had commenced, when part of the site was occupied by a group of protestors. On 21 August 2014 Cuadrilla issued proceedings to recover possession of the land and for an injunction to prohibit further trespassing. Such an injunction was granted until 6 October 2016.

5 Protests intensified after work in preparation for exploratory drilling at the site started in January 2017. The evidence adduced by the claimants when they applied for a further injunction in May 2018 showed that, since January 2017, Cuadrilla and its employees, contractors and suppliers had been subjected to numerous "direct action" protests, designed to obstruct works on the site. The actions taken by some protestors included "locking on"—that is, chaining oneself to an object or another person—at the entrance to the site in order to prevent vehicles from entering or leaving it; "slow walking"—that is, walking on the highway as slowly as possible in front of vehicles attempting to enter or leave the site; and climbing onto vehicles to prevent them from moving.

6 The overall scale of such protest activity is indicated by the fact that, between January 2017 and May 2018, the police had made over 350 arrests in connection with protests against Cuadrilla's operations, including 160 arrests for obstructing the highway, and substantial police resources had to be deployed in order to deal with the actions of protestors, with around 100 officers directly involved each day and at a total policing cost of some £7m.

7 In July 2017 a group calling themselves "Reclaim the Power" organised a "month of action" targeting Cuadrilla. Of the many actions taken by protestors during that month to attempt to disrupt transport to and from the Preston New Road site, one particularly disruptive incident involved criminal offences and led to sentences which were the subject of an appeal to the Criminal Division of the Court of Appeal: see R v Roberts (Richard) (Liberty intervening) [2018] EWCA Crim 2739; [2019] 1 WLR 2577. That incident began on the morning of 25 July 2017, when two protestors managed to climb on top of lorries approaching the site along the Preston New Road, forcing the lorries to stop to avoid putting the safety of the two men at risk. Two more men later climbed on top of the lorries. Each of the protestors stayed there for two or three days and the last one did not come down until 29 July 2017. For all this time the lorries were therefore unable to move, with the result that one carriageway of the road remained blocked. Substantial disruption was caused to local residents and other members of the public.

8 Further particularly serious disruption occurred on 31 July 2017. The events of that day were described in a letter from Assistant Chief Constable Terry Woods put in evidence by Cuadrilla, as follows:

> "The last day of the RTP [Reclaim the Power] rolling resistance month of action saw a final lock-in involving a supposedly one tonne weight concrete barrel lock-on in the rear of a van with a prominent RTP activist attached to it via an arm tube. This action, coupled with an already tense atmosphere amongst the RTP activists, anti-fracking activists and local protestors, resulted in confrontation with police and they arrested two protestors. During the evening the protestors then became aware of a convoy en route to the drill site resulting in four protestors deploying in two pairs with arm tube lock-ons and blocking the A583. Further confrontation and aggression towards police ensued, with one of the locked-on protestors also assaulting a police officer. A security staff van was then mobbed by protestors and damaged, with a further protestor being arrested from that incident. Protestors also blockaded three vans of police protest liaison officers outside the Maple Farm Camp. The vehicle of a drill site staff member's partner dropping them off was then confronted by protestors, with a number of protestors climbing on the roof of the vehicle as it attempted to reverse away. The A583 was finally reopened to traffic at around 21:00 once police had removed all the protestors locked on, resulting in four arrests …"

9 At the hearing of the application for an injunction on 31 May and 1 June 2018, evidence was also adduced that the "Reclaim the Power" protest group was planning and promoting a further campaign of sustained direct action targeting Cuadrilla from 11 June to 1 July 2018. The group had openly stated their intention to organise a mass blockade of the Preston New Road dubbed "Block around the Clock" with the aim of completely preventing access to and egress from Cuadrilla's site for four days from 27 June to 1 July 2018.

The Injunction

10 It was against this background that Judge Pelling QC granted an interim injunction on 1 June 2018 to restrain four named individuals and "persons unknown" from trespassing on the claimants' land, unlawfully interfering with the claimants' rights of passage to and from their land and unlawfully interfering with Cuadrilla's supply chain. This injunction was granted until 11 July 2018. On that date it was replaced by a further order in similar terms, to continue until 1 June 2020 (unless varied or discharged in the meantime). This is the Injunction that was in force when the appellants did the acts which led to their committal for contempt of court.

11 As with the order initially made on 1 June 2018, the Injunction had three limbs, each designed to prevent a different type of wrong (tort) being done to the claimants.

Paragraph 2: trespass

12 The first type of wrong, prohibited by paragraph 2 of the Injunction, was trespassing on the claimants' land situated off the Preston New Road. The land was identified by reference to the title numbers under which it is registered at the Land Registry and was denoted in the order as "the PNR Land".

Paragraph 4: nuisance

13 The second type of wrong which the Injunction sought to prevent was unlawful interference with the claimants' freedom to come and go to and from their land. An owner of land adjoining a public highway has a right of access to the highway and a person who interferes with this right commits the tort of private nuisance. In addition, it is a public nuisance to obstruct or hinder free passage along a public highway and an owner of land specially affected by such a nuisance can sue in respect of it, if the obstruction of the highway causes them inconvenience, delay or other damage which is substantial and appreciably greater in degree than any suffered by the general public: see Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 22nd ed (2017), para 20–181.

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

14 These rights protected by the law of nuisance underpinned paragraph 4 of the Injunction, which applied to the second defendant. The second defendant to the proceedings is described as:

> "Persons unknown interfering with the passage by the claimants and their agents, servants, contractors, sub-contractors, group companies, licensees, invitees or employees with or without vehicles, materials and equipment to, from, over and across the public highway known as Preston New Road."

Paragraph 4 of the Injunction prohibited persons falling within this description from carrying out the following acts on any part of "the PNR Access Route":

> "4.1 blocking any part of the bell-mouth at the Site Entrance with persons or things when done with a view to slowing down or stopping the traffic;
> "4.2 blocking or obstructing the highway by slow walking in front of vehicles with the object of slowing them down;
> "4.3 climbing onto any part of any vehicle or attaching themselves or anything or any object to any vehicle at any part of the Site Entrance; in each case with the intention of causing inconvenience or delay to the claimants and/or their agents, servants, contractors, sub-contractors, group companies, licensees, invitees or employees."

An exception was made in paragraph 5 for a weekly walk or march from Maple Farm on the Preston New Road to the Site Entrance followed by a meeting or assembly for up to 15 minutes at the bell-mouth of the Site Entrance.

15 The "PNR Access Route" was defined in paragraph 3 to mean:

> "The whole of the Preston New Road (A583) between the junction with Peel Hill to the northwest and 50 metres to the east of the vehicular entrance to the PNR Site ("the Site Entrance" —as marked on the plan annexed to this Order as Annex 2) …"

Paragraph 7: unlawful means conspiracy

16 The third type of wrong which the Injunction was designed to prevent was unlawful interference with Cuadrilla's supply chain. This was the subject of paragraph 7 of the Injunction, which prohibited persons unknown from "committing any of the following offences or unlawful acts by or with the agreement or understanding of any other person":

> "7.2 obstructing the free passage along a public highway, or the access to or from a public highway, by: (i) blocking the highway or access thereto with persons or things when done with a view to slowing down or stopping vehicular or pedestrian traffic, and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay; (ii) slow walking in front of vehicles with the object of slowing them down, and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay; (iii) climbing onto or attaching themselves to vehicles … in each case with an intention of damaging [Cuadrilla] by obstructing, impeding or interfering with the lawful activities undertaken by it or its group companies, or contractors, sub-contractors, suppliers or service providers engaged by [Cuadrilla], in connection with [Cuadrilla's] searching or boring for or getting any mineral oil or relative hydrocarbon and natural gas existing in its natural condition in strata at the PNR Site or on the PNR Land."

17 The tort underpinning this limb of the Injunction was that of conspiracy to injure by unlawful means.

18 Conspiracy is one of a group of "economic torts" which are an exception to the general rule that there is no duty in tort to avoid causing economic loss to another person unless the loss is parasitic upon some injury to person or damage to property. As explained by Lord Sumption JSC and Lord Lloyd-Jones JSC in JSC BTA Bank v Ablyazov (No 14) [2018] UKSC 19; [2018] 2 WLR 1125, para 7, the modern law of conspiracy developed in the late 19th and early 20th centuries as a basis for imposing civil liability on the organisers of strikes and other industrial action. In the form of the tort relevant for present purposes, the matters which the claimant must prove to establish liability are: (i) an unlawful act by the defendant, (ii) done with the intention of injuring the claimant, (iii) pursuant to an agreement (whether express or tacit) with one or more other persons, and (iv) which actually does injure the claimant.

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

The breaches of the Injunction

19 As required by the terms of the Injunction, extensive steps were taken to publicise it and bring it to the notice of protestors. These steps included: (i) fixing sealed copies of the Injunction in transparent envelopes to posts, gates, fences and hedges and positioning signs at no fewer than 20 conspicuous locations around the PNR Land including at the Site Entrance and at either side of the public highway in each direction from the Site Entrance advertising the existence of the Injunction; (ii) leaving a sealed copy of the Injunction at protest camps; (iii) advertising and making copies of the Injunction available online; and (iv) sending a press release and copies of the Injunction to 16 specified news outlets.

20 Despite this publicity, a number of incidents occurred in the period July to September 2018 which led Cuadrilla on 11 October 2018 to issue a committal application.

The incident on 24 July 2018

21 The first main incident occurred on 24 July 2018 and involved all three appellants. The facts alleged, which were not seriously disputed by the appellants, were that at around 7 am on the morning of that day they (and three other individuals) lay down in pairs on the road across the Site Entrance. Each person was attached to the other person in the pair by an "arm tube" device. This was done in such a way as to prevent any vehicle from entering or leaving the site. The protestors remained in place for some six and a half hours until around 1.30 pm, when they were cut out of the arm tube devices and removed by the police.

The incident on 3 August 2018

22 The second main incident occurred on 3 August 2018 and involved Ms Lawrie alone. It took place on the "PNR Access Route" (as defined in paragraph 3 of the Injunction) about 1200 metres to the west of the Site Entrance. At about 12.55 pm Ms Lawrie, along with three other people, attempted to stop a tanker lorry which was on its way to the site in order to collect rainwater. In doing so she stood in the path of the lorry, raising her arms above her head. To avoid hitting her, the lorry had to veer across the centre line of the carriageway into the opposite lane. These facts were proved by video evidence from a camera on the dashboard of the lorry cab.

The other breaches of the Injunction

23 There were three more minor incidents: (1) On 1 August 2018 Ms Lawrie trespassed on the PNR Land for approximately two minutes. (2) Also on 1 August 2018, Mr Walsh sat down on the road in front of the Site Entrance until he was forcibly removed by police officers. (3) On 22 September 2018, as a sewage tanker was attempting to enter the site, Ms Lawrie ran into its path, forcing it to stop. She then lay on the ground in front of the lorry before being helped to her feet by security staff and persuaded to move.

The findings of contempt of court

24 Although two other individuals were also named as respondents, the committal application was pursued only against the three current appellants. The application was heard in two stages. The first stage was a hearing over four days from 25 to 28 June 2019 to decide whether the appellants were guilty of contempt of court.

The legal test for contempt

25 It was common ground at that hearing that a person is guilty of contempt of court by disobeying a court order that prohibits particular conduct only if it is proved to the criminal standard of proof (that is, beyond reasonable doubt) that the person: (i) having received notice of the order did an act prohibited by it; (ii) intended to do the act; and (iii) had knowledge of all the facts which would make doing the act a breach of the order: see FW Farnsworth Ltd v Lacy [2013] EWHC 3487 (Ch) at [20]. It would not necessarily follow from proof of these facts that the person had knowingly disobeyed the order; but the judge took the sensible approach that, unless this further fact was established, it would not be appropriate to impose any penalty for the breach.

26 For reasons given in a judgment delivered on 28 June 2018, the judge found all the relevant factual allegations proved to the requisite criminal standard of proof. There is no appeal against any of his factual findings.

Knowledge of the Injunction

27 The main factual dispute at the hearing concerned the appellants' knowledge of the Injunction at the time when the incidents occurred. Although they gave evidence to the effect that they did not know of its terms, the judge rejected that evidence as inherently incredible and untruthful.

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

28 The judge explained in detail his reasons for reaching that conclusion. In the case of Ms Lawrie, the relevant evidence included her own admissions that there was a lot of discussion about the Injunction around the time that it was granted and that she was concerned about its effect on lawful protesting. As the judge observed, that evidence only made sense on the basis that she was aware of its terms. There were also photographs showing Ms Lawrie placing decorations on the fence around the site "in such close proximity to the notices summarising the effect of the [Injunction] as to make it virtually impossible for her not to have read the information in the notice unless she was deliberately choosing not to do so". In the case of Mr Walsh, the relevant evidence included social media posts that he had shared with others that referred to or summarised the main effects of the Injunction. The third appellant, Mr Wilson, accepted that he was aware of the Injunction and that it affected protests at the site entrance. There was also video evidence of Cuadrilla's security guards seeking to draw the Injunction to the attention of the appellants by providing them with copies of it, which they refused to take.

The intentions proved

29 In relation to the first main incident on 24 July 2018, in which each of the appellants lay in the road across the Site Entrance attached to another person by an arm tube device, they all gave evidence that in taking this action they intended to protest. The judge accepted this but thought it obvious from what they did, and was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, that they also intended to stop vehicles from entering or leaving the site and thereby cause inconvenience and delay to Cuadrilla. Having found on this basis that the appellants were in breach of paragraph 4 of the Injunction, he considered it unnecessary to decide whether they were also in breach of paragraph 7.

30 In relation to the second main incident which occurred on 3 August 2018, Ms Lawrie admitted that she together with others was attempting to stop the lorry. The judge found it proved beyond reasonable doubt that she was acting with the agreement or understanding of others present and with the intention of slowing down or stopping the vehicle, causing inconvenience and delay, and thereby damaging Cuadrilla by interfering with the activities undertaken at the site. He accordingly found that she was in breach of paragraph 7 of the Injunction.

31 The judge also found that the three more minor incidents (referred to at para 23 above) all involved intentional breaches of the Injunction, but he did not consider that it was in the public interest to impose any sanction for those breaches.

The committal order

32 The second stage of the committal application was a hearing held on 2 and 3 September 2019 to decide what sanctions to impose for the two principal breaches of the Injunction found proved at the earlier hearing. The judge had already made it clear that he would not impose immediate terms of imprisonment, so that the available penalties were (a) no order (except in relation to costs), (b) a fine or (c) a suspended term of imprisonment.

33 The judge was satisfied that, in relation to both incidents, the custody threshold was passed such that it was necessary to make orders for committal to prison, although their effect should be suspended. In reaching that conclusion and in fixing the length of the suspended prison terms, the judge had regard to his finding that the breaches were intentional and to the need not only to punish the appellants for their intentional disobedience of the court's order, but also to deter future breaches of the order (whether by them or others).

34 The judge recognised that the breaches were committed as part of a protest but was not persuaded that this should result in lesser penalties. The judge also had regard, by analogy, to the Sentencing Council guideline on sentencing for breach of a criminal behaviour order. This guideline identifies three levels of culpability, where level A represents a very serious or persistent breach, level B a deliberate breach falling between levels A and C, and level C a minor breach or one just short of reasonable excuse. Harm—which includes not only any harm actually caused but any risk of harm posed by the breach—is also divided into three categories. Category 1 applies where the breach causes very serious harm or distress or "demonstrates a continuing risk of serious criminal and/or anti-social behaviour". Category 3 applies where the breach causes little or no harm or distress or "demonstrates a continuing risk of minor criminal and/or anti-social behaviour". Category 2 applies to cases falling between categories 1 and 3.

35 In the case of the first incident involving all three appellants, where the Site Entrance was blocked by a "lock-on" for several hours, the judge assessed the level of culpability as falling at the lower end of level B and the harm caused together with the continuing risk of breach demonstrated as falling at the lower end of category 2. The guideline indicates that the starting point in sentencing for breach of a criminal behaviour order in category 2B is 12 weeks' custody, with a category range between a medium level community order and one year's custody. A community order is not an available sanction for contempt of court. In the circumstances the judge concluded that the appropriate penalty was a short suspended term of imprisonment, which he fixed at four weeks.

36 In relation to the second main incident, involving Ms Lawrie alone, the judge assessed the level of culpability as at the top end of level B within the guideline and the degree of harm that was at risk of being caused as in the top half of category 2. In making that assessment, he said:

> "The risk I have identified was a serious one, involving the risk of death or injury to Ms Lawrie; to the driver of the vehicle she was attempting to stop by standing in front of it in the highway; and those driving on the other side of the road into which the lorry was forced by reason of the presence of Ms Lawrie in the road. Those risks were worsened by the fact that the incident occurred during a period of heavy rain …"

The judge also found that the breach was aggravated by "the failure of Ms Lawrie to acknowledge the danger posed by her conduct, or to apologise for it, or to offer any assurance that it will not happen again".

37 The sanction imposed for this contempt of court was committal to prison for two months. As with the penalties imposed in relation to the first incident, execution of the order was suspended on condition that the Injunction is obeyed for a period of two years.

Variation of the Injunction

38 In the same judgment given on 3 September 2019 in which he decided what sanctions to impose, Judge Pelling QC also dealt with an application by the appellants to vary the Injunction, in particular by removing paragraphs 4 and 7. In making that application, the appellants relied on the decision of this court in Ineos Upstream Ltd v Persons Unknown (Friends of the Earth intervening) [2019] EWCA Civ 515; [2019] 4 WLR 100, which I will discuss shortly. For the moment I note that, while the judge on 3 September 2019 made some variations to the wording of the Injunction, he rejected the appellants' contention that the original wording was impermissibly wide or uncertain. Furthermore, none of the variations made on 3 September 2019 would, had they been incorporated in the original wording of the Injunction, have rendered the appellants' conduct not a breach.

39 The appellants applied for permission to appeal against the decision not to vary the Injunction by removing paragraphs 4 and 7. However, on 2 November 2019 the Government announced a moratorium on fracking with immediate effect. In the light of the moratorium, the claimants themselves applied on 19 November 2019 to remove paragraphs 4 and 7 of the Injunction for the future on the ground that they no longer require this protection, as Cuadrilla has ceased fracking operations on the site and will not be able to resume such operations unless and until the moratorium is lifted. On 25 November 2019 the judge granted the claimants' application. In these circumstances the appellants withdrew their appeal against the judge's previous refusal to vary the Injunction in that way, as the relief which they were seeking had been granted (albeit for different reasons from those which they were advancing).

The right to protest

40 Before I come to the grounds of the appeal against the committal order, I need to say something more about the two contextual features of this case which I mentioned at the start of this judgment. The first is the legal relevance of the fact, properly emphasised by counsel for the appellants, that the appellants' breaches of the Injunction were a form of non-violent protest against activities to which they strongly object.

41 The right to engage in public protest is an important aspect of the fundamental rights to freedom of expression and freedom of peaceful assembly which are protected by articles 10 and 11 of the Human Rights Convention. Those rights, and hence the right to protest, are not absolute; but any restriction on their exercise will be a breach of articles 10 and 11 unless the restriction (a) is prescribed by law, (b) pursues one (or more) of the legitimate aims stated in articles 10(2) and 11(2) of the Convention and (c) is "necessary in a democratic society" for the achievement of that aim. Applying the last part of this test requires the court to assess the proportionality of the interference with the aim pursued.

42 Exercise of the right to protest—for example, holding a demonstration in a public place—often results in some disruption to ordinary life and inconvenience to other citizens. That by itself does not justify restricting the exercise of the right. As Laws LJ said in Tabernacle v Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWCA Civ 23 at [43]: "Rights worth having are unruly things. Demonstrations and protests are liable to be a nuisance. They are liable to be inconvenient and tiresome, or at least perceived as such by others who are out of sympathy with them". Such side-effects of demonstrations and protests are a form of inconvenience which the state and other members of society are required to tolerate.

43 The distinction between protests which cause disruption as an inevitable side-effect and protests which are deliberately intended to cause disruption, for example by impeding activities of which the protestors disapprove, is an important one, and I will come back to it later. But at this stage I note that even forms of protest which are deliberately intended to cause disruption fall within the scope of articles 10 and 11. Restrictions on such protests may much more readily be justified, however, under articles 10(2) and 11(2) as "necessary in a democratic society" for the achievement of legitimate aims.

44 The clear and constant jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights on this point was reiterated in the judgment of the Grand Chamber in Kudrevicius v Lithuania CE:ECHR:2015:1015JUD003755305; 62 EHRR 34; 40 BHRC 114. That case concerned a demonstration by a group of farmers complaining about a fall in prices of agricultural products and seeking increases in state subsidies for the agricultural sector. As part of their protest, some farmers including the applicants used their tractors to block three main roads for approximately 48 hours causing major disruption to traffic. The applicants were convicted in the Lithuanian courts of public order offences and received suspended sentences of 60 days imprisonment. They complained to the European Court that their criminal convictions and sentences violated articles 10 and 11 of the Convention. In examining their complaints, the Grand Chamber first considered whether the case fell within the scope of article 11 and concluded that it did. The court noted (at para 97) that, on the facts of the case, "the disruption of traffic cannot be described as a side-effect of a meeting held in a public place, but rather as the result of intentional action by the farmers, who wished to attract attention to the problems in the agricultural sector and to push the government to accept their demands". The judgment continues:

> "In the court's view, although not an uncommon occurrence in the context of the exercise of freedom of assembly in modern societies, physical conduct purposely obstructing traffic and the ordinary course of life in order to seriously disrupt the activities carried out by others is not at the core of that freedom as protected by article 11 of the Convention."

Despite this, the court did not consider that the applicants' conduct was "of such a nature and degree as to remove their participation in the demonstration from the scope of protection of … article 11" (see para 98).

45 In the present case the claimants accept that the conduct of the appellants which constituted contempt of court likewise fell within the scope of articles 10 and 11 of the Human Rights Convention, even though disruption of Cuadrilla's activities was not merely a side-effect but an intended aim of the appellants' conduct. It follows that both the Injunction prohibiting this conduct and the sanctions imposed for disobeying the Injunction were restrictions on the appellants' exercise of their rights under articles 10(1) and 11(1) which could only be justified if those restrictions satisfied the requirements of articles 10(2) and 11(2) of the Convention.

The Ineos case

46 A second significant feature of this case is that the Injunction was granted not against the current appellants as named individuals but against "persons unknown". Injunctions of this kind were considered in Ineos Upstream Ltd v Persons Unknown [2019] 4 WLR 100, which forms an essential part of the backdrop to the issues raised on this appeal.

47 Like the present case, the Ineos case concerned an injunction granted on the application of a company engaged or planning to engage in "fracking" to restrain unlawful interference with its activities by protestors whom it was unable to name. In the Ineos case, however, the court was not concerned, as it is here, with breaches of such an injunction. The appeal involved a challenge to the making of an injunction against persons unknown before any allegedly unlawful interference with the claimants' activities had yet occurred. This context is important in understanding the decision.

48 The main question raised on the appeal was whether it was appropriate in principle to grant an injunction against "persons unknown". That question was decided in favour of the claimant companies. The court held that there is no conceptual or legal prohibition on suing persons unknown who are not currently in existence but will come into existence if and when they commit a threatened tort. Nor is there any such prohibition on granting a "quia timet" injunction to restrain such persons from committing a tort which has not yet been committed. None the less, Longmore LJ (with whose judgment David Richards LJ and I agreed) warned that a court should be inherently cautious about granting such injunctions against unknown persons since the reach of such an injunction is necessarily difficult to assess in advance (see para 31).

49 Longmore LJ stated the requirements necessary for the grant of an injunction of this nature "tentatively" (at para 34) in the following way:

> "(1) there must be a sufficiently real and imminent risk of a tort being committed to justify quia timet relief; (2) it is impossible to name the persons who are likely to commit the tort unless restrained; (3) it is possible to give effective notice of the injunction and for the method of such notice to be set out in the order; (4) the terms of the injunction must correspond to the threatened tort and not be so wide that they prohibit lawful conduct; (5) the terms of the injunction must be sufficiently clear and precise as to enable persons potentially affected to know what they must not do; and (6) the injunction should have clear geographical and temporal limits."

50 In the light of precedents which were not cited in the Ineos case but which have been drawn to our attention on the present appeal, I would enter a caveat in relation to the fourth of these requirements. While it is undoubtedly desirable that the terms of an injunction should correspond to the threatened tort and not be so wide that they prohibit lawful conduct, this cannot be regarded as an absolute rule. The decisions of the Court of Appeal in Hubbard v Pitt [1976] QB 142 and Burris v Azadani [1995] 1 WLR 1372 demonstrate that, although the court must be careful not to impose an injunction in wider terms than are necessary to do justice, the court is entitled to restrain conduct that is not in itself tortious or otherwise unlawful if it is satisfied that such a restriction is necessary in order to afford effective protection to the rights of the claimant in the particular case. In both those cases the injunction was granted against a named person or persons. What, if any, difference it makes in this regard that the injunction is sought against unknown persons is a question which does not need to be decided on the present appeal but which may, as I understand, arise on a pending appeal from the decision of Nicklin J in Canada Goose UK Retail Ltd v Persons Unknown [2019] EWHC 2459 (QB); [2020] 1 WLR 417 and in these circumstances I express no opinion on the point.

51 In the Ineos case the judge had proceeded on the basis that the evidence adduced by the claimants of protests against other companies engaged in fracking (including Cuadrilla) would, if accepted at trial, be sufficient to show a real and imminent threat of trespass on the claimants' land, interference with the claimants' rights of passage to and from their land and interference with their supply chain. On that basis he granted an injunction in similar—although in some respects wider and more vaguely worded—terms to the Injunction granted in the present case. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal brought by two individuals who objected to the order made on the ground that the judge's approach—which simply accepted the claimants' evidence at face value—did not adequately justify granting a quia timet injunction which might affect the exercise of the right to freedom of expression, as it did not satisfy the requirement in section 12(3) of the Human Rights Act 1998 that the applicant is "likely" to establish at trial that such an injunction should be granted. The Court of Appeal also held that the parts of the injunction seeking to restrain future acts which would amount to an actionable nuisance or a conspiracy to cause loss by unlawful means should be discharged in any event, as the relevant terms were too widely drafted and lacked the necessary degree of certainty. I will come back to one aspect of the reasoning on that point when discussing the first ground of appeal.

This appeal

52 I turn now to the issues raised on this appeal. The appellants' notice puts forward three grounds. However, Ms Brimelow QC, who now represents the appellants, did not pursue one of them. This challenged the judge's finding that Ms Lawrie was in contempt of court by trespassing on the "PNR Land" on 1 August 2018 in breach of paragraph 2 of the Injunction. As Ms Brimelow accepted, a challenge to that finding, even if successful, would provide no reason for disturbing the committal order, as the judge considered that there was no public interest in taking any further action in relation to the three minor incidents, of which the trespass incident was one, and made no order in respect of them. The order under appeal was based only on the "lock-on" at the Site Entrance by all three appellants on 24 July 2018 and Ms Lawrie's action in standing in the path of a lorry on 3 August 2018. Nothing turns, therefore, on whether or not Ms Lawrie trespassed on the "PNR Land" on 1 August 2018.

53 The two grounds of appeal pursued are that, in relation to the two incidents on which the order for committal was based: (1) the judge erred in committing the appellants under paragraphs 4 and 7 of the Injunction, as these paragraphs were insufficiently clear and certain because they included references to intention; (2) alternatively, the judge erred by imposing an inappropriate sanction (consisting of suspended orders for imprisonment) which was too harsh.

(1) Was the Injunction unclear?

54 It is a well-established principle that an injunction must be expressed in terms which are clear and certain so as to make plain what is permitted and what is prohibited: see eg Attorney General v Punch Ltd [2002] UKHL 50; [2003] 1 AC 1046, para 35. This is just as, if not even more, essential where the injunction is addressed to "persons unknown" rather than named defendants. As Longmore LJ said in the Ineos case, para 34, in stating the fifth of the requirements quoted at para 49 above: "the terms of the injunction must be sufficiently clear and precise as to enable persons potentially affected to know what they must not do".

55 A similar need for clarity and precision "to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances" forms part of the requirement in articles 10(2) and 11(2) of the Convention that any interference with the rights to freedom of expression and assembly must be "prescribed by law": see Sunday Times v United Kingdom CE:ECHR:1979:0426JUD000653874; 2 EHRR 245, para 49; Kudrevicius v Lithuania 62 EHRR 34, para 109.

The references to intention in the Injunction

56 As mentioned, the aspect of paragraphs 4 and 7 of the Injunction which the appellants contend made those terms insufficiently clear and certain to support findings of contempt was the fact that they included references to the defendant's intention. Paragraph 4.1, of which all three appellants were found to be in breach by their "lock on" at the Site Entrance on 24 July 2018, prohibited "blocking any part of the bell mouth at the Site Entrance with persons or things when done with a view to slowing down or stopping the traffic" and "with the intention of causing inconvenience or delay to the claimants". Establishing a breach of this term therefore required proof of two intentions. Paragraph 7.2(1), of which Ms Lawrie was found to have been in breach when she stood in front of a lorry on 3 August 2018, required proof of three intentions: namely, those of "slowing down or stopping vehicular or pedestrian traffic", "causing inconvenience and delay", and "damaging [Cuadrilla] by obstructing, impeding or interfering with the lawful activities undertaken by it or its group companies, or contractors …" It was also necessary to prove that the act was done with the agreement or understanding of another person.

Types of unclarity

57 There are at least three different ways in which the terms of an injunction may be unclear. One is that a term may be ambiguous, in that the words used have more than one meaning. Another is that a term may be vague in so far as there are borderline cases to which it is inherently uncertain whether the term applies. Except where quantitative measurements can be used, some degree of imprecision is inevitable. But the wording of an injunction is unacceptably vague to the extent that there is no way of telling with confidence what will count as falling within its scope and what will not. Evaluative language is often open to this objection. For example, a prohibition against "unreasonably" obstructing the highway is vague because there is room for differences of opinion about what is an unreasonable obstruction and no determinate or incontestable standard by which to decide whether particular conduct constitutes a breach. Language which does not involve a value judgment may also be unduly vague. An example would be an injunction which prohibited particular conduct within a "short" distance of a location (such as the Site Entrance in this case). Without a more precise definition, there is no way of ascertaining what distance does or does not count as "short".

58 A third way in which the terms of an injunction may lack clarity is that the language used may be too convoluted, technical or otherwise opaque to be readily understandable by the person(s) to whom the injunction is addressed. Where legal knowledge is needed to understand the effect of a term, its clarity will depend on whether the addressee of the injunction can be expected to obtain legal advice. Such an expectation may be reasonable where an injunction is granted in the course of litigation in which each party is legally represented. By contrast, in a case of the present kind where an injunction is granted against "persons unknown", it is unreasonable to impose on members of the public the cost of consulting a lawyer in order to find out what the injunction does and does not prohibit them from doing.

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

59 All these kinds of clarity (or lack of it) are relevant at the stage of deciding whether to grant an injunction and, if so, in what terms. They are also relevant where an application is made to enforce compliance or punish breach of an injunction by seeking an order for committal. In principle, people should not be at risk of being penalised for breach of a court order if they act in a way which the order does not clearly prohibit. Hence a person should not be held to be in contempt of court if it is unclear whether their conduct is covered by the terms of the order. That is so whether the term in question is unclear because it is ambiguous, vague or inaccessible.

60 It is important to note that whether a term of an order is unclear in any of these ways is dependent on context. Words which are clear enough in one factual situation may be unclear in another. This can be illustrated by reference to the ground of appeal which was abandoned. The argument advanced was that paragraph 2 of the Injunction was insufficiently clear to form the basis of a finding of contempt of court because the "PNR Land" was described by reference to a Land Registry map and such maps are, so it was said, only accurate to around one metre. Assuming (which was in issue) that there is this margin of error, the objection that the relevant term of the Injunction was insufficiently clear would have been compelling in the absence of proof that Ms Lawrie crossed the boundary of the land as it was marked on the map by more than a metre. As it was, however, the judge was satisfied from video evidence that Ms Lawrie entered on the land by much more than a metre. The alleged vagueness in the term of the Injunction was therefore immaterial.

The concept of intention

61 Of these three types of unclarity, it is the third that is said to be material in the present case. For the appellants, Ms Brimelow argued that references to intention in an injunction addressed to "persons unknown" made the terms insufficiently clear because intention is a legal concept which is difficult for a member of the public to understand. In the judgment given on 28 June 2019 in which he made findings of contempt of court, the judge referred to the maxim that a person "is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts", citing a passage from the speech of Lord Bridge of Harwich in R v Maloney [1985] AC 905, 928–929. Ms Brimelow submitted that a person with no legal knowledge or training would not understand that, even if they do not have in mind a particular consequence of their action, they will be held to intend any natural and probable consequence of it. Such a person might reasonably consider that their intention was, for example, to prevent fracking, or to protect the environment, or to protest, rather than, say, to cause inconvenience and delay to Cuadrilla, even if such inconvenience and delay was a natural or probable consequence of what they did.

62 I do not accept that the references in the terms of the Injunction to intention had any special legal meaning or were difficult for a member of the public to understand. In criminal law there has not for more than 50 years been any rule of law that persons are presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of their acts. That notion was given its quietus by section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, which provides:

> "A court or jury, in determining whether a person has committed an offence — (a) shall not be bound in law to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of those actions; but (b) shall decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances."

63 This was the point that Lord Bridge was making in the Maloney case in the passage to which Judge Pelling QC referred. The House of Lords made it clear in that case that juries should no longer, save in rare cases, be given legal directions as to what is meant by intention. Lord Bridge described it (at p 926) as the "golden rule" that, when directing a jury on intent, a judge should avoid any elaboration or paraphrase of what is meant by intent and should leave it to the jury's good sense to decide whether the person accused acted with the intention required to be guilty of a crime. Just as no elaboration of the concept of intention is required for juries, so equally its meaning does not need to be explained to members of the public to whom a court order is addressed. It is not a technical term nor one that, when used in an injunction prohibiting acts done with a specific intention, is to be understood in any special or unusual sense. It is an ordinary English word to be given its ordinary meaning and with which anyone who read the Injunction would be perfectly familiar.

64 That is not to say that proof of an intention is always straightforward. Often it causes no difficulty. A person's immediate intention may be obvious from their actions. Thus, when the appellants and three others lay across the Site Entrance on 24 July 2018 in pairs linked by arm tube devices, it was obvious that they were intending to stop vehicles from entering or leaving the site. Had that not been their intention, they would not have positioned themselves where they did. Similarly, when in the incident on 3 August 2018 Ms Lawrie stood in the road in front of a lorry, waving her arms, there could be no doubt that her intention was to cause the vehicle to stop. To determine whether less direct consequences or potential consequences of a person's actions are intended may require further knowledge of, or inference as to, their plans or goals. In so far as there is evidential uncertainty, however, a person alleged to be in contempt of court by disobeying an injunction is protected by the requirement that the relevant facts must be proved to the criminal standard of proof. Hence where the injunction prohibits an act done with a particular intention, if there is any reasonable doubt about whether the defendant acted with that intention, contempt of court will not be established.

65 I accordingly cannot accept that there is anything objectionable in principle about including a requirement of intention in an injunction. Nor do I accept that there is anything in such a requirement which is inherently unclear or which requires any legal training or knowledge to comprehend.

Dicta in the Ineos case

66 Nevertheless, I acknowledge that the appellants' argument gains some traction from a statement in the judgment of Longmore LJ in the Ineos case. One of the terms of the injunction granted by the judge at first instance in that case, like paragraph 7 of the Injunction in this case, was designed to protect the claimants from financial damage caused by an unlawful means conspiracy. In the Ineos case the term in question prohibited persons unknown from "combining together to commit the act or offence of obstructing free passage along a public highway (or access to or from a public highway) by … slow walking in front of the vehicles with the object of slowing them down and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay or … otherwise unreasonably and/or without lawful authority or excuse obstructing the highway with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay, all with the intention of damaging the claimants." The wording of this prohibition was held to be insufficiently clear, both because it contained language which was too vague ("slow walking" and "unreasonably and/or without lawful authority or excuse obstructing the highway") and because, as Longmore LJ put it, "an ordinary person exercising legitimate rights of protest is most unlikely to have any clear idea of what would constitute lawful authority or excuse": see Ineos Upstream Ltd v Persons Unknown at para 40.

67 In addition to making these points, however, Longmore LJ also agreed with a submission that one of the "problems with a quia timet order in this form" was that "it is of the essence of the tort [of conspiracy] that it must cause damage". He commented, at para 40:

> "While that cannot of itself be an objection to the grant of quia timet relief, the requirement that it cause damage can only be incorporated into the order by reference to the defendants' intention which, as Sir Andrew Morritt said in Hampshire Waste, depends on the subjective intention of the individual which is not necessarily known to the outside world (and in particular to the claimants) and is susceptible to change and, for that reason, should not be incorporated into the order."

68 Although this was not an essential part of the court's reasoning, I agreed with the judgment of Longmore LJ in the Ineos case and therefore share responsibility for these observations. However, while I continue to agree with the other reasons given for finding the form of order made by the judge in the Ineos case unclear as well as too widely drawn, with the benefit of the further scrutiny that the point has received on this appeal I now consider the concern expressed about the reference to the defendants' intention to have been misplaced.

69 It is not in fact correct, as suggested in the passage quoted above, that the requirement of the tort of conspiracy to show damage can only be incorporated into a quia timet injunction by reference to the defendants' intention. It is perfectly possible to frame a prohibition which applies only to future conduct that actually causes damage. It is, however, correct that, in order to make the terms of the injunction correspond to the tort and avoid prohibiting conduct that is lawful, it is necessary to include a requirement that the defendants' conduct was intended to cause damage to the claimant. As already discussed, there is nothing ambiguous, vague or difficult to understand about such a requirement. The only potential difficulty created by its inclusion is one of proof.

The Hampshire Waste case

70 The case of Hampshire Waste Services Ltd v Intending Trespassers upon Chineham Incinerator Site [2003] EWHC 1738 (Ch); [2004] Env LR 9, to which Longmore LJ referred, involved an application by companies which owned and operated waste incineration sites for an injunction to restrain persons from trespassing on their sites in connection with a planned day of protest by environmental protestors described as "Global Day of Action Against Incinerators". On similar occasions in the past protestors had invaded sites owned by the claimants and caused substantial irrecoverable costs.

71 The injunction was sought against defendants described in the draft order as "Persons intending to trespass and/or trespassing" on six specified sites "in connection with the 'Global Day of Action Against Incinerators' (or similarly described event) on or around 14 July 2003". Sir Andrew Morritt V-C considered that the case for granting an injunction to prevent the threatened trespass to the claimants' property was clearly made out and that, in circumstances where the claimants were unable to name any of the protestors who might be involved, it was appropriate to grant the injunction against persons unknown. He raised two points, however, about the proposed description of the defendants (see para 9). The two points were that:

> "it seems to me to be wrong that the description of the defendant should involve a legal conclusion such as is implicit in the use of the word 'trespass'. Similarly, it seems to me to be undesirable to use a description such as 'intending to trespass' because that depends on the subjective intention of the individual which is not necessarily known to the outside world and in particular the claimants, and is susceptible of change."

To address these points, the Vice-Chancellor amended the opening words of the proposed description of the defendants to refer to: "Persons entering or remaining without the consent of the claimants" on the specified sites.

72 I take the Vice-Chancellor's objection to the use of the word "trespass" to have been that trespass is a legal concept and that the class of persons affected by the injunction ought to be identified in language which does not use a legal term of art. His objection to the reference to intention was different. It was not that intention is a legal concept which might not be clear to persons notified of the injunction. It was that "the outside world and in particular the claimants" would not necessarily know whether a person did or did not have the relevant intention and also that this state of affairs was susceptible of change.

73 Although the Vice-Chancellor did not spell this out, what was particularly unsatisfactory, as it seems to me, about the proposed description was that it would have made the question whether a person was a defendant to the proceedings dependent not on anything which that person had done (with or without a specific intention) but solely on their state of mind at any given time (which might change). Thus, a person who had formed an intention of joining a protest which would involve entering on the claimants' land would fall within the scope of the injunction even if he or she had done nothing which interfered with the claimants' legal rights or which was even preparatory or gave rise to a risk of such interference. It is easy to see why the Vice-Chancellor regarded this as undesirable.

74 I do not consider that the same objection applies to a term of an injunction which prohibits doing specified acts with a specified intention. Limiting the scope of a prohibition by reference to the intention required to make the act wrongful avoids restraining conduct that is lawful. In so far as it creates difficulty of proof, that is a difficulty for the claimant and not for a person accused of breaching the injunction—for whom the need to prove the specified intention provides an additional protection. Accordingly, although the inclusion of multiple references to intention —as in paragraph 7 of the Injunction in this case—risks introducing an undesirable degree of complexity, I would reject the suggestion that there is any reason in principle why references to intention should not be incorporated into an order or that the inclusion of such references in the terms of the Injunction in the present case provided a reason not to enforce it by committal.

The width of the Injunction

75 I mentioned earlier that the appellants withdrew their appeal against the judge's decision on 3 September 2019 to refuse their application to vary the injunction, when the relief which they were seeking was granted for different reasons following the Government's moratorium on fracking. The arguments which the appellants would have made on that appeal, however, did not disappear from the picture.

76 It is no defence to an application for the committal of a defendant who has disobeyed a court order for the defendant to say that the order is not one that ought to have been made.

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

As a matter of principle, a court order takes effect when it is made and remains binding unless and until it is revoked by the court that made it or on an appeal; and for as long as the order is in effect, it is a contempt of court to disobey the order whether or not the court was right to make it in the first place: see eg M v Home Office [1992] QB 270, 298–299, Burris v Azadani [1995] 1 WLR 1372, 1381. In the present case, therefore, it is not open to the appellants to argue that they were not guilty of contempt of court because the Injunction should not have been granted or should not have been granted in terms which prohibited the acts which they chose to commit in defiance of the court's order.

77 If it were shown that the court was wrong to grant an injunction which prohibited the appellants' conduct, that would none the less be relevant to the question whether it was appropriate to punish the appellants' contempt of court by ordering their committal to prison. Although no such argument was raised in the appellants' grounds of appeal against the committal order, in the course of her oral submissions Ms Brimelow suggested that this was the case. She did so, as I understood it, by reference to the grounds on which the appellants had sought permission to appeal against the judge's refusal to remove paragraphs 4 and 7 of the Injunction (before that appeal was withdrawn). Although there was no formal application to rely on those grounds for the purpose of the appeal against the committal order, it would be unreasonable not to permit this.

78 The grounds on which the appellants argued that paragraphs 4 and 7 should not have been included in the Injunction were essentially the same, however, as the grounds on which they argued that those terms could not properly form the basis of findings of contempt of court—namely, that the terms were insufficiently clear and certain because of their references to intention. For the reasons already given, I do not consider this to be a valid objection.

79 I would add that it has not been argued—and I see no reason to think—that on the facts of this case paragraph 4 of the Injunction, as it stood when the breaches occurred, was too widely drawn. Although a similarly worded term was criticised by this court in the Ineos case, there was in that case, as I have emphasised, no previous history of interference with the claimants' rights. The injunction sought was therefore what might be called a "pure" quia timet injunction, in that it was not aimed at preventing repetition of wrongful acts which had caused harm to the claimants but at preventing such acts in circumstances where none had yet taken place. The significance which the court attached to this can be seen from para 42 of the judgment of Longmore LJ, where he said:

> "[Counsel] for the claimants submitted that the court should grant advance relief of this kind in appropriate cases in order to save time and much energy later devoted to legal proceedings after the events have happened. But it is only when events have happened which can in retrospect be seen to have been illegal that, in my view, wide ranging injunctions of the kind granted against the third and fifth defendants should be granted. The citizen's right of protest is not to be diminished by advance fear of committal except in the clearest of cases, of which trespass is perhaps the best example."

80 In the present case, by contrast, there was a well documented history of obstruction and attempts to obstruct access to and egress from Cuadrilla's site by blocking the Site Entrance and by obstructing the highway or otherwise interfering with traffic on the part of the Preston New Road defined in paragraph 3 of the Injunction as the "PNR Access Route". That history of conduct which clearly infringed the claimants' rights of free passage provided a solid basis for the prohibition in paragraph 4.

81 Paragraph 7 is a different matter. The only breach of paragraph 7 in issue on this appeal, however, is Ms Lawrie's conduct on 3 August 2018 in standing in the road in an attempt to stop a lorry which was approaching the Site Entrance and with the intention of causing inconvenience and delay to Cuadrilla. Cuadrilla had no need to rely on the tort of unlawful means conspiracy in seeking to restrain such conduct. It clearly amounted to an actionable public nuisance. As such, the prohibition in paragraph 4 could have been framed so as to prohibit such conduct. Indeed, one of the variations made to the Injunction on 3 September 2019 was an amendment to paragraph 4 to prohibit:

> "Standing, sitting, walking or lying in front of any vehicle on the carriageway with the effect of interfering with the vehicular passage along the PNR Access Route by the claimants and/or their agents, servants, contractors, sub-contractors, group companies, licensees, invitees or employees;"

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

This squarely covered conduct of the kind which occurred on 3 August 2018.

82 The word "effect" was included in the variations made on 3 September 2019 to avoid referring to intention. In my view, reference to intention should not have been removed because there is nothing unclear in such a requirement and I see no sufficient justification for framing the prohibition more widely so as to catch unintended effects. But what matters for present purposes is that the terms of the Injunction were not criticised—and it seems to me could not reasonably be criticised—as too wide in so far as they prohibited the conduct of Ms Lawrie on 3 August 2018, as they did both before and after the variations were made.

83 I am therefore satisfied that, when considering the sanctions imposed on the appellants, it cannot be said in mitigation that the acts which formed the basis of the committal order were not acts which ought to have been prohibited by the Injunction.

(2) Were the sanctions too harsh?

84 The second ground of appeal pursued by the appellants is that—on the footing that the relevant restrictions placed on their conduct by the Injunction were legally justified—the judge was nevertheless wrong to punish their breaches of the Injunction by ordering their committal to prison (albeit that execution of the order was suspended).

The standard of review on appeal

85 In deciding what sanction to impose for a contempt of court, a judge has to assess and weigh a number of different factors. The law recognises that a decision of this nature involves an exercise of judgment which is best made by the judge who deals with the case at first instance and with which an appeal court should be slow to interfere. It will generally do so only if the judge: (i) made an error of principle; (ii) took into account immaterial factors or failed to take into account material factors; or (iii) reached a decision which was outside the range of decisions reasonably open to the judge. It follows that there is limited scope for challenging on an appeal a sanction imposed for contempt of court as being excessive (or unduly lenient). If, however, the appeal court is satisfied that the decision of the lower court was wrong on one of the above grounds, it will reverse the decision and either substitute its own decision or remit the case to the judge for further consideration of sanction. See Liverpool Victoria Insurance Co Ltd v Khan [2019] EWCA 392; [2019] 1 WLR 3833, paras 44–46 and Financial Conduct Authority v McKendrick [2019] EWCA Civ 524; [2019] 4 WLR 65, paras 37–38.

86 The appellants' case that the judge's decision was wrong is put in two ways. First, it is argued that the judge made an error of principle and/or failed to take into account a material factor in treating as irrelevant the fact that, when they disobeyed the Injunction, the appellants were exercising rights of protest which are protected by the common law and by articles 10 and 11 of the Convention. Secondly, it is argued that, in having regard (as the judge did) to the guideline issued by the Sentencing Council which applies to sentencing in criminal cases for breach of a criminal behaviour order, the judge misapplied that guideline and, in consequence, reached a decision that was unduly harsh.

Sentencing protestors

87 The fact that acts of deliberate disobedience to the law were committed as part of a peaceful protest will seldom provide a defence to a criminal charge. But it is well established that it is a relevant factor in assessing culpability for the purpose of sentencing in a criminal case. On behalf of the appellants, Ms Brimelow QC emphasised the following observations of Lord Hoffmann in R v Jones (Margaret) [2006] UKHL 16; [2007] 1 AC 136, para 89:

> "My Lords, civil disobedience on conscientious grounds has a long and honourable history in this country. People who break the law to affirm their belief in the injustice of a law or government action are sometimes vindicated by history. The suffragettes are an example which comes immediately to mind. It is the mark of a civilised community that it can accommodate protests and demonstrations of this kind. But there are conventions which are generally accepted by the law-breakers on one side and the law-enforcers on the other. The protesters behave with a sense of proportion and do not cause excessive damage or inconvenience. And they vouch the sincerity of their beliefs by accepting the penalties imposed by the law. The police and prosecutors, on the other hand, behave with restraint and the magistrates impose sentences which take the conscientious motives of the protesters into account."

88 This passage was quoted with approval by Lord Burnett of Maldon CJ, giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) in R v Roberts [2019] 1 WLR 2577, the case mentioned earlier that arose from "direct action" protests at Cuadrilla's site in July 2017 by four men who climbed on top of lorries. Three of the protestors were sentenced to immediate terms of imprisonment, but on appeal those sentences were replaced by orders for their conditional discharge, having regard to the fact that they had already spent three weeks in prison before their appeals were heard. The Court of Appeal indicated that the appropriate sentence would otherwise have been a community sentence with a punitive element involving work (or perhaps a curfew). The Lord Chief Justice (at para 34) summarised the proper approach to sentencing in cases of this kind as being that:

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

> "the conscientious motives of protestors will be taken into account when they are sentenced for their offences but that there is in essence a bargain or mutual understanding operating in such cases. A sense of proportion on the part of the offenders in avoiding excessive damage or inconvenience is matched by a relatively benign approach to sentencing. When sentencing an offender, the value of the right to freedom of expression finds its voice in the approach to sentencing."

89 Ms Brimelow submitted that this approach to sentencing should have been, but was not, followed in the present case when deciding what sanction to impose for the breaches of the Injunction committed by the appellants.

Were custodial sentences wrong in principle?

90 At one point in her oral submissions Ms Brimelow sought to argue that, where a deliberate breach of a court order is committed in the course of a peaceful protest, it is wrong in principle to punish the breach by imprisonment, even if the sanction is suspended on condition that there is no further breach within a specified period. This mirrored a submission which she made when representing the protestors in the Roberts case. The submission was rejected in the Roberts case (at para 43) and I would likewise reject it as contrary to both principle and authority.

91 There is no principle which justifies treating the conscientious motives of a protestor as a licence to flout court orders with impunity from imprisonment, whatever the nature or extent of the harm intended or caused provided only that no violence is used. Court orders would become toothless if such an approach were adopted—particularly in relation to those for whom a financial penalty holds no deterrent because it cannot be enforced as they do not have funds from which to pay it. Unsurprisingly, no case law was cited in which such an approach has been endorsed. Not only, as mentioned, was it rejected in the Roberts case in the context of sentencing for criminal offences, but it is also inconsistent with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.

92 Thus, in Kudrevicius v Lithuania 62 EHRR 34 mentioned earlier, the Grand Chamber of the European Court saw nothing disproportionate in the decision to impose on the applicants a 60-day custodial sentence suspended for one year (along with some restrictions on their freedom of movement)—a sentence which the court described as "lenient" (see para 178). The Grand Chamber also referred with approval to earlier cases in which sentences of imprisonment imposed on demonstrators who intentionally caused disruption had been held not to violate articles 10 and 11 of the Convention. For example, in Barraco v France CE:ECHR:2009:0305JUD003168405; (Application No 31684/05) 5 March 2009, the applicant had taken part in a protest which involved blocking traffic on a motorway for several hours. The European Court held that his conviction and sentence to a suspended term of three months' imprisonment (together with a fine of €1,500) did not violate article 11.

93 Another case cited by the Grand Chamber in Kudrevicius that is particularly in point because it involved defiance of court orders is Steel v United Kingdom CE:ECHR:1998:0923JUD002483894; 28 EHRR 603; 5 BHRC 339. In that case the first applicant took part in a protest against a grouse shoot in which she intentionally obstructed a member of the shoot by walking in front of him as he lifted his shotgun to take aim, thus preventing him from firing. She was convicted of a public order offence, fined and ordered to be bound over to keep the peace for 12 months. Having refused to be bound over, the applicant was committed to prison for 28 days. The second applicant took part in a protest against the building of a motorway extension in which she stood under the bucket of a JCB digger in order to impede construction work. She was likewise convicted of a public order offence, fined and ordered to be bound over. She also refused to be bound over and was committed to prison for seven days. The European Court held that in each of these cases the measures taken against the protestors interfered with their rights under article 10 of the Convention but that in each case the measures were proportionate to the legitimate aims of preventing disorder, protecting the rights of others and also (in relation to their committal to prison for refusing to agree to be bound over) maintaining the authority of the judiciary.

94 The common feature of these cases, as the court observed in the Kudrevicius case, is that the disruption caused was not a side-effect of a protest held in a public place but was an intended aim of the protest. As foreshadowed earlier, this is an important distinction. It was recently underlined by a Divisional Court (Singh LJ and Farbey J) in Director of Public Prosecutions v Ziegler [2019] EWHC 71 (Admin); [2019] 2 WLR 1451, a case—like the Kudrevicius case—involving deliberate obstruction of a highway. After quoting the statement that intentional disruption of activities of others is not "at the core" of the freedom protected by article 11 of the Convention (see para 44 above), the Divisional Court identified one reason for this as being that the essence of the rights of peaceful assembly and freedom of expression is the opportunity to persuade others (see para 53 of the judgment). The court pointed out that persuasion is very different from attempting (through physical obstruction or similar conduct) to compel others to act in a way you desire.

95 Where, as in the present case, individuals not only resort to compulsion to hinder or try to stop lawful activities of others of which they disapprove, but do so in deliberate defiance of a court order, they have no reason to expect that their conscientious motives will insulate them from the sanction of imprisonment.

96 On the other hand, courts are frequently reluctant to make orders for the immediate imprisonment of protestors who engage in deliberately disruptive but non-violent forms of direct action protest for conscientious reasons. It is notable that in the Kudrevicius case and in the earlier cases there cited in which custodial sentences were held by the European Court to be a proportionate restriction on the rights of protestors, in all but one instance the sentence imposed was a suspended sentence. The exception was Steel v United Kingdom, but in that case too the protestors were not immediately sentenced to imprisonment: it was only when they refused to be bound over to keep the peace that they were sent to prison. A similar reluctance to make (or uphold) orders for immediate imprisonment is apparent in the domestic cases to which counsel for the appellants referred, including the Roberts case. As Lord Burnett CJ summed up the position in that case (at para 43): "There are no bright lines, but particular caution attaches to immediate custodial sentences." There are good reasons for this, which stem from the nature of acts which may properly be characterised as acts of civil disobedience.

Civil disobedience

97 Civil disobedience may be defined as a public, non-violent, conscientious act contrary to law, done with the aim of bringing about a change in the law or policies of the government (or possibly, though this is controversial, of private organisations): see eg John Rawls, A Theory of Justice (1971) p 364. Where these conditions are met, such acts represent a form of political protest, both in the sense that they are guided by principles of justice or social good and in the sense that they are addressed to other members of the community or those who hold power within it. The public nature of the act—in contrast to the actions of other law-breakers who generally seek to avoid detection—is a demonstration of the protestor's sincerity and willingness to accept the legal consequences of their actions. It is also essential to characterising the act as a form of political communication or address. Eschewing violence and showing some measure of moderation in the level of harm intended again signal that, although the means of protest adopted transgress the law, the protestor is engaged in a form of political action undertaken on moral grounds rather than in mere criminality.

98 It seems to me that there are at least three reasons for showing greater clemency in response to such acts of civil disobedience than in dealing with other disobedience of the law. First, by adhering to the conditions mentioned, a person who engages in acts of civil disobedience establishes a moral difference between herself and ordinary law-breakers which it is right to take into account in determining what punishment is deserved. Second, by reason of that difference and the fact that such a protestor is generally—apart from their protest activity—a law-abiding citizen, there is reason to expect that less severe punishment is necessary to deter such a person from further law-breaking. Third, part of the purpose of imposing sanctions, whether for a criminal offence or for intentional breach of an injunction, is to engage in a dialogue with the defendant so that he or she appreciates the reasons why in a democratic society it is the duty of responsible citizens to obey the law and respect the rights of others, even where the law or other people's lawful activities are contrary to the protestor's own moral convictions. Such a dialogue is more likely to be effective where authorities (including judicial authorities) show restraint in anticipation that the defendant will respond by desisting from further breaches. This is part of what I believe Lord Burnett CJ meant in the Roberts case at para 34 (quoted above) when he referred to "a bargain or mutual understanding operating in such cases".

99 These considerations explain why, in a case where an act of civil disobedience constitutes a criminal offence or contempt of a court order which is so serious that it crosses the custody threshold, it will none the less very often be appropriate to suspend the operation of the sanction on condition there is no further breach during a specified period of time. Of course, if the defendant does not comply with that condition, he or she must expect that the order for imprisonment will be implemented.

The judge's approach

100 The judge had regard to the fact that the breaches of the Injunction committed by the appellants in this case were part of a protest but did not accept that this was relevant in deciding what sanction to impose. That was an error. As I have indicated, it is clear from the case law that, even where protest takes the form of intentional disruption of the lawful activities of others, as it did here, such protest still falls within the scope of articles 10 and 11 of the Convention. Any restrictions imposed on such protestors are therefore lawful only if they satisfy the requirements set out in articles 10(2) and 11(2). That is so even where the protestors' actions involve disobeying a court order. Although—as the judge observed—the appellants' rights to freedom of expression and assembly had already been taken into account in deciding whether to make the order which they disobeyed, imposing a sanction for such disobedience involved a further and separate restriction of their rights which also required justification in accordance with articles 10(2) and 11(2) of the Convention.

101 That said, the judge was in my opinion entitled to conclude—as he made it clear that he did—that the restrictions which he imposed on the liberty of the appellants by making suspended orders for their committal to prison were in any event justified by the need to protect the rights of the claimants and to maintain the court's authority. The latter aim is specifically identified in article 10(2) as a purpose capable of justifying restrictions on the exercise of freedom of expression. It is also, as it seems to me, essential for the legitimate purpose identified in both articles 10(2) and 11(2) of preventing disorder.

Reference to the Sentencing Council guideline

102 In deciding what sanctions were appropriate, the judge approached the decision, correctly, by considering both the culpability of the appellants and the harm caused, intended or likely to be caused by their breaches of the Injunction. I see no merit in the appellants' argument that, in making this assessment, he misapplied the Sentencing Council guideline on sentencing for breach of a criminal behaviour order. In Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2019] EWHC 241 (QB) at [26], the Divisional Court thought it appropriate to have regard to that guideline in deciding what penalty to impose for contempt of court in breaching an injunction. As the court noted, however, the guideline does not apply to proceedings for committal. There is therefore no obligation on a judge to follow the guideline in such proceedings and I do not consider that, if a judge does not have regard to it, this can be said to be an error of law. The criminal sentencing guideline provides, at most, a useful comparison.

103 Caution is needed in any such comparison, however, as the maximum penalty for contempt of court is two years' imprisonment as opposed to five years for breach of a criminal behaviour order. It would be a mistake to assume that the starting points and category ranges indicated in the sentencing guideline should on that account be made the subject of a linear adjustment such that, for example, the starting point for a contempt of court that would fall in the most serious category in the guideline (category 1A) should only be of the order of ten months' custody (which is roughly 40% of the guideline starting point of two years' custody). As the Court of Appeal observed in Financial Conduct Authority v McKendrick [2019] 4 WLR 65, para 40:

> "[Counsel for the appellant] was correct to submit that the decision as to the length of sentence appropriate in a particular case must take into account that the maximum sentence is committal to prison for two years. However, because the maximum term is comparatively short, we do not think that the maximum can be reserved for the very worst sort of contempt which can be imagined. Rather, there will be a comparatively broad range of conduct which can fairly be regarded as falling within the most serious category and as therefore justifying a sentence at or near the maximum."

104 A further material difference is that, in proceedings for contempt of court, a community order is not available as a lesser alternative to the sanction of imprisonment. There may therefore be cases where, although the sentencing guideline for breach offences might suggest that a community order would be an appropriate sentence, it is necessary to punish a contempt of court by an order for imprisonment because the contempt is so serious that neither of the only alternative sanctions of a fine and/or an order for costs could be justified.

© 2020. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England & Wales

Sanction for the first incident

105 In relation to the first incident on 24 July 2018 involving all three appellants, there is no basis for saying that the judge's assessment of culpability and harm by reference to the sentencing guideline for breach offences, or his decision on sanction in the light of that assessment, was wrong on any of the grounds listed in para 85 above. The judge was right to start from the position that a deliberate breach of a court order is itself a serious matter. He was entitled, as he also did, to treat the appellants' culpability as aggravated by the element of planning involved in their use of lock-on devices and to take account of (i) the number of hours of disruption and delay caused by their conduct, (ii) evidence that the incident caused Cuadrilla additional (and irrecoverable) costs of around £1,000, and (iii) the fact that the incident only ended when police were deployed to cut through the arm lock devices and remove the appellants. It was also relevant that the appellants expressed no remorse and gave no indication that they would not commit further breaches of the Injunction. Nor were they entitled to any credit for admitting their contempt, as they declined to do so, thereby necessitating a trial at which evidence had to be called.

106 Had it not been for the fact that the appellants' actions could be regarded as acts of civil disobedience in the sense I have described, short immediate custodial terms would in my view have been warranted. As it is, it cannot be said that the judge's decision to impose suspended terms of imprisonment of four weeks was wrong in principle or outside the range of decisions reasonably open to him.

Sanction for the second incident

107 In relation to the second incident on 3 August 2018 involving Ms Lawrie alone, somewhat different considerations apply. Although Ms Lawrie's action in standing in the path of a lorry to try to stop it was also found to be a deliberate breach of the court's order, there was no evidence of planning and the incident was far shorter in duration lasting only a few seconds. In assessing the harm caused or risked by Ms Lawrie's breach of the Injunction, the judge emphasised the danger of injury or death to which her action had exposed Ms Lawrie herself, the driver of the lorry and other road-users. However, as David Richards LJ pointed out in the course of argument, in approaching the matter in this way the judge seems to have lost sight of the fact that the purpose of paragraph 7 of the Injunction, which he was punishing Ms Lawrie for disobeying, was not to protect the safety of road-users but was to protect Cuadrilla from suffering economic loss as a result of conspiracy to disrupt its supply chain by unlawful means. In assessing the seriousness of the breach, the judge should have focused on the extent to which the breach caused, or was intended to cause or risked causing, harm of the kind which the relevant term of the Injunction was intended to prevent. Had he done this, the judge would have been bound to conclude not only that no harm was actually caused but that the amount of economic loss intended or threatened by delaying a lorry on its way to collect rainwater from the site was slight.

108 The judge was, I consider, entitled to take into account as aggravating Ms Lawrie's culpability the nature of the unlawful means used and the fact that, on his findings, it amounted not merely to a public nuisance through obstruction of the highway but to an offence of causing danger to road-users contrary to section 22A of the Road Traffic Act 1988. To be guilty of an offence under that statutory provision, it is not necessary that the person concerned should have intended to cause, or realised that they were causing, danger to life or limb, and the judge made no such finding in relation to Ms Lawrie. It is sufficient that it would be obvious to a reasonable person that their action would be dangerous—a matter of which the judge was clearly satisfied on the evidence.

109 Ms Lawrie was not prosecuted, however, and the judge was not sentencing her for a criminal offence under the Road Traffic Act. In the circumstances, giving all due weight to the nature of the unlawful means used, the fact that this was Ms Lawrie's second deliberate breach of the Injunction and her complete lack of contrition, I do not consider that the term of imprisonment of two months which the judge imposed was justified. In my judgment, although the judge was right to conclude that the custody threshold was crossed, the appropriate penalty for this contempt of court was the same as that imposed for the earlier contempt committed by all three appellants—that is, a suspended term of imprisonment of four weeks.

Conclusion

110 For these reasons, I would vary the committal order made by Judge Pelling QC on 3 September 2019 by substituting for the period of imprisonment of two months in paragraph 2 of the order a period of four weeks. In all other respects I would dismiss the appeal.

DAVID RICHARDS LJ

111 I agree.

UNDERHILL LJ

112 I agree with Leggatt LJ, for the reasons which he gives, that this appeal should be dismissed save in the one respect which he identifies. The courts attach great weight to the right of peaceful protest, even where this causes disruption to others; but it is also important for the rule of law that deliberate breaches of court orders attract a real penalty, and I can see nothing wrong in principle in the judge's conclusion that the appellants' conduct here merited a custodial sentence, albeit suspended.

C

The defendants were charged with obstructing the highway, contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980[1], by causing a road to be closed during a protest against an arms fair that was taking place at a conference centre nearby. The defendants had obstructed the highway for approximately 90 minutes by lying in the middle of the approach road to the conference centre and attaching themselves to two lock boxes with pipes sticking out from either side, making it difficult for police to remove them from the highway. The defendants accepted that their actions had caused an obstruction on the highway, but contended that they had not acted "without lawful . . . excuse" within the meaning of section 137(1), particularly in the light of their rights to freedom of expression and peaceful assembly under articles 10 and 11 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[2]. The district judge acquitted the defendants of all charges, finding that the prosecution had failed to prove that the defendants' actions had been unreasonable and therefore without lawful excuse. The prosecution appealed by way of case stated, pursuant to section 111 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980[3]. The Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division allowed the appeal, holding that the district judge's assessment of proportionality had been wrong. The defendants appealed. It was common ground on the appeal that the availability of the defence of lawful excuse depended on the proportionality of any interference with the defendants' rights under articles 10 or 11.

A prevented them, or was capable of preventing them, from passing along the highway; and that whether or not the protesters had a lawful excuse would depend on (per Lady Arden, Lord Hamblen and Lord Stephens JJSC) whether the protesters' convictions for offences under section 137(1) were justified restrictions on their Convention rights or (per Lord Hodge DPSC and Lord Sales JSC) whether the police response in seeking to remove the obstruction involved the exercise of their powers in a proportionate manner (post, paras 63–70, 94, 99, 121, 154).

B (2) (Lord Hodge DPSC and Lord Sales JSC dissenting) that, on an appeal by way of case stated under section 111 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, the test to be applied by the appellate court to an assessment of the decision of the trial court in respect of a defence of lawful excuse under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 when Convention rights were engaged was the same as that applicable generally to appeals on questions of law in a case stated, namely that an appeal would be allowed where there was an error of law material to the decision reached which was C apparent on the face of the case stated or if the decision was one which no reasonable court, properly instructed as to the relevant law, could have reached on the facts found; that, in accordance with that test, where the defence of lawful excuse depended upon an assessment of proportionality, an appeal would lie if there had been an error or flaw in the court's reasoning on the face of the case stated which undermined the cogency of its conclusion on proportionality; that such assessment fell to be made on the basis of the primary and secondary findings set out D in the case stated, unless there was no evidence for them or they were findings which no reasonable tribunal could have reached; and that, therefore, the Divisional Court in the present case had applied an incorrect test by asking itself whether the district judge's assessment of proportionality had been wrong (post, paras 42–45, 49–54, 99, 106–108).

E (3) (Lord Hodge DPSC and Lord Sales JSC dissenting in part, but agreeing in allowing the appeal) that there had been no error or flaw in the district judge's reasoning on the face of the case stated such as as to undermine the cogency of his conclusion on proportionality; that, in particular, he had not erred in considering as relevant factors the facts that the defendants' actions (a) had been entirely peaceful, (b) had not given rise either directly or indirectly to any form of disorder, (c) had not involved the commission of any other criminal offence, (d) had been aimed only at F obstructing vehicles headed to the arms fair, (e) had related to a matter of general concern, namely the legitimacy of the arms fair, (f) had been limited in duration, (g) had not given rise to any complaint by anyone other than the police and (h) had stemmed from the defendants' long-standing commitment to opposing the arms trade; and that, accordingly, the convictions should be set aside and the dismissal of the charges against the defendants restored (post, paras 71–78, 80–88, 99, 109–113, 115–118).

D APPEAL from the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division

On 7 February 2018, following a trial on 1 and 2 February 2018, District Judge Hamilton, sitting at Stratford Magistrates' Court, acquitted the defendants, Nora Ziegler, Henrietta Cullinan, Joanna Frew and Christopher Cole, of the charge of obstructing the highway, contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980. By a case stated that was served on the defendants on E 20 March 2018, the prosecution appealed. By a judgment dated 22 January 2019 the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (Singh LJ and Farbey J) [2019] EWHC 71 (Admin); [2020] QB 253 allowed the appeal.

With permission of the Supreme Court (Lord Kerr of Tonaghmore, Lord Hodge and Lady Arden JJSC) granted on 3 December 2019, the defendants appealed.

The issues in the appeal, as stated in the parties' agreed statement of facts F and issues, were: (1) What was the test to be applied by an appellate court to an assessment of the decision of the trial court in respect of a statutory defence of "lawful excuse" when Convention rights were engaged in a criminal matter? (2) Was deliberate physically obstructive conduct by protesters capable of constituting a lawful excuse for the purposes of section 137 of the Highways Act 1980, where the impact of the deliberate G obstruction on other highway users was more than de minimis, and prevented them, or was capable of preventing them, from passing along the highway?

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Hamblen and Lord Stephens JJSC, post, paras 1–6.

H Henry Blaxland QC, Blinne Ní Ghrálaigh and Owen Greenhall (instructed by Hodge Jones & Allen LLP) for the defendants.

As far back as 1965 the courts explained "lawful authority or excuse" as encompassing the concept of "reasonableness": see Nagy v Weston [1965] 1 WLR 280. In respect of the offence of obstruction of the highway contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980, reasonableness is a question of fact to be assessed having regard to all the prevailing circumstances, including the duration of the obstruction, its location and purpose and whether it did in fact cause an actual, as opposed to a potential, obstruction. A defendant will not be guilty of deliberately obstructing the highway unless it is proved that such obstruction was not reasonable.

Even before the coming into force of the Human Rights Act 1998, it was possible for protesters engaged in an obstructive protest on the highway to argue successfully that they were exercising a lawful right to protest and therefore had a "lawful" right to protest.

The Convention rights which are in issue in this appeal are the rights contained in article 10 (concerning the right to freedom of expression) and article 11 (concerning the right to freedom of peaceful assembly) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Those two articles and the parallel rights and obligations arising under common law must be considered when assessing the reasonableness of any obstruction of the highway and the proportionality of any interference with a right to protest.

The assessment of whether an obstruction of the highway was reasonable in the context of articles 10 and 11 is inevitably a fact-sensitive one that will depend on factors including the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance to protesters of the precise protest location, the duration of the protest, and the extent of the actual interference caused to the rights of others: see City of London Corpn v Samede [2012] PTSR 1624.

The actions of the defendants in the present case were no more than symbolic. They could not have prevented arms being delivered to the arms fair, nor could they have prevented the arms fair taking place. Their protest was aimed at raising awareness of their cause. There was no evidence led by the prosecution that the protest caused disruption to traffic, or to the venue where the arms fair was being held, or to other people. It was entirely speculative whether there was obstructive conduct on the part of the protesters. There was evidence of potential interference but not of actual interference. There was no material which showed to the criminal standard that traffic was disrupted.

[Reference was made to Kudrevičius v Lithuania (2015) 62 EHRR 34.]

Even deliberate interference with the activities of others can fall within the protection of article 11. It must be shown by the prosecution that there was interference with the rights of others. Article 11 must be construed in a way which does not limit free speech and peaceful assembly. The defendants' intention was to cause some disruption but it did not take them outside article 11.

The trial judge's decision was impeccable and contained no legal error. The Divisional Court failed to accord due weight to the trial judge's findings, contrary to the need for appellate caution in relation to both findings of fact and value judgments. The Divisional Court substituted its own view of the evidence for that of the trial judge despite the fact it had not seen the live evidence and the video footage of the protest which was the material on which the trial judge had assessed the nature of the protest and the disruption it caused.

Where a statutory defence such as that arising under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 encompasses the engagement of one or more

A Convention rights, the assessment of whether the prosecution has disproved that a defendant's use of the highway was reasonable constitutes an evaluative assessment within the province of the tribunal of fact. Therefore the approach to be taken by an appellate court is not simply to consider whether in its view the conclusion of the court below was "wrong", but rather whether that conclusion was reached either as a result of an identifiable flaw in the court's logic or reasoning or whether it was a B conclusion which no properly directed tribunal could have reached. The Divisional Court fell into error in determining otherwise.

John McGuinness QC (instructed by Crown Prosecution Service, Appeals and Review Unit) for the prosecution.

The Divisional Court did not conclude as a matter of law that, in a prosecution under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980, findings of fact of C a complete obstruction of the highway for a significant period of time can never constitute a "lawful . . . excuse" for wilful obstruction within the meaning of section 137(1) of the Highways Act 1980. The Divisional Court held that those facts were "highly relevant" and "highly significant" to the assessment of proportionality in this case and concluded that the trial judge had given insufficient consideration to them in striking a fair balance D between the defendants' Convention rights and the rights and interests of others.

The essential facts can be ascertained from the case stated. It was clear that there was a deliberate or "wilful" obstruction of the highway which was planned rather than spontaneous. Its specific purpose was disruption of the traffic to the venue at which the arms fair was being held. It was aimed at a particular type of traffic which was delivering material to the arms fair. E The disruption lasted 90 minutes, which was a period of some length in the circumstances. The defendants used apparatus which was hard to disassemble in order to lock themselves together. They refused to unlock themselves and it can be inferred that they knew there would be a delay in removing them from the highway because police removal experts and specialist cutting equipment were needed. The reality was that the defendants knew they would remain on the road until the police were able, F with difficulty, to remove them.

In essence the primary facts were not in issue. But whether the facts as found did or may have constituted a lawful excuse called for a value judgment by the trial judge: see Norwood v Director of Public Prosecutions [2003] EWHC 1564 (Admin). The tribunal of fact was dealing with the balancing act.

G The decision depended on the proportionality between the offence and the defendants' Convention rights. The Divisional Court concluded that the trial judge had erred in its assessment of proportionality and had not struck the fair balance necessary in that assessment.

On an appeal by way of case stated the High Court has a very wide discretion: see section 28A of the Senior Courts Act 1981. In the fact-specific circumstances of this case, the Divisional Court's review did accord due H weight to the assessment made by the trial judge, and correctly concluded that it was wrong.

Blaxland QC replied.

The court took time for consideration.

25 June 2021. The following judgments were handed down. A

LORD HAMBLEN and LORD STEPHENS JJSC

1. Introduction

1 In September 2017, the biennial Defence and Security International ("DSEI") arms fair was held at the Excel Centre in East London. In the B days before the opening of the fair equipment and other items were being delivered to the Excel Centre. The appellants were strongly opposed to the arms trade and to the fair and on Tuesday, 5 September 2017 they took action which was intended both to draw attention to what was occurring at the fair and also to disrupt deliveries to the Excel Centre.

2 The action taken consisted of lying down in the middle of one side of C the dual carriageway of an approach road leading to the Excel Centre (the side for traffic heading to it). The appellants attached themselves to two lock boxes with pipes sticking out from either side. Each appellant inserted one arm into a pipe and locked themselves to a bar centred in the middle of one of the boxes.

3 There was a sizeable police presence at the location in anticipation D of demonstrations. Police officers approached the appellants almost immediately and went through the "five-stage process" to try and persuade them to remove themselves voluntarily from the road. When the appellants failed to respond to the process they were arrested. It took, however, approximately 90 minutes to remove them from the road. This was because the boxes were constructed in such a fashion that was intentionally designed to make them hard to disassemble. E

4 The appellants were charged with wilful obstruction of a highway contrary to section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 ("the 1980 Act"). On 1–2 February 2018, they were tried before District Judge Hamilton at Stratford Magistrates' Court. The district judge dismissed the charges, handing down his written judgment on 7 February 2018. Having regard to the appellants' right to freedom of expression under article 10 of the F European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("ECHR") and their right to freedom of peaceful assembly under article 11 ECHR, the district judge found that "on the specific facts of these particular cases the prosecution failed to prove to the requisite standard that the defendants' limited, targeted and peaceful action, which involved an obstruction of the highway, was unreasonable". G

5 The respondent appealed by way of case stated to the Divisional Court, Singh LJ and Farbey J. Following a hearing on 29 November 2018, the Divisional Court handed down judgment on 22 January 2019, allowing the appeal and directing that convictions be entered and that the cases be remitted for sentencing: [2020] QB 253. On 21 February 2019, the appellants were sentenced to conditional discharges of 12 months.

6 On 8 March 2019, the Divisional Court dismissed the appellants' H application for permission to appeal to the Supreme Court, but certified two points of law of general public importance. On 3 December 2019, a panel of the Supreme Court (Lord Kerr of Tonaghmore, Lord Hodge and Lady Arden JJSC) granted permission to appeal.

A 7 The parties agreed in the statement of facts and issues that the issues in the appeal, as certified by the Divisional Court as points of law of general public importance, are:

(1) What is the test to be applied by an appellate court to an assessment of the decision of the trial court in respect of a statutory defence of "lawful excuse" when Convention rights are engaged in a criminal matter?

B (2) Is deliberate physically obstructive conduct by protesters capable of constituting a lawful excuse for the purposes of section 137 of the 1980 Act, where the impact of the deliberate obstruction on other highway users is more than de minimis, and prevents them, or is capable of preventing them, from passing along the highway?

2. The legal background

C 8 Section 137 of the 1980 Act provides:

> "137 Penalty for wilful obstruction
> "(1) If a person, without lawful authority or excuse, in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway he is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale."

D 9 In Nagy v Weston [1965] 1 WLR 280 it was held by the Divisional Court that "lawful excuse" encompasses "reasonableness". Lord Parker CJ said at p 284 that these are "really the same ground" and that:

> E "there must be proof that the use in question was an unreasonable use. Whether or not the user amounting to an obstruction is or is not an unreasonable use of the highway is a question of fact. It depends upon all the circumstances, including the length of time the obstruction continues, the place where it occurs, the purpose for which it is done, and of course whether it does in fact cause an actual obstruction as opposed to a potential obstruction."

10 In cases of obstruction where ECHR rights are engaged, the case law preceding the enactment of the Human Rights Act 1998 ("the HRA") needs to be read in the light of the HRA.

F 11 Section 3(1) of the HRA provides: "So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights."

12 Section 6 of the HRA makes it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with Convention rights. The courts are public authorities for this purpose (section 6(3)(a)), as are the police.

G 13 The Convention rights are set out in Schedule 1 to the HRA 1998. The rights relevant to this appeal are those under article 10 ECHR, the right to freedom of expression, and article 11 ECHR, the right to freedom of peaceful assembly.

14 Article 10 ECHR materially provides:

> H "1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers . . .
> "2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary."

A

15 Article 11 ECHR materially provides:

"1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly . . .

"2. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

C

16 In the present case the Divisional Court explained how section 137(1) of the 1980 Act can be interpreted compatibly with the rights in articles 10 and 11 ECHR in cases where, as was common ground in this case, the availability of the statutory defence depends on the proportionality assessment to be made. It stated as follows:

"62. The way in which the two provisions can be read together harmoniously is that, in circumstances where there would be a breach of articles 10 or 11, such that an interference would be unlawful under section 6(1) of the HRA, a person will by definition have 'lawful excuse'. Conversely, if on the facts there is or would be no violation of the Convention rights, the person will not have the relevant lawful excuse and will be guilty (subject to any other possible defences) of the offence in section 137(1).

E

63. That then calls for the usual enquiry which needs to be conducted under the HRA. It requires consideration of the following questions:

"(1) Is what the defendant did in exercise of one of the rights in articles 10 or 11?

"(2) If so, is there an interference by a public authority with that right?

F

"(3) If there is an interference, is it 'prescribed by law'?

"(4) If so, is the interference in pursuit of a legitimate aim as set out in paragraph 2 of article 10 or article 11, for example the protection of the rights of others?

"(5) If so, is the interference 'necessary in a democratic society' to achieve that legitimate aim?

G

"64. That last question will in turn require consideration of the well-known set of sub-questions which arise in order to assess whether an interference is proportionate:

"(1) Is the aim sufficiently important to justify interference with a fundamental right?

"(2) Is there a rational connection between the means chosen and the aim in view?

H

"(3) Are there less restrictive alternative means available to achieve that aim?

"(4) Is there a fair balance between the rights of the individual and the general interest of the community, including the rights of others?

© 2022 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A "65. In practice, in cases of this kind, we anticipate that it will be the last of those questions which will be of crucial importance: a fair balance must be struck between the different rights and interests at stake. This is inherently a fact-specific enquiry."

17 Guidance as to the limits to the right of lawful assembly and protest on the highway is provided in the Court of Appeal decision in City of B London Corpn v Samede [2012] PTSR 1624, a case involving a claim for possession and an injunction in relation to a protest camp set up in the churchyard of St Paul's Cathedral. Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury MR gave the judgment of the court, stating as follows at paras 39–41:

"39. As the judge recognised, the answer to the question which he identified at the start of his judgment [the limits to the right of lawful C assembly and protest on the highway] is inevitably fact sensitive, and will normally depend on a number of factors. In our view, those factors include (but are not limited to) the extent to which the continuation of the protest would breach domestic law, the importance of the precise location to the protesters, the duration of the protest, the degree to which the protesters occupy the land, and the extent of the actual interference the protest causes to the rights of others, including the property rights of D the owners of the land, and the rights of any members of the public.

"40. The defendants argue that the importance of the issues with which the Occupy Movement is concerned is also of considerable relevance. That raises a potentially controversial point, because as the judge said, at para 155: 'it is not for the court to venture views of its own on the substance of the protest itself, or to gauge how effective it has been in E bringing the protestors' views to the fore. The Convention rights in play are neither strengthened nor weakened by a subjective response to the aims of the protest itself or by the level of support it seems to command . . . the court cannot—indeed, must not—attempt to adjudicate on the merits of the protest. To do that would go against the very spirit of articles 10 and 11 of the Convention . . . the right to protest is the right to protest right or F wrong, misguidedly or obviously correctly, for morally dubious aims or for aims that are wholly virtuous.'

"41. Having said that, we accept that it can be appropriate to take into account the general character of the views whose expression the Convention is being invoked to protect. For instance, political and economic views are at the top end of the scale, and pornography and vapid tittle-tattle is towards the bottom. In this case the judge accepted that the G topics of concern to the Occupy Movement were 'of very great political importance': para 155. In our view, that was something which could fairly be taken into account. However, it cannot be a factor which trumps all others, and indeed it is unlikely to be a particularly weighty factor: otherwise judges would find themselves according greater protection to views which they think important, or with which they agree. As the Strasbourg court said in Kuznetsov v Russia (Application No 10877/04) H (unreported) 23 October 2008, para 45: 'any measures interfering with the freedom of assembly and expression other than in cases of incitement to violence or rejection of democratic principles—however shocking and unacceptable certain views or words used may appear to the authorities—do a disservice to democracy and often even endanger it. In a democratic society based on the rule of law, the ideas which challenge the existing order must be afforded a proper opportunity of expression through the exercise of the right of assembly as well as by other lawful means . . .' The judge took into account the fact that the defendants were expressing views on very important issues, views which many would see as being of considerable breadth, depth and relevance, and that the defendants strongly believed in the views they were expressing. Any further analysis of those views and issues would have been unhelpful, indeed inappropriate."

© 2022 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

3. The case stated

18 The outline facts as found in the case stated have been set out in the Introduction. The district judge's findings followed a trial in which almost all of the prosecution case was in the form of admissions and agreed statements. Oral evidence about what occurred was given by one police officer and police body-worn video footage was also shown.

19 All the appellants gave evidence of their long-standing opposition to the arms trade and of their belief that there was evidence of illegal activity taking place at the DSEI arms fair, which the Government had failed to take any effective action to prevent. The district judge found at para 16 of the case stated that:

> "All . . . defendants described their action as 'carefully targeted' and aimed at disrupting traffic headed for the DSEI arms fair. Most but not all of the defendants accepted that their actions may have caused disruption to traffic that was not headed to the DSEI arms fair. Conversely it was not in dispute that not all access routes to the DSEI arms fair were blocked by the defendants' actions and it would have been possible for a vehicle headed to the DSEI arms fair but blocked by the actions to have turned around and followed an alternative route."

20 The district judge identified the issue for decision at para 37 of the case stated, as being:

> "whether the prosecution had proved that the demonstrations in these two particular cases were of a nature such that they lost the protections afforded by articles 10 and 11 and were consequently unreasonable obstructions of the highway."

21 He recognised that this required an assessment of the proportionality of the interference with the appellants' Convention rights, in relation to which he took into account the following points (at para 38 of the case stated):

> "(a) The actions were entirely peaceful—they were the very epitome of a peaceful protests [sic].
> "(b) The defendants' actions did not give rise either directly or indirectly to any form of disorder.
> "(c) The defendants' behavior [sic] did not involve the commission of any criminal offence beyond the alleged offence of obstruction of the highway which was the very essence of the defendants' protest. There was no disorder, no obstruction of or assault on police officers and no abuse offered.

© 2022 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A "(d) The defendants' actions were carefully targeted and were aimed only at obstructing vehicles headed to the DSEI arms fair . . . I did hear some evidence that the road in question may have been used, at the time, by vehicles other than those heading to the arms fair, but that evidence was speculative and was not particularly clear or compelling. I did not find it necessary to make any finding of fact as to whether 'non-DSEI traffic' was or was not in fact obstructed since the authorities cited B above appeared to envisage 'reasonable' obstructions causing some inconvenience to the 'general public' rather than only to the particular subject of a demonstration . . .

"(e) The action clearly related to a 'matter of general concern' . . . namely the legitimacy of the arms fair and whether it involved the marketing and sale of potentially unlawful items (e g those designed for C torture or unlawful restraint) or the sale of weaponry to regimes that were then using them against civilian populations.

"(f) The action was limited in duration. I considered that it was arguable that the obstruction for which the defendants were responsible only occurred between the time of their arrival and the time of their arrests—which in both cases was a matter of minutes. I considered this D since, at the point when they were arrested the defendants were no longer 'free agents' but were in the custody of their respective arresting officers and I thought that this may well have an impact on the issue of 'wilfulness' which is an essential element of this particular offence. The prosecution in both cases urged me to take the time of the obstruction as the time between arrival and the time when the police were able to move the defendants out of the road or from below the bridge. Ultimately, I did E not find it necessary to make a clear determination on this point as even on the Crown's interpretation the obstruction in Ziegler lasted about 90–100 minutes . . .

"(g) I heard no evidence that anyone had actually submitted a complaint about the defendants' action or the blocking of the road. The police's response appears to have been entirely on their own F initiative.

"(h) Lastly, although compared to the other points this is a relatively minor issue, I note the long-standing commitment to opposing the arms trade that all four defendants demonstrated. For most of them this stemmed, at least in part, from their Christian faith. They had also all been involved in other entirely peaceful activities aimed at trying to halt the DSEI arms fair. This was not a group of people who randomly chose G to attend this event hoping to cause trouble."

22 The district judge's conclusion at para 40 of the case stated was that on these facts the prosecution had failed to prove to the requisite standard that the obstruction of the highway was unreasonable and he therefore dismissed the charges. The question for the High Court was expressed at para 41 of the case stated as follows:

H "The question for the High Court therefore is whether I was correct to have dismissed the case against the defendants in these circumstances. The point of law for the decision of the High Court, is whether, as a matter of law, I was entitled to reach the conclusions I did in these particular cases."

4. The decision of the Divisional Court

23 It was common ground between the parties prior to the hearing of the appeal that the appropriate appellate test on an appeal by way of case stated was whether the district judge had reached a decision which it was not reasonably open to him to reach. That is the conventional test on an appeal by way of case stated, as applied in many Divisional Court decisions.

24 At the hearing of the appeal the court suggested that in cases involving an assessment of proportionality the applicable approach should be that set out by Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC in In re B (A Child) (Care Proceedings: Threshold Criteria) [2013] 1 WLR 1911, namely whether the judge's conclusion on proportionality was wrong. As Lord Neuberger PSC stated at paras 91–92:

> "91. That conclusion leaves open the standard which an appellate court should apply when determining whether the trial judge was entitled to reach his conclusion on proportionality, once the appellate court is satisfied that the conclusion was based on justifiable primary facts and assessments. In my view, an appellate court should not interfere with the trial judge's conclusion on proportionality in such a case, unless it decides that that conclusion was wrong. I do not agree with the view that the appellate court has to consider that judge's conclusion was 'plainly' wrong on the issue of proportionality before it can be varied or reversed. As Lord Wilson JSC says in para 44, either 'plainly' adds nothing, in which case it should be abandoned as it will cause confusion, or it means that an appellate court cannot vary or reverse a judge's conclusion on proportionality of [sic] it considers it to have been 'merely' wrong. Whatever view the Strasbourg court may take of such a notion, I cannot accept it, as it appears to me to undermine the role of judges in the field of human rights.
> "92. I appreciate that the attachment of adverbs to 'wrong' was impliedly approved by Lord Fraser in the passage cited from G v G (Minors: Custody Appeal) [1985] 1 WLR 647, 652, by Lord Wilson JSC at para 38, and has something of a pedigree: see e g per Ward LJ in Assicurazioni [2003] 1 WLR 577, para 195 (although aspects of his approach have been disapproved: see Datec [2007] 1 WLR 1325, para 46). However, at least where Convention questions such as proportionality are being considered on an appeal, I consider that, if after reviewing the trial judge's decision, an appeal court considers that he was wrong, then the appeal should be allowed. Thus, a finding that he was wrong is a sufficient condition for allowing an appeal against the trial judge's conclusion on proportionality, and, indeed, it is a necessary condition (save, conceivably, in very rare cases)."

25 In re B was a family law case but the Divisional Court noted that the test had been applied in other contexts, and in particular in extradition cases—see Love v Government of the United States of America [2018] 1 WLR 2889. It concluded that it should also be applied in the criminal law context, stating as follows at para 103:

> "We can see no principled basis for confining the approach in In re B to family law cases or not applying it to the criminal context. This is because the issue of principle discussed by Lord Neuberger PSC in that case related to the approach to be taken by an appellate court to the

A assessment by a lower court or tribunal of proportionality under the HRA. That is a general question of principle and does not arise only in a particular field of law."

26 Applying that test to the facts as found, the Divisional Court held that the district judge's assessment of proportionality was wrong "because (i) he took into account certain considerations which were irrelevant; B and (ii) the overall conclusion was one that was not sustainable on the undisputed facts before him, in particular that the carriageway to the Excel Centre was completely blocked and that this was so for significant periods of time, between approximately 80 and 100 minutes" (para 129).

27 Of the factors listed at paras 38(a) to (h) of the case stated as cited in para 21 above, the Divisional Court considered those set out at paras 38(a), C (b), (c), and (g) to be of little or no relevance and that at para 38(h) to be irrelevant. It disagreed with the district judge's conclusion at para 38(f) that an obstruction of the highway for 90–100 minutes was of "limited duration". The Divisional Court considered that to be a "significant period of time". Its core criticism was of para 38(d), in relation to which it stated as follows at para 112:

D "At para 38(d) the district judge said that the defendants' actions were carefully targeted and were aimed only at obstructing vehicles headed to the DSEI arms fair. However, the fact is that the ability of other members of the public to go about their lawful business, in particular by passing along the highway to and from the Excel Centre was completely obstructed. In our view, that is highly relevant in any assessment of proportionality. This is not a case where, as commonly occurs, some E part of the highway (which of course includes the pavement, where pedestrians may walk) is temporarily obstructed by virtue of the fact that protestors are located there. That is a common feature of life in a modern democratic society. For example, courts are well used to such protests taking place on the highway outside their own precincts. However, there is a fundamental difference between that situation, where it may be said F (depending on the facts) that a 'fair balance' is being struck between the different rights and interests at stake, and the present cases. In these two cases the highway was completely obstructed and some members of the public were completely prevented from doing what they had the lawful right to do, namely use the highway for passage to get to the Excel Centre and this occurred for a significant period of time." (Emphasis added.)

G 28 The Divisional Court explained at para 117 that the "fundamental reason" why it considered the district judge's assessment of proportionality to be wrong was that:

"there was no 'fair balance' struck in these cases between the rights of the individuals to protest and the general interest of the community, including the rights of other members of the public to pass along the H highway. Rather the ability of other members of the public to go about their lawful business was completely prevented by the physical conduct of these defendants for a significant period of time. That did not strike a fair balance between the different rights and interests at stake." (Emphasis added.)

5 What is the test to be applied by an appellate court to an assessment of the decision of the trial court in respect of a statutory defence of 'lawful excuse' when Convention rights are engaged in a criminal matter?

The conventional approach

29 As indicated above, the conventional approach of the Divisional Court to appeals by way of case stated in criminal proceedings is to apply an appellate test of whether the court's conclusion was one which was reasonably open to it—i e is not Wednesbury irrational or perverse (see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn [1948] 1 KB 223). This is reflected in a number of decisions of the Divisional Court, including cases involving issues of proportionality.

30 Oladimeji v Director of Public Prosecutions [2006] EWHC 1199 (Admin) concerned an appeal by way of case stated from the decision of magistrates to reject a "reasonable excuse" defence to an offence of failing to provide a specimen of breath when required to do so, contrary to section 7(6) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. In dismissing the appeal, Keene LJ at para 22 identified the relevant issue as being as follows:

> "the real issue is whether the justices were entitled on the evidence and the facts they found to conclude that the appellant had no reasonable excuse for his failure. It seems to me that they were. In the light of the facts to which I have referred, their conclusion was not perverse. It was within the range of conclusions properly open to them."

31 H v Director of Public Prosecutions [2007] EWHC 2192 (Admin) concerned an appeal by way of case stated from a district judge's decision to admit identification evidence notwithstanding a breach of Code D of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 ("PACE"). At para 19 Auld LJ stated the proper approach on such an appeal to be as follows:

> "Finally, I should note the now well established approach of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) to section 78 cases, when invited to consider the trial judge's exercise of judgment as to fairness, only to interfere with the judge's ruling if it is Wednesbury irrational or perverse. In my view, this court should adopt the very same approach on appeals to it by way of case stated on a point of law, for on such a point, anything falling short of Wednesbury irrationality will not do."

32 More recently, in Garry v Crown Prosecution Service [2019] 1 WLR 3630 the issue on the appeal was the operation of the "reasonable excuse" defence to the offence of carrying an offensive weapon contrary to section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953. Rafferty LJ followed the approach of Auld LJ in H v Director of Public Prosecutions as to the appropriate standard of review, stating at para 25 as follows:

> "On appeals by way of case stated on a point of law this court adopts the same approach as does the Court of Appeal to a trial judge's exercise of judgment, interfering with the judge's ruling only if it be Wednesbury irrational or perverse . . . : H v Director of Public Prosecutions [2007] EWHC 2192 (Admin). The ruling in this case was not Wednesbury irrational let alone perverse."

33 There have been a number of examples of appeals by way of case stated in cases involving Convention rights and issues of proportionality in

A which the Divisional Court has stated the applicable test to be whether the conclusion of the court below was one which was reasonably open to it—see, for example, Norwood v Director of Public Prosecutions [2003] EWHC 1564 (Admin) at [40] (Auld LJ) (article 10 ECHR); Hammond v Director of Public Prosecutions (2004) 168 JP 601, para 33 (May LJ) (articles 9 and 10 ECHR), and Gough v Director of Public Prosecutions (2013) 177 JP 669, para 21 (Sir Brian Leveson P) (article 10 ECHR).

B 34 Abdul v Director of Public Prosecutions [2011] HRLR 16 was an appeal by way of case stated from a district judge's decision that a prosecution for an offence under section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986 was a proportionate interference with the appellants' rights under article 10 ECHR. The alleged offences concerned slogans shouted by the appellants who were protesting in the vicinity of a local Royal Anglian Regiment C homecoming parade following its return from Afghanistan and Iraq. The slogans which the appellants shouted included "British soldiers murderers", "Rapists all of you" and "Baby killers". In giving the main judgment of the Divisional Court, Gross LJ said that "even if there is otherwise a prima facie case for contending that an offence has been committed under section 5, it is still for the Crown to establish that prosecution is a proportionate response, necessary for the preservation of public order" (para 49(vi)). He noted at D para 49(viii) that the legislature had entrusted that decision to magistrates or a district judge and stated the appellate test to be as follows:

> "The test for this court on an appeal of this nature is whether the decision to which the district judge has come was open to her or not. This court should not interfere unless, on well-known grounds, the appellants can establish that the decision to which the district judge has come is one E she could not properly have reached."

35 None of these cases were referred to by the Divisional Court in this case. Since the issue of the appropriate appellate test was not raised until the hearing the parties had not prepared to address that issue, nor did they apparently seek further time to do so. In the result, the Divisional Court reached its decision that the appropriate appellate test was that set out in F In re B without consideration of a number of relevant authorities.

Edwards v Bairstow

36 The conventional approach of the Divisional Court to apply a strict appellate test of irrationality or perversity reflects recognition of the fact that an appeal by way of case stated is an appeal from the tribunal of fact which G is only permissible on a question of law (or excess of jurisdiction). As stated in section 111(1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 ("MCA"):

> "(1) Any person who was a party to any proceeding before a magistrates' court or is aggrieved by the conviction, order, determination or other proceeding of the court may question the proceeding on the ground that it is wrong in law or is in excess of jurisdiction by applying to H the justices composing the court to state a case for the opinion of the High Court on the question of law or jurisdiction involved . . ." (Emphasis added.)

37 It has long been recognised that appellate restraint is required in cases involving appeals from tribunals of fact which are only allowed on

A questions of law. The leading authority as to the appropriate approach in such cases is the House of Lords decision in Edwards v Bairstow [1956] AC 14. That case concerned an appeal by way of case stated from a decision of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax. Such appeals are only allowable if the decision can be shown to be wrong in law. The case concerned whether a joint venture for the purchase and sale of a spinning plant was an "adventure . . . in the nature of trade". The B commissioners had decided that it was not and before the courts below the appeal had been dismissed on the grounds that the question was purely one of fact. The House of Lords allowed the appeal. In a well-known and often cited passage, Lord Radcliffe explained the proper approach as follows (at p 36):

> "When the case comes before the court it is its duty to examine the C determination having regard to its knowledge of the relevant law. If the case contains anything ex facie which is bad law and which bears upon the determination, it is, obviously, erroneous in point of law. But, without any such misconception appearing ex facie, it may be that the facts found are such that no person acting judicially and properly instructed as to the relevant law could have come to the determination D under appeal. In those circumstances, too, the court must intervene. It has no option but to assume that there has been some misconception of the law and that, this has been responsible for the determination. So there, too, there has been error in point of law . . . the true and only reasonable conclusion contradicts the determination."

38 This approach has been followed for other case stated appeal E procedures—see, for example, New Windsor Corpn v Mellor [1974] 1 WLR 1504 in relation to appeals from commons commissioners. It has also been applied in other related contexts, such as, for example, appeals from arbitration awards. Since the Arbitration Act 1979 appeals have only been allowed on questions of law arising out of an award. In Pioneer Shipping Ltd v BTP Tioxide Ltd (The Nema) [1982] AC 724 the question arose as to F the proper approach to an appeal against an arbitrator's decision that a charterparty had been frustrated by delay, a question of mixed fact and law. It was held that Edwards v Bairstow should be applied. As Lord Roskill stated at pp 752–753:

> "My Lords, in Edwards v Bairstow [1956] AC 14, 36, Lord Radcliffe made it plain that the court should only interfere with the conclusion of G special commissioners if it were shown either that they had erred in law or that they had reached a conclusion on the facts which they had found which no reasonable person, applying the relevant law, could have reached. My Lords, when it is shown on the face of a reasoned award that the appointed tribunal has applied the right legal test, the court should in my view only interfere if on the facts found as applied to that right legal H test, no reasonable person could have reached that conclusion. It ought not to interfere merely because the court thinks that upon those facts and applying that test, it would not or might not itself have reached the same conclusion, for to do that would be for the court to usurp what is the sole function of the tribunal of fact."

A 39 The conventional approach of the Divisional Court to appeals by way of case stated in criminal proceedings is to similar effect. A conclusion will be one which is open to the court unless it is one which no reasonable court, properly directed as to the law, could have reached on the facts found. If on the face of the case stated, there is an error of law material to the decision reached, then it will be wrong in law and, as such, a conclusion which it was not reasonably open to the court to reach.

B 40 In the context of appeals by way of case stated in criminal proceedings (unlike in arbitration appeals), a conclusion will be open to challenge on the grounds that it is one which no reasonable court could have reached even if it categorised as a conclusion of fact. As stated by Lord Goddard CJ in Bracegirdle v Oxley [1947] KB 349, 353:

> C "It is said that this court is bound by the findings of fact set out in the cases by the magistrates. It is true that this court does not sit as a general court of appeal against magistrates' decisions in the same way as quarter sessions. In this court we only sit to review the magistrates' decisions on points of law, being bound by the facts which they have found, provided always that there is evidence on which they could come to the conclusions of fact at which they have arrived . . . if magistrates come to a decision to D which no reasonable bench of magistrates, applying their minds to proper considerations, and giving themselves proper directions, could come, then this court can interfere, because the position is exactly the same as if the magistrates had come to a decision of fact without evidence to support it."

In R v North West Suffolk (Mildenhall) Magistrates' Court, Ex p Forest E Heath District Council [1998] Env LR 9, 18–19 Lord Bingham CJ agreed with those observations, adding as follows:

> "It is obviously perverse and an error of law to make a finding of fact for which there is no evidential foundation. It is also perverse to say that black is white, which is essentially what the justices did in Bracegirdle v Oxley. But it is not perverse, even if it may be mistaken, to prefer the F evidence of A to that of B where they are in conflict. That gives rise, in the absence of special and unusual circumstances (absent here), to no error of law challengeable by case stated in the High Court. It gives rise to an error of fact properly to be pursued in the Crown Court."

41 In D'Souza v Director of Public Prosecutions [1992] 1 WLR 1073 the House of Lords applied the Edwards v Bairstow test to an appeal by way G of case stated in criminal proceedings concerning whether the appellant, who had absconded from a hospital where she was lawfully detained under the Mental Health Act 1983, was a person who was "unlawfully at large and whom [the police constables were] pursuing" under section 17(1)(d) of PACE so as to empower entry to her home without a warrant. Lord Lowry (with whose judgment all their lordships agreed) categorised this issue as "a question of fact" but one which "must be answered within the relevant H legal principles and paying regard to the meaning in their context of the relevant words" (at p 1082H). Lord Lowry's conclusion (at p 1086F), citing Lord Radcliffe's judgment in Edwards v Bairstow, was that:

> "I do not consider that it was open to the Crown Court to find that 'those seeking to retake the escaped patient' and in particular the constables concerned, were pursuing her, because there was in my view no material in the facts found on which (taking a proper view of the law) they could properly reach that conclusion."

© 2022 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

In re B

42 In the light of the well-established appellate approach to appeals from tribunals of fact which are only permitted on questions of law, including in relation to cases stated under section 111 of the MCA, we do not consider that the Divisional Court was correct to decide that there is a different appellate test where the appeal raises an assessment of proportionality and, moreover, to do so without regard to any of the relevant authorities.

43 In re B [2013] 1 WLR 1911 was a family law case and involved the appellate test under CPR r 52.11(3) that an appeal will be allowed where the decision of the lower court is "wrong", whether in law or in fact. The Divisional Court placed reliance on the extradition case of Love [2018] 1 WLR 2889 but that too involves a wide right of appeal "on a question of law or fact" (sections 26(3)(a) and 103(4)(a) of the Extradition Act 2003). An appeal may be allowed if "the district judge ought to have decided a question before him differently" and "had he decided it as he ought to have done, he would have been required to discharge the appellant"—see sections 27(3) and 104(3). In argument, reliance was also placed on the application of In re B in judicial review appeals. There are, however, generally no disputed facts in judicial review cases, nor do they involve appeals from the only permissible fact finder. In the specific context of challenges to the decision of a magistrates' court, where an error of law is alleged, the appropriate remedy is normally by way of case stated rather than by seeking judicial review—see, for example, R (P) v Liverpool City Magistrates' Court (2006) 170 JP 453, para 5.

44 It would in any event be unsatisfactory, as a matter of both principle and practicality, for the appellate test in appeals by way of case stated to fluctuate according to the nature of the issue raised. That would mean that there were two applicable appellate tests and that it would be necessary to determine in each case which was applicable. That would be likely to depend upon whether or not the case turns on an assessment of proportionality, which may well give rise to difficult and marginal decisions as to how central the issue of proportionality is to the decision reached. On any view, having alternative appellate tests adds unnecessary and undesirable complexity and uncertainty.

45 A prosecution under section 137 of 1980 Act, for example, requires proof of a number of different elements. There must be an obstruction; the obstruction must be of a highway; it must be wilful, and it must be without lawful authority or excuse. Some cases stated in relation to section 137 prosecutions may involve no proportionality issues at all; some may involve proportionality issues and other issues; some may involve only proportionality issues. The appellate test should not vary according to the ingredients of the case stated.

46 Whilst we do not consider that In re B is the applicable appellate test it may, nevertheless, be very relevant to appeals by way of case stated that turn on issues of proportionality. The law as stated in In re B has been

© 2022 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

A developed in later cases. In In re B at para 88 Lord Neuberger PSC stated as follows:

> "If, after reviewing the judge's judgment and any relevant evidence, the appellate court considers that the judge approached the question of proportionality correctly as a matter of law and reached a decision which he was entitled to reach, then the appellate court will not interfere. If, on B the other hand, after such a review, the appellate court considers that the judge made a significant error of principle in reaching his conclusion or reached a conclusion he should not have reached, then, and only then, will the appellate court reconsider the issue for itself if it can properly do so (as remitting the issue results in expense and delay, and is often pointless)."

C 47 This approach was qualified by the Supreme Court in R (R) v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester Police [2018] 1 WLR 4079. In that case Lord Carnwath JSC (with whom the other justices agreed) said at para 64:

> "In conclusion, the references cited above show clearly in my view that to limit intervention to a 'significant error of principle' is too narrow an approach, at least if it is taken as implying that the appellate court has to D point to a specific principle—whether of law, policy or practice—which has been infringed by the judgment of the court below. The decision may be wrong, not because of some specific error of principle in that narrow sense, but because of an identifiable flaw in the judge's reasoning, such as a gap in logic, a lack of consistency, or a failure to take account of some material factor, which undermines the cogency of the conclusion. E However, it is equally clear that, for the decision to be 'wrong' under CPR r 52.11(3), it is not enough that the appellate court might have arrived at a different evaluation. As Elias LJ said in R (C) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2016] PTSR, para 34: 'the appeal court does not second guess the first instance judge. It does not carry out the balancing task afresh as though it were rehearing the case but must adopt a traditional function of review, asking whether the decision of the judge F below was wrong . . .' "

48 As Lewison LJ stated in R (Z) v Hackney London Borough Council [2019] PTSR 2272, para 66:

> "It is not enough simply to demonstrate an error or flaw in reasoning. It must be such as to undermine the cogency of the conclusion. G Accordingly, if there is no such error or flaw, the appeal court should not make its own assessment of proportionality."

Lewison LJ's observations as to the proper approach were endorsed by the Supreme Court [2020] 1 WLR 4327—see the judgment of Lord Sales JSC at para 74 and that of Lady Arden JSC at paras 118–120.

49 In cases stated which turn on an assessment of proportionality, the H factors which the court considers to be relevant to that assessment are likely to be the subject of findings set out in the case, as they were in the present case. If there is an error or flaw in the reasoning which undermines the cogency of the conclusion on proportionality that is, therefore, likely to be apparent on the face of the case. In accordance with In re B, as clarified by the later case law, such an error may be regarded as an error of law on the face of the case. It would, therefore, be open to challenge under the Edwards v Bairstow appellate test. As Lady Arden JSC observes, any such challenge would have to be made on the basis of the primary and secondary findings set out in the case stated, unless there was no evidence for them or they were findings which no reasonable tribunal could have reached. The review is of the judgment and any relevant findings, not "any relevant evidence".

© 2022 The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales

50 In his judgment Lord Sales JSC sets out in detail the differences between rationality and proportionality and why he considers that the same approach should be adopted in all cases on appeal which concern whether an error of law has been made in relation to an issue of proportionality.
